vegetables, as fruit and coffee, are the ordinary dinner menu. The little Japanese maid in her beautiful kimono, with exquisite dressed hair, moves about dexterously and as silently as a shadow —serving at table perfectly. In some homes a Chinese or Japanese butler is preferred, and he too, in his snow-white, duck jacket and trousers waits silently and perfectly, with no blundering or awkwardness. As might be expected, in a country where there are comparitively few public amusements, entertaining at home is the chief resource. The residents of Honolulu, and elsewhere in the islands, are indefatigable hosts and hostesses, there being few houses where there are not almost daily guests to luncheon and dinner, while formal teas, and afternoon or evening musicals, impromptu affairs at the seaside and mountain places where servants are always in charge and a meal can be prepared with a telephone order to that effect from the town house, afford sufficient variety. Parties are made up for horse-back riding and the country club at Honolulu—one of the most beautiful places imaginable—may always be relied upon.

The frequent visits of ships of all nations, the new army garrisons, the naval station, the consular residences, each and all, vie with each other in their entertainments.

Mention has been made of public amusements and these, though irregular, are by no means wholly lacking. The ubiquitous lecturer arrives and if at all well known, can generally count upon a fair hearing, especially if a private house is placed at his or her disposal, which is frequently done.

Occasionally some great actor or artist bound for, or returning from the East or the antipodes, remains in port long enough to give the population of Honolulu a treat, and if it is a person of sufficient fame, the opera house will be crowded and business practically suspended. No exact hour can ever be fixed for such an entertainment; nor is it certain that it may not be altogether postponed, as it all depends upon the arrival of the ship and its stay in port. The anticipated concert may be at ten in the morning, at noon, or at one o'clock, and it has happened that the artist has had to hurry his programme, fly from his dressing-room to the wharf as fast as an automobile can carry him, to get on board in time.

The roads throughout the island are generally excellent and there, as elsewhere, the automobile is in high favor. The visitor on a remote plantation ceases to be surprised at the arrival of a motor, with its party of callers, all in faultless motoring costume. Indeed, it may be said that great taste in the matter of dress is characteristic on all occasions. The people travel a great deal, continents and oceans being alike to these island dwellers.

Life, however, in this lotus-land, is not all pleasure. Its duties and obligations are assumed there as conscientiously and as faithfully as they would be amongst good citizens at home. There are on all the islands flourishing literary, study clubs, philanthropic organizations, while Honolulu has an excellent historical society, a chapter of the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution, and other clubs, athletic, social, patriotic and scientific, without number. All the American holidays are observed. The leading Protestant churches are represented and are well attended, while they carry on outside work in many fields that places them in the front rank with the best organizations of the kind in our American cities. So broad is the spirit of toleration that Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Roman Catholics, Lutherans, Methodists and even Buddhists worship as they see fit, without let or hindrance from their neighbors.

The new-comer who has not divested himself of the idea that the Hawaiians are still cannibals—which they never were—will probably be surprised at the high standard of culture that prevails everywhere and the cosmopolitan spirit which is prevalent, and which ought to be expected in a country with so heterogeneous population, lying in the route of ships plying to Australasia, to Japan, China, Canada and the United States, amongst whose passengers are distinguished men and women of all nationalities, who seldom pass the Islands by in their varied and extended travels.

A Little Nonsense

FOR "BUSINESS IS BUSINESS."

"Mama," asked little three-year-old Freddie, "are we going to heaven some day?"

"Yes, dear, I hope so," was the reply.

"I wish papa could go, too," continued the little fellow.

"Well, and don't you think he will?" asked his mother.

"Oh, no," replied Freddie, "he could not leave his business."—Tit-Bits.

A KEEN LAD.

"I had always heard that New Englanders were 'smart,'" a young physician who has "graduated" from a village practice remarked the other day, "but I hardly thought it developed at such an early age."

He smiled reminiscently, then continued:

"Just after I settled in Dobbs Corners a twelve-year-old boy called on me one evening.

"'Say, Doc, I guess I got measles,' he remarked, 'but nobody knows it 'cept the folks at home, an' they ain't the kind that talks, if there's any good reason to keep quiet.

"I was puzzled, and I suppose I looked it.

"'Aw, get wise, Doc,' my small visitor suggested. 'What will you give me to go to school an' spread it among all the kids in the village?'"—Lippincott's.

PERFECTLY SAFE.

"I reckon you have to watch your pocketbook an' overcoat an' watch, an' so on, pretty close, don't you?" a Western visitor to New York asked a friend, a native of that metropolis, as they were starting out to view the city; and, despite the citizen's assurance that no more than ordinary vigilance was required, the Westerner proceeded "to keep his eye skinned," much to his friend's amusement.

Presently they entered a cafe for luncheon. The New Yorker was discoursing gayly upon the greatness of his native city, when he observed that the other had an expression on his face much like that of a cat at a mouse-hole.

"What are you watching so closely?" he inquired.

"Just keepin' an eye on my overcoat," the other replied.

The New Yorker laughed. "Oh, the coat's all right. I'm not worrying about mine, you see, and they're hanging together."

"No, they ain't," the Westerner drawled. "Mine's still there, but yours is gone—feller walked out with it 'bout ten minutes or so ago."

THE FINDING OF CAMILLA

By Lucie E. Jackson, author of "Feadora's Failure," "For Muriel's Sake."

CHAPTER XXII.

Mrs. Jones Is Astonished.

Mrs. Jones met the cavalcade at the garden gate. "The old man is in a fine taking at finding you gone," she said.

"What! is grandfather himself?" exclaimed Camilla, excitedly.

"I dunno what he is when he is himself," returned the landlady, "but if he is always what he is now, he is most uncommon disagreeable, and that's all I can say about the matter," and Mrs. Jones stalked off without another word.

Camilla was about to make a dart up the garden path, forgetful of Chicot and her chariot, for once, when she felt Mr. Densham's hand upon her arm. She turned quickly, feeling almost impatient at the delay.

"Don't mention me to your grandfather at present. It will only worry him," he said.

She gave a nod in answer, so eager was she to reach the sick man's side. Mr. Densham watched her flit up the path and into the house; then he turned, and seeing Chicot standing patiently at the gate began slowly to unharness him.

With breathless haste Camilla flew up the stairs and burst into the room, with Taras clinging to her shoulder, Jacques at her very heels, and Bebe and Jules making a close running behind.

"Pierre—Grandfather!" she exclaimed.

"Cherie," returned the Frenchman, in a voice so low and weak, and so unlike his former hearty tones that Camilla, excited with events of the afternoon and at Mrs. Jones' sudden news, sank down at his side and burst into tears.

"Mais, mon enfant, ne pleurez pas," murmured Pierre, endeavoring to raise himself and to lay a hand upon her head.

But at that moment Mrs. Jones entered the room with a cup of beef tea.

"You're a fine nurse," she remarked to the crying child. "Yes, that's it," sarcastically, "go and cry more and put him into a fever again."

"My child could never hurt me," said Pierre faintly, fondling Camilla's hand as he felt it creep into his.

"Don't talk rubbish, and just drink this," was the reply.

"I'll lift him. You hold the cup," cried Camilla springing up, her fears for the disguise rising again.

But Mrs. Jones pushed her unceremoniously aside. "One would think to hear you speak that you are the strong woman and I the baby. Clear out, will you? And give me elbow room."

She lifted the sick man as she spoke. How it came about Camilla never knew. Pierre's restless movements must have helped to loosen his disguise. As Mr. Jones lowered him after he had drunk the contents of the cup, the wig slipped suddenly back, and disclosed to the landlady's astonished gaze a fine head of thick black hair.

"My!" exclaimed the astonished landlady, "whatever's this? May be t'other's sham," laying her hand with a laugh on the patriarchal beard.

But at her words and gesture, Camilla flew upon her with the cry of a wounded and desperate animal.

"Don't touch! don't touch!" she cried wildly. "Oh! how dare you!"

For Mrs. Jones' strong arm pushed her off as lightly as a feather, and her strong fingers removed the Frenchman's last disguise.

There he lay helpless, inert, enfeebled, but a young man whose bodily strength, as she could see at a glance, had been great, and would be great again when once this weakening sickness had left him.

To Camilla the climax seemed reached as the door opened at that very moment to admit Dr. Morgan. He looked in astonishment at the trio before him. A young man in the prime of life had taken the place of the aged figure in the bed, and the landlady was holding the long white beard in her hand, with a tantalizing laugh. Camilla stood by with a flushed face, in which anger and fear seemed curiously blended.

Mrs. Jones broke the silence. "My! this is something strange," she said, regarding Pierre with her arms akimbo. "And for why have you passed as an old man when you was all the time a young one?"

The beef tea seemed to have put some new strength into Pierre. He raised himself up a trifle, and Camilla crept to his side, and, putting her arm round him, endeavored to support him.

"For a very good reason," said Pierre slowly, looking from the landlady to the doctor; "and when I am strong again, perhaps I'll explain it to you, and to you, too, sir, if you care to listen. But till then is it too much to ask you both to keep your own counsel on the matter?"

"If you mean for me to hold my tongue, I'll do so, I can assure you," was Mrs. Jones' unexpected answer. "I was never one to gossip. But it beats me hollow!"

"And you, sir?" inquired the Frenchman wearily.

"A doctor never repeats what he sees in a sickroom," replied Dr. Morgan cheerily, as he advanced to the bedside. "And I think," looking at Pierre's honest eyes and then at the landlady, "that you can depend on Mrs. Jones. But," as the landlady left the room, "this changes the aspect of affairs. Since there is nothing to hide, I propose that the capable nurse that has accompanied me here may come upstairs. Her careful nursing will bring you round in a trice. Why, my good fellow, I thought you were in for a good long job, but at this rate we'll see you on your pins in a very short while."

One by one, he over-ruled all the Frenchman's objections, and when a middle-aged woman with kindly features was admitted into the room, Pierre finally gave in.

The disguise had worried him in his unconscious state, and it was a relief to have it off. But he half smiled as he saw how carefully Camilla was putting it by in the little box, so that the nurse's eyes might not rest upon it.

When Camilla came downstairs, later on, and told Mr. Densham of the nurse's arrival, that gentleman was distinctly relieved. It was one thing to be nurse to a half delirious man, but quite another now that the patient had regained consciousness.

"In a few days, when he is stronger, I shall have it out with him as to why he has retained the child," thought Roger Densham to himself. "But until then I may as well lie perdu."

Mrs. Jones was as good as her word, and she kept her own counsel with regard to the disguise, not telling even her gentleman lodger of the surprise she had met with in the sick room.

CHAPTER XXIII.

An Unseen Spectator.

The next morning, when the nurse had made him comfortable and had seen him eat a more substantial breakfast than was often the case with her patients, she departed, and Pierre soon fell into an untroubled sleep. Camilla sat by him for a little while, and then she stole quietly away to Mr. Jones in the garden.

On the east side of Charnford lay the river. Camilla, emboldened by her success of yesterday, had made up her mind to try that part of the town, and now waylaid Mr. Jones to learn from him all that was necessary for her to know.

"Jest you start your performance mid way atween Charnford and Brooklyn," said Mr. Jones, leaning confidentially on his spade. "And jest you pitch yourself along the towing path aside the bridge, near eleven o'clock, or thereabouts. These warm days the quality spends most o' their mornin's down on the water, and they'd enjoy bein' amoosed with a bit o' music and the sight o' they dancin' dogs."

So Camilla dressed Taras in his uniform, and to put him in a good humor she hung the necklace of blue beads round his neck. Bebe, Jules and Chicot were be-ribboned, but Jacques she left unadorned. In the poodle she placed all her courage. He was to be her guardian against harm, for she hardly dared to hope for Mr. Densham's company again. As her protector, therefore, she desired that Jacques should be allowed to look dignified.

Mr. Densham was in the garden when she came out, making friends with Bebe and Jules, but the poodle stood aloof, eyeing him gravely.

"Oh!" said Camilla, and then stopped short. It was almost too good a thing to suppose that he was there to accompany them.

"May I assist in carrying the violin?" he asked.

"Are you really coming with us again?" questioned Camilla almost breathlessly.

"If you will have me," was his reply, as he helped her into the carriage.

Camilla's face brightened wonderfully. "You are good!" she said. "I cannot think why you are so kind."

Perhaps he was not quite sure himself. He said nothing, but looked down at the delicate little face, and what he saw there must have reminded him of the child's mother, for the look was one of Mr. Densham's best.

They had gone some little way, when he suddenly said—

"I want you to grant me a favor."

Camilla looked up in surprise. "Oh! yes, of course I will," she said readily enough.

"Don't be in too great a hurry to promise before you know what it is," he said with a smile, and Mr. Densham's smiles for Camilla were very different from those he cast on other people. "It is that you will not dance this morning as you did yesterday.

"Didn't you like it?" she said in a disappointed tone.

"Not before all those people," he replied. "Do you think your grandfather would have liked it?"

As he spoke his thoughts flew to the real grandfather, the fine old Squire, who would have shrunk into himself at seeing his granddaughter—his eldest son's child—dancing in public to the cheers of a crowd of farmers and street boys.

Camilla's head sank down. "Grandfather never wished me to do it. He never would let me appear in any of the performances. But now that he is sick, why, I can't help doing it. We—we—haven't very much money," she added, in dignified self defence. "And I must work for him now that he cannot work for me."

Roger Densham almost smiled at the thought of Rexington Falconer's child working to earn bread for a travelling French showman.

"True," he said gently, "but pass the dance over. Let the dogs do the dancing, and that rascal of a monkey," as Taras at that moment put his head out of Camilla's cloak. "Don't set yourself to be gazed at in that fashion, child."

"I won't do it if you don't like it," she said. Then, with a naivette that touched him exceedingly, she added, "But I thought it was one of the nicest bits."

"So it was," he answered heartily, "and your grandfather has taught you most cleverly. But keep it only for the eyes of those that care for you, and not for those of a gaping crowd."

In a short while they reached the river by the towing path, and took up their position, as Mr. Jones had suggested, beside the bridge.

Boats of all descriptions thronged the river that morning. Ladies reclined on cushioned seats in skiffs and punts, their gay dresses forming bright patches of brilliant color like so many blossoms of different hues, whilst attendant squires lazily sculled them down the smooth water.

It was a sight worth seeing, and little Camilla drew in her breath and looked and watched, until a gentle reminder from Jacques aroused her.

The poodle was having the greatest difficulty in keeping Bebe and Jules from straying away on stolen pleasures bent, and even Chicot, forgetful of his usual decorum, was half way up one of the hedges that hung leafy boughs temptingly close to his mouth.

Jacques caught Camilla's skirt between his teeth, and gave it a sharp pull. The child awoke to a sense of her responsibilities, and darted up the bank to pull Chicot down. The goat resented it. He was having a delicious feed off juicy nut leaves, and kicked out, to the peril of the carriage behind him.

"Oh! Chicot," cried Camilla in alarmed dismay.

But Jacques with a few sharp barks came to her aid. He harassed the turbulent Chicot in the rear, much to that animal's indignation, till in sheer self-defence he deemed it wiser to abstain from such ill-timed gluttony and to resume his usual dignity.

Then Bebe and Jules had to be chastised by the poodle, who dragged each dog back by the ear up to Camilla, and plumped them down with an ominous shake and growl.

All this was most attractive to the pleasure seekers on the river, and so Camilla discovered when, after unharnessing Chicot and tuning up her violin, she found innumerable boats with their scullers idly leaning on their oars watching her proceedings with the liveliest interest.

This boded well for the performance. So, stifling many inward tremors, Camilla touched the strings of the violin and Bebe and Jules started dancing merrily, with their paws round each other's waists, to the strains of a lively waltz.

The uproarious clapping that followed this brought a pleased flush to Camilla's cheek, and an answering smile to Roger Densham's lips, where he stood quite apart from the performers, some yards distant on the towing path.

There was no hitch in any part of the performance today. Even Taras went through his appointed task with due solemnity. But at the end, the difficulty of collecting the money presented itself to Camilla. Taras could not spring from one boat to another, holding out his collecting box.

The tears started to the child's eyes. Had their performance then gone for nothing? Even Mr. Densham, leaning his back comfortably against a tree, wondered at his own denseness in not thinking of this difficulty at the first.

But before long all was made straight. "Fling me the mug," called a stalwart young sculler. "I'll call round on the others and bring you in a fine harvest."

So half shyly, half fearfully, Camilla threw the mug. Over it went very nearly into the water, but was saved by the dexterous catch of the self-appointed collector. His own pocket and his own boat-load of ladies helped liberally towards making a beginning, and then, with a laugh of amusement, he sculled round to the other skiffs, holding the mug out to all.

No one refused. All gave something. And at the end Camilla's assistant stood up in his boat and, holding his cap in his hand, raised a cheer for the little girl and her animals. It was taken up all down the river, and then he sculled himself close to the bank, and, springing lightly up, presented the overflowing mug to Camilla.

The child's confusion and innocent pleasure filled him with delight. "Thank you," she said gratefully. "I was thinking that I would have to lose it all, for Taras couldn't hand it round."

"Oh! we should have thrown it up the bank for you," he said smiling. "Thank you for a very pleasant entertainment."

Then he sprang back, and Camilla was left gazing at, what seemed to her, veritable riches. The boats all slowly sculled themselves out of sight, and Mr. Densham came leisurely towards her.

"Are you too rich to require my mite?" he asked.

But Camilla answered him by holding out her mug with speechless delight.

"Here's to top it over," he said, lightly dropping two half sovereigns on the heap of silver and copper.

"Oh! oh!" cried Camilla. And then with smiles chasing themselves all over her face she, like a true business woman, put it all away in the little bag hidden in her pocket.

"And now we homewards jog, I suppose?" said Mr. Densham.

"Yes, grandfather might wake up and become frightened if he found me gone," replied Camilla.

"Are you very fond of that old man?" he asked, as he helped her to harness Chicot.

"I love him," she returned simply. "He's all I've got, and he loves me. It's for him I'm gathering this money. If you only knew what he's done for me," and here she checked herself, for she found herself venturing on forbidden ground.

All the way home her heart was light, and she chatted blithely to Roger Densham on the events of the morning. But if her thoughts were bright, Mr. Densham's were gloomy enough.

"The folly of it!" he muttered to himself. "The folly of it, that Madeline's daughter—the old Squire's grandchild—should be obliged to so exhibit serself. But this must be the last time. I shall have a talk to this Frenchman before she has another performance. Pray heaven, there was no one there today whom she will ever come across."

But in this Mr. Densham was mistaken, for in a boat further away from the rest, and half hidden by the trees which hung over the bank, there had been an interested group, and amongst them was Mr. Bartoletti. He had raised a pair of strong glasses, and stared long at the child and her animals, and then at the figure that was plainly to be seen lounging against a tree in a half discontented fashion.

"Per Bacco!" he had suddenly exclaimed, and the glasses had nearly fallen from his hand. "The wily villain! he was trying to dupe me that evening at Redhill, after all. But I shall be even with him yet!"

And the Italian's face had looked revengeful.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"What Is Thy Secret?"

It was the afternoon of the same day. Pierre was better. He had shown some eagerness, too, for the nourishing broth the nurse had brought to his bedside, and this she told to the doctor.

"He has been half starved," was Dr. Morgan's reply. "All that he wants now is good food, and plenty of it. See that he gets it."

Something of this conversation did Pierre overhear, and it set him thinking. It was all very well for the doctor to talk so glibly of his having plenty of good food, but where was the money to come from to pay for it?

With these disturbing thoughts in his head, the Frenchman roused himself from the half doze he had been indulging in to call somewhat feebly—

"Cherie, art thou there?"

At once Camilla threw aside the faded bits of ribbon she was trying to smooth out for Chicot's fresh adornment, and sprang to his side.

"Grandfather, here I am."

A humorous twinkle appeared in Pierre's eyes. "It does not seem so fitting to call me grandfather now, cherie, does it? Dost miss the beard and wig, as I do?"

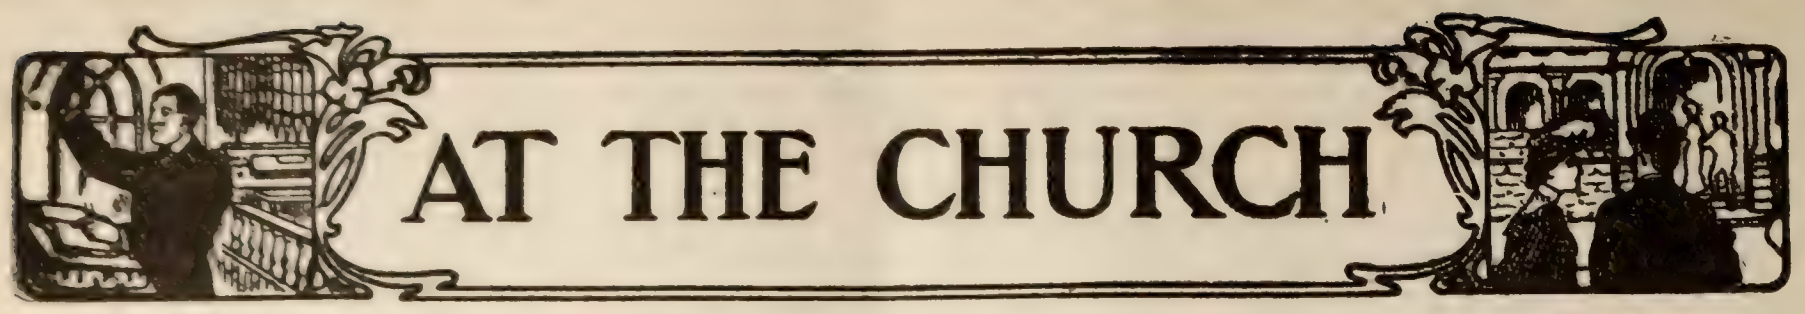
"Yes, oh! yes, Pierre. When will you wear them again? I've got them locked up quite safe in the box."

Pierre smiled. "Not whilst we are here, cherie. When we take to the road again, then I shall be the old grandfather, but not before. And it is this that is troubling me, cherie. How long will it be before the bon Dieu makes me strong enough to go on our travels! Till then, mon enfant, no money can be earned, and I tremble to think how little is left in the purse to pay for the doctor and the nurse, to say nothing of our landlady."

Camilla's face was one flush and sparkle. "Pierre——" she began.

"Grandfather, cherie," he corrected. "No matter how strange it may seem, 'tis better than my own name, which may lead to trouble."

Camilla came close and laid her hand on his. "Grandfather, I've had a secret from you all the time that you've been ill. You couldn't guess what it is, could you?"



"You've not found your grandparents?" he asked in a half whisper.

"No, no, nothing like that. I wouldn't know how to find them, and—and—I don't think I want that nearly so much as your getting well again."

If the child had wished to convey her real feelings towards the Frenchman, no other words of hers could have so convinced him of her true affection.

Pierre looked at her with eyes aglow. "Speak on, cherie," he said softly. "What is thy secret?"

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Apostle, the Governor, and the King*

When Antonius Felix, the procurator of Judea, left his office about Pentecost of the year 60 A. D., he was succeeded by Porcius Festus, whose official life under Nero came to an end in 62. Among the legacies left to him by his predecessor was the case of the Apostle Paul who, for two years, had been kept as a privileged prisoner in the Herodian palace at Caesarea. Paul had considerable liberty and was able to meet his friends freely. Probably Luke lived in quarters not far removed from the apostle's prison, and so was able to be of great service to his master as well as record the most important of events which befell him. It would be of inestimable advantage to us if we had a more detailed account from this admirable historian of the life of the apostle, and yet it was no part of the work of the New Testament writers to supply any but the most essential features of the lives of Jesus and his leading representatives. We have every reason to be grateful for the comparatively full record of this period of Paul's life, concerning which so much more is known than of the earlier years.

Festus' Governorship.

Soon after Festus was inducted into office and had established himself in the official residence at Caesarea he went up to Jerusalem, the social and religious center of his province. It was, perhaps, on the occasion of the Feast of Pentecost in the year 60 A. D. that he made this visit, and his presence in the city was utilized by the Jewish leaders to make fresh charges against the prisoner Paul at Caesarea. They had failed in their earlier effort and were probably counting much on the arrival of the new governor. They had, at least, accomplished a part of their desire in securing Paul's continued imprisonment. It must be remembered that imprisonment in ancient times was never intended as a punishment in itself, but was always preliminary to some kind of an official hearing. But in Paul's case it served all the purposes of a judicial punishment since it prevented that activity which was the special object of his career.

Two Years of Silence.

It may seem strange that we hear so little of the apostle's doing during these two years at Caesarea. There are no epistles that come from this time. Lightfoot's view that the letters of the imprisonment, including Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians and Philippians, were written from Caesarea has been almost totally abandoned. It must have been a period of study and of preparation for future labors on the part of the apostle, and no doubt of profitable companionship with his friends, among whom Luke had a prominent place. These years would be an admirable time for the young Greek to gain materials in Jerusalem and Nazareth for that story of the life of Jesus and the beginnings of the church which is contained in the two books, the Third Gospel and the Acts.

The favor which the Jews asked of Festus was Paul's removal for official trial to Jerusalem. They do not seem to have hoped that this would result in Paul's conviction, but they had a more deadly weapon in reserve, hoping to assasinate him on the way to the city. But Festus told them that he was about to leave for Caesarea, and that they might follow him there if they wished to make charges. The result was another hearing similar to that of our last study, at which Felix had presided and the high priest and the hired advocate had been the leaders of the Jewish deputation.

The Appeal to Caesar.

After the formal charges had been presented by the Jews and denied by the apostle, very much as in the previous hearing, the question of adjourning the investigation to Jerusalem once more came up. Festus did not suggest that Paul should be tried by the Jewish council, but that he himself might take up the matter in the Holy City. But here, as upon a previous occasion, Paul, threatened by a danger which he understood better than the governor, fell back upon his rights as a Roman citizen. He insisted that he was kept as a prisoner without any reasonable charge against him. After two investigations which had reached no conclusion, it was now proposed to place him again in jeopardy by removal of the case to Jerusalem where his enemies were strongest. This he was not minded to permit. As a Roman citizen he had the right of appeal to the emperor himself, and feeling the injustice of the delay, he cast the die and made his demand that he be transported to Rome and given a chance to face his accusers before Nero.

Advantage of the Appeal.

It is probable that Festus was both surprised and disappointed at this action of Paul's. He confessed afterwards to Agrippa that there was no reason why the apostle should not be released. He was perhaps not actuated by such mercenary motives as those of Felix in continuing the hearing. He seems to have been a much better man. But Paul had appealed to Caesar, accepting all the consequences of that action, and Festus had no choice but to send him forthwith to Rome.

The student must not fail to see how this appeal to Caesar was the means by which Paul secured for himself the privilege which he had coveted for years. He knew that there was peril in the appeal, but such peril he was willing to accept since it brought him to the goal of his desires—the privilege of preaching the gospel in the capitol of the world. More than this, he was assured of safe and free transportation, and this was no small item in a time when the dangers of traveling were so many and its cost so great. Now, at last, the object of his years of waiting was before him. He should see Rome.

The Visit of Agrippa and Bernice.

The remainder of the events which transpired during Paul's last days in Caesarea are of minor significance, although they are interesting as throwing light upon the character of the apostle. Soon after the appeal, King Agrippa II., the great-grandson of Herod the Great, and son of Herod Agrippa I who put to death the apostle James and imprisoned Peter, came with his sister, Bernice, to pay the governor an official visit. The king and the procurator talked of Paul during this visit, and Festus tried to learn from his friend, who was better informed regarding Jewish customs, what it was that constituted the ground of accusation against his prisoner, since he wished to send some message along with Paul to the emperor. The result of these inquiries was the arousal of Agrippa's interest in the captive and, on a convenient occasion, the court was assembled with unusual splendor as if for a gala day, and Paul was brought in before Festus, Agrippa and Bernice for a hearing.

Agrippa's Indifference.

The appearance of Paul before Agrippa is one of the most interesting incidents reported in the New Testament, because it supplies at almost first hand many of the things concerning Paul's life which we wish to know. But the chief feature of the interview was Paul's confident appeal to Agrippa as one who knew Jewish law and customs and who ought to be able to see that the gospel was the fulfillment of those very hopes and prophecies which made up the sum total of Jewish beliefs. The record of Paul's conversion on the way to Damascus, which is here given in the second of the three accounts recorded in Acts, prepares the way for the final and passionate appeal to the king. Festus, curious at the exhibition of so much enthusiasm and eagerness, cried out to Paul that he was overborne mad with his learning and zeal. But Paul was undiverted from his earnest effort to reach the king's conscience and persuade him, and when Agrippa lightly responded to the apostle's earnest and searching question, "King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets?" with his airy and careless words, "You are making an easy matter of converting me to Christianity," Paul saw that his effort was in vain and that the king was only interested in the novelty of the situation. Sadly he spoke his final words, "I wish, whether with little or with much persuasion, I might indeed make of you and of all who hear me today such as I am, except for my prisonerhood." With that the interview closed. The king, the governor, and Agrippa's sister withdrew, and Paul only awaited a convenient moment for his departure toward Rome.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Topic, Oct. 13. Neh. 3:28; John 21:18-22.

"It is perhaps the chief part of the sin of the obscure units, which form these great masses of indifference, that they think they escape notice and cover their individual responsibility. At all times many have sought obscurity, not because they are humble, but because they are slothful, cowardly, or indifferent. Obviously it is this temper which is met by the words, I will search out Jerusalem with lights. None of us shall escape because we have said, "I will go with the crowd," or "I am a common man and have no right to thrust myself forward." We shall be followed and judged, each of us for his or her personal attitude to the great movements of our time. These things are not too high for us: they are our duty; and we cannot escape our duty by slinking into the shadow."—George Adam Smith.

Division of Labor.

Nehemiah secured great results by giving to each group of workers a particular part of the wall of Jerusalem to repair. By this plan he not only kept the laborers from getting in one another's way, but he also impressed upon every man the fact of his own responsibility. While any part of the wall remained unfinished the city was in danger. It was easy to see that all the people were exposed to attack until the entire wall was completed. Every man knew what his slothfulness or his diligence meant. May it not be that many members of the church lose their interest in the church because they have no definite tasks assigned to them. People of exceptional ability and determination may be depended upon to find something to do, but the majority of us need guidance. We have our own vocations and if the leaders of the church do not ask of us some specific service we are indifferent to the tasks which properly belong to Christian people. The church should be so organized that every member will find something to do and receive an urgent call to do it. If we who try to preach would give more attention to the needs of the communities in which we minister and to the capacities of our co-workers and preached fewer sermons on the indifference and worldliness of church members, the efficiency of the church would be greatly enhanced. The hectoring preacher is one who lacks the ability to get things done. He substitutes scolding for leadership.

What Is That to Thee?

The "reformer" who looks after the habits of his neighbors before he does his own is never an irresistible moral force. Jesus was doubtless willing that Peter should have an interest in the career of John, but he was not willing that Peter should substitute an officious concern as to the future of John for that sense of personal responsibility which is a mark of every genuine disciple. The "odious goodness" which causes a woman to discuss the faults of her husband at every meal and every time she gets him face to face with the preacher and which prompts a man to introduce his pet theories into every conversation without regard to the proprieties of social intercourse is usually odious because the critic has neglected the injunction, "Know thyself." If we know ourselves we are not forward to pronounce dogmatically upon the conduct of others and if we do plead with them to leave off bad habits we avoid the sin of self-righteousness.

Pseudo-sympathy is a frequent substitute for duty-doing. A man told Dr. Du Bois, of Berne, Switzerland, that he wept when he read the account of the disaster at Martinique and he explained his tears on the ground of his large-heartedness. Dr. Du Bois asked if he had contributed anything toward the relief of the sufferers and the man said he had not. It was interest in himself and not in the victims of the earthquake which made him weep. It is easy to turn the worship of the church into a systematic effort to produce pseudo-sympathy. We have to keep in mind always that shedding tears over the misfortunes or sins of humanity is consistent with the worst sort of selfishness. We can lose sleep over the injustice suffered by the hero of a novel and then the next day be as brutal as a barbarian to a child or some other person not strong enough to make us smart for our meanness. Jesus bids us look to our deeds and our words, not to our tears.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

TOPIC OCTOBER 17.

Pilgrim's Progress Series. X. Doubting Castle. Ps. 431-5; 73:13-20; I Kings 19:1-18.

None but a rugged, aggressive Christian could ever have written Pilgrim's Progress. We constantly say as we read it "that is true," because all the while it seems to echo our own experiences. This seems especially true as we read the account of the experiences of Christian and Hopeful in Doubting Castle.

Hardship and Suffering.

The subject of this lesson might be stated as, Doubts Resulting from Hardship and Disappointment. There are those who have become doubters because of intellectual difficulties. Indeed, the absolute number may seem large, but it is comparatively small. The fact is the demands of the daily task are so intense that the vast majority do not have time to sit up with their intellectual inconsistencies.

But when we turn to the problem of hardship and suffering, there is scarcely an individual, if he is making his life count, but who has given prolonged and serious thought to the problem. He struggles to be just and good, why should he be called upon to endure so much? This is a real trial and the strongest must struggle with it. Christian turned his back upon his village and upon his family, too, when they would not go with him. He persevered when Pliable grew despondent and turned back; he fought bravely and victoriously with Apollyon; he cheered faithful until death at Vanity Fair; he was the stay of Hopeful when Demas sought to lure him to one side. These victories had drained his energy. The burden was heavy and the journey long. Sore-footed and heavy at heart, Christian, even over the slight protest of Hopeful, turned to the Bypath because it seemed to offer relief. It lands him in Doubting Castle and his troubles are multiplied many fold. Buffeted by the storm, confused in the darkness, confined within gloomy and grimy walls, beaten with many stripes, and urged by his persecutor to take his own life, Chriseian says, "My soul chooseth strangling rather than life and the grave is more easy for me than this dungeon." The dark cloud of adversity had eclipsed his faith. If he did not doubt, he, at least for the moment, forgot God and seriously thought of suicide. Hardships had darkened his vision and suffering had disturbed his poise. And this was true of him, though a hero.

Does God Neglect Us?

We are all apt to think that God is good and powerful, and that suffering is bad for us, and we conclude, therefore, that God neglects us when he allows us to suffer. The first premise is true but the second is false, and our conclusion, therefore, is also false. We are all helpless and dependent upon one another. But we all know by observation and most of us by experience that when we accomplish every undertaking, gratify every desire, and realize every ambition we as a result become arrogant, vain, proud, impatient, bigoted. And on the other hand if trials and difficulties, disappointments and failures, hardships and suffering have entered the life there come as resultant qualities humility and sympathy, patience and long suffering, kindness and love. As examples of the former we have scores of examples of time serving self-seeking politicians who are in our municipal, state, and national legislatures. Of the latter we need no better examples than Helen Kellar and Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Though paradoxical it may seem, it is good for all to suffer.

Even Death Our Friend.

Even death is our friend. It is by virtue of it that you and I enjoy our life today. The mere growth of vegetation would become so luxuriant, entangling and obstructive, that life of man would be impossible but for its (death's) decay. Naturalists tell us that in the lower forms of animal life only two or three young out of millions reach maturity while the rest perish. Yet these lower forms of life swarm over land and sea in countless millions. Then there are the higher forms of animal life which multiply annually by the score. Where in all this rapidly accumulating, swarming, roaming, conglomerate life could man find a place did not death kindly make room? Were death abolished among the human race there would be an ever increasing multitude of the feeble minded and insane, denizens, outlaws, and brutal criminals, the afflicted of both old and young, and last of all that innumerable host of the feeble and helpless aged. But for death, humanity would become its own intolerable burden. Yes, even though it seems to cut short the career of many a young and promising life, death is a friend in disguise.

So long, then, as we are doing what we know to be right we cannot afford to grow impatient at our troubles. Christian did and he turned aside for an easier way but he multiplied them a thousand fold. That will happen to all who do it. The history of human experience confirms this truth and it should be a warning to any who are tempted. All things work together for good.

There is a jewel which no Indian mine can buy,
No chemic art can counterfeit;
It makes men rich in greatest poverty,
Makes water wine, turns wooden cups to gold,
The homely whistle to sweet music's strain;
Seldom it comes—to few from heaven sent—
That much in little—all in nought—content.
—Wilbye, "Madrigal."

Church Life

The many inquiries concerning Mrs. H. L. Willett whose illness of many months has caused great anxiety, prompt us to make mention in the news columns of her present encouraging condition. A serious operation was undergone two weeks ago which, it was hoped by the doctors, would effect a recovery. She is progressing nicely with every apparent prospect of these hopes being realized.

Next week many of our readers will receive their copy of the Christian Century at Pittsburg. It will be the Centennial number, and one that you will, we hope, take pleasure in presenting to your friends who may not now be reading the Christian Century. A suggestion from you will help to bring them into our circle of readers. The editors will enjoy meeting you and your friends at the Christian Century Booth.

The study of the character and work of Rev. Charles S. Medbury, pastor of University Place Church, Des Moines, presented to our readers this week, deals with a character worthy of the careful thought of every minister who seeks a fruitful ministry. Men of whatever type of mind they may be, acknowledge the greatness of the work of C. S. Medbury.

Letters are reaching this office daily announcing the coming of great companies of people who expect to make the trip from Chicago to Pittsburg on the "Christian Century Special." It will be a fine company of people. We hope that every one of our friends who can so arrange his trip, will join us in this happy company. The train leaves the Union station, Chicago, 8:30 a. m., Monday, October 11.

Your own preparation of heart will have much to do with your enjoyment of the Centennial convention. There will be great addresses, unexcelled fellowship, inspirational reports, and soul stirring visions. But what each one gets of permanent value will depend upon what he goes to get. It will be a great day to study the present life of the Disciples, and to more clearly see the possibilities of the movement, a great day for mountain-top visions, and determined resolutions.

The church is further handicapped by a very inadequate and unattractive building, and a duality of leadership. Topeka, Kansas, is putting forth effort to gain the International convention for 1910. The capitol of the "Sun Flower State" has many points of advantage to urge upon the brotherhood; she is centrally located, has the advantages of the great trunk lines of railway, and has a convention hall that will seat 5,000, which is within a few steps of the assembly rooms of the leading churches, which are at the service of the convention.

Gary Cook inaugurated his work as state superintendent of Bible-schools in Indiana by visiting the Sunday-school of the Third Church, Indianapolis where H. G. Hill ministers. The Third Church is building a new house of worship with quarters to house a Sunday-school of 1500.

CHILDREN SHOWED IT

Effect of Their Warm Drink in the Morning.

"A year ago I was a wreck from coffee drinking and was on the point of giving up my position in the school room because of nervousness.

"I was telling a friend about it and she said, 'We drink nothing at meal time but Postum, and it is such a comfort to have something we can enjoy drinking with the children.'

"I was astonished that she would allow the children to drink any kind of coffee, but she said Postum was the most healthful drink in the world for children as well as for older ones, and that the condition of both the children and adults showed that to be a fact.

"My first trial was a failure. The cook boiled it four or five times and it tasted so flat that I was in despair but determined to give it one more trial. This time we followed the directions and boiled it fifteen minutes after the boiling began. It was a decided success and I was completely won by its rich delicious flavor. In a short time I noticed a decided improvement in my condition and kept growing better and better month after month, until now I am perfectly healthy, and do my work in the school room with ease and pleasure. I would not return to the nerve-destroying regular coffee for any money."

Read the famous little "Health Classic." "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Orders solicited and promptly filled. Address W. L. Hayden, 14 North Bolton avenue, Indianapolis, Ind.

From the report of Pastor E. B. Babgy to the First Church, Fort Smith, Arkansas, we take the following items: "The pastor's report for his first year was as follows: Additions 73, weddings 14, funerals 15, calls 1,109, money raised $5,970, for missions $5.10. This does not include the amount raised by the Bible-school and other church organizations. Let all help to make next year far better."

At Dallas, Texas, there were twenty-four additions at regular services, September 5; six the 12th; four the 19th, and three the 26th; making a total of thirty-six for the month. It has been a great year in the Central Church; hardly ever have a Sunday without confessions. The missionary collections have been the greatest in the history of the churches, besides they have made 3,000 repairs on the church building. J. O. Shelburne is pastor.

At Moberly, Missouri, "Declaration Day" was enthusiastically observed. There was an attendance of 1,060 in the Bible-school. This, the Central Church, is planning to erect a Sunday-school building which will enable them to care for two thousand or more pupils. The outlook for the church is very bright. The pastor, S. Boyd White has been given a unanimous call to remain with the church indefinitely. There will be ten or twelve delegates from Moberly to the Centennial Convention.

The Sterling Place Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., has called M. M. Ammunson as pastor, and he began his work with this church the 19th of September. Mr. Ammunson is a graduate of Yale University, and formerly held a successful pastorate in St. Thomas, Antario. The Sterling place church offers great opportunities for up-to-date and aggressive work, and it was on this account that Mr. Ammunson decided to accept their call rather than one extended him by his former church at St. Thomas,

The following words from a letter written us by a good faithful preacher tells the story of many a heart that should be remembered by their more fortunate brethren who may attend the Centennial Convention:

"As the time draws near for the Pittsburg meeting I find it more improbable that I will be able to be present in person, though I will be there in spirit and good wishes for its success. I have not been well for the last year. I have not been wholly laid off, but just able to do whatto me is light work. I preach nearly every Sunday and get along very well. I write to thank you for the Christian Century which comes to me every week. I read it with great interest and satisfaction."

The announcement made by C. A. MacDonald, recently of McKees Rocks, regarding his work as Bible School Evangelist, indicates that Mr. MacDonald is entering a field so far unoccupied, and yet one of the greatest promise. His work will not be that of the man who comes with a set speech and a few pat jokes, and goes his way leaving the school about as it was before; but he will on the other hand come with a vision of the possibilities and needs of the school, and by a week or two of solid work from platform and in the homes, Mr. and Mrs. MacDonald will give to the school a larger vision of its work and an inspiration for a higher type of teaching in the church. This is the work that will in the end prove of greatest value to the church. We hope that Mr. and Mrs. MacDonald may be kept busy by our best churches.

The First Church, San Angelo, Texas, is enjoying successful work under the pastoral direction of F. F. Wyatt. In a little less than twenty months they have received into the church 120 persons, and lost 25, leaving a net gain of 95. They have raised for home and district work $3,808.00, for additional ground to build on $2,300.00, for the new church edifice $15,000.00, and for missions, benevolence and education at least $1,000.00, making a total of $22,108.00. This does not include the work done and the money given by the Sunday-school, Ladies' Aid Society or C. W. B. M. Auxiliary. The Aid Society and the Auxiliary have something like forty-five members each, and they give systematically and regularly. The Sunday-school has an average attendance of about 110, and its Sunday offerings average about $5.50. One offering each month goes to the orphanages and the fifth Sunday offerings are sent to Home Missions. They are paying the indebtedness on a building owned by a sister church in a nearby town.

Centennial Bulletin

By John A. Jayne

This is the last bulletin of the Publicity Committee setting forth the attractions and the many interests that center in our great Centennial Convention. For many long months the work of preparation for the Centennial has been moving steadily forward. For months Brother Warren wrote these centennial bulletins that aroused the attention and attracted the admiration of all who read them. When Brother Warren's work became so heavy in other directions, he turned the work over to the present writer, who has found the work a most pleasant and congenial one.

It has been one of the characteristics of the Centennial Committee to smile, be patient and gentle and kind even in the midst of circumstances that have been harsh, grinding and wearisome. There have been times when the nerves have been on edge, the mind excited and the heart aroused, but through all of these trying scenes there has been exemplified to a marked degree the beautiful words of the 133rd Psalm. "Behold how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

And now the work of the Publicity Committee is drawing to its close. The last words are being spoken, the last paragraphs written and by the time this reaches the eye of the reader, hundreds will be on their way to Pittsburg, the convention city, the Virgin soil of America's greatest restoration movement.

But ere the work of the publicity department is closed there are some last things that should be repeated and re-emphasized.

Register for the Program.

Again let it be said that if you desire a program of the convention it will be to your advantage to register at once for the same. The advance copies of the program show that it is a veritable work of art. It is splendidly bound in the finest of morocco, has extra heavy gilded edges and is a supreme triumph of the printer's skill. The contents are varied and interesting. There is a superb introduction by Brother Garrison of St. Louis on the origin of the Restoration Movement. Brother A. McLean contributes one of his most notable monographs on The Pioneers of the Restoration. Col. Samuel Harden Church gives in his own inimitable and illustrative way the story of Pittsburg, its rise and progress from a mere trading station and fort to its present proud position as the greatest industrial center of the world. In addition to all this there is a full and complete program of what promises to be the world's largest religious gathering of modern times. To this is appended all of the music of the convention, fifty pages in number, selected and arranged by that prince of convention music framers, O. H. Philips. There have been but 20,000 of these programs printed. The advance registration for them is something remarkable. It will be the act of wisdom for you to send iy nour Centennial dollar which secures for you this program and also centennial souvenir badge and gives you a personal and individual interest in the world-wide proclamation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Please Register for Your Rooms.

Please register for your rooms at once. We expect to have 30,000 rooms listed at the centennial headquarters, 626 Liberty avenue, when you shall arrive in the Centennial city. Requests for assignment of rooms are pouring in by the hundreds with every mail. Assignments are being made in order of their receipt. Those who made first application will, of course, have their rooms assigned them nearest the convention halls. The entertainment committee headed by Fred M. Gordon, waited until October 1, before sending out any assignment cards; for this reason, the committee wanted to have as full and a complete list of homes as possible before making assignments. The people who registered in July will naturally be assigned nearest the convention halls and so on until all assignments have been made. The registration is absolutely free of cost and by your sending in your name you are guaranteed a good room and save for yourself the hurry and confusion of arriving in a strange city, with thousands of others, who, like you, are tired, worn, and eager for a place that they may call home. Therefore, it is to your decided advantage to register for rooms at once.

Special warning. Take Notice!

The entertainment committee have gone to much trouble and considerable expense to find rooms for delegates in respectable and reputable homes. But in this city, as in every large city, there is a class of people who take advantage of numbers and strangers unfamiliar with the city, to rent rooms at exhorbitant prices. The entertainment committee gives fair warning that it cannot in any way be responsible to delegates, in the city, for the kind of accommodations they receive or the price they pay, who fail to register either in advance or upon their arrival. The committee will have plenty of good rooms at moderate prices, though the 50c rooms are nearly all taken and every delegate should see to it that, being forewarned, he is forearmed and saved from robbery and extortion.

When You Get Into the City.

When your train arrives in Pittsburg you will find at the various stations, the Union Depot, the B. & O., the Erie, and the Wabash, information booths erected, guides in attendance who will direct you to Centennial headquarters from which place you will be guided to the sub-stations, from whence you will be taken directly to your room. If you follow these suggestions implicitly, you will have no trouble in finding your home during the convention period. If at any time, while you are in the city, you want information, consult a policeman or some one who wears a red button with the words "I Live Here, Ask Me" upon it. It is also probable that the Pittsburg Leader will have information booths scattered in various parts of the city where you may ask any questions you please and be assured of a polite, intelligent and satisfactory answer.

The Newspapers.

The newspapers of the city will give very complete and very satisfactory, but necessarily curtailed, reports of the convention. It is but just to the newspapers of Pittsburg to say that from the first beginning of the convention idea down to the present they have been uniformly courteous and have given liberal space to all the interests of the convention. As a further token of their consideration, they have made special rates for the ten days of the convention to subscribers who may desire to have the papers sent to their own homes or to their friends. The morning papers, the Gazette Times, (rep.), Dispatch (rep.), or the Post (dem.), all morning papers with Sunday editions will be mailed for the entire term for 15c. The evening papers, the Chronicle Telegraph (rep.), Leader (ind. rep.), Press (ind.) or Sun (dem.), will be sent for 10c. The Leader and Press have Sunday editions which are included at the price 10c. If you will send the mailing price of any one of these papers to the publicity man he will see that the paper of your choice is mailed to you.

Stenographic Reports.

As it will be impossible because of the tremendous volume of the convention, meeting in at least five halls and the larger number of speakers for the newspapers to give complete reports of the convention, arrangements have been made whereby a complete stenographic report of every word spoken and every prayer offered will be taken. The reason for this is three-fold. First, for the accommodation of those who cannot attend the convention. Second, for those who attending the convention are unable because of its vastness to attend each and every session. Third, to preserve in an accurate, convenient and systematic manner the records for historical purposes. This stenographic report when completed will be bound in an attractive form, beautifully illustrated and clearly printed. It will be sold to advance subscribers for $1.00 per copy. To those who subscribe within 30 days after the convention, the price will be $1.25. After that time it will be sold for $1.50. You will help the committee having that work in charge by subscribing now. A certificate of the subscription will be issued and when completed the book will be sent prepaid. Send your orders to The Centennial Committee, Pittsburg.

Convention Pointers.

The exhibits of the convention will be many, rare and exceedingly diversified. All of our missionary societies, publishing houses and colleges will make the greatest display they have ever made. Large space has been assigned to these in Carnegie Institute.

On Thursday afternoon of the convention, there will be tendered a reception to the old students of the Old Pleasant Hill Seminary at the beautiful residence of Mrs. Cadwalladar Evans on South Negley avenue. To this reception all former students of the Seminary are invited together with daughters and friends of the students.

Pray for its workers, its speakers, its stenographers, its singers, for all who in any way have anything to do with it.

Pray God that this convention which celebrates the closing of our first century and the opening of the second, shall be a convention, not simply great in numerical strength, but also mighty in spiritual power.

Pray God that as we stand in the blushing dawn of our second century that we may stand at the beginning of the era when the prayer of the Christ, "that they may all be one" shall be answered and that it shall be the ushering in of the glad time "when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea."

Chicago

THE TEMPERANCE PARADE

wags, of course, who made flippant remarks about various things. Even these, however, were more restrained in their jokes than last year. When the police halted the procession at The Fair, to let a beer wagon through, they had much merriment. It cannot be doubted, however, that the average Chicagoan was amazed at the strength of the movement. He does not realize that a third of Chicago is prohibition territory. He has always supposed the temperance movement a joke. There can be no doubt of the salutary effect of this demonstration upon the politicians. There is no reason to question that the homely advice given on many a sign will bear fruitage in better living in many cases.

The song of the parade was "Chicago is Going Dry." Is there any ground to hope for any such achievement? At first, one is forced into despair. The Protestant churches of the city are in such a hopeless minority. The most they can hope for politically for a generation is to be a balance of power. In the parade there was but a handful from the six hundred thousand Germans. There was no representation from the two hundred thousand Poles. If the Scandinavians were well represented, they were the only foreign people of Chicago who displayed any considerable interest in the movement. We can see how many of the new suburbs will insist upon being admitted to the city as dry territory, but could the whole city ever be cleaned up?

There are certain elements of hope in our city. The greatest is the new interest of the Catholic church. Their holdings are so much greater in Chicago than that of the Protestants that their recent parade and pronouncement is of tremendous importance to the movement. Another element of hope is the attitude of the press. Some of the best papers of the city have taken to printing much temperance news and the leading daily of the city has promised its support to the Anti-Saloon League. The politicians of the city are beginning to see, since the odium of the McCann trial, that to be linked up with the saloon crowd is to be branded as associating with the worst elements of the community. Things are happening so fast in our city that we must not despair of any great reform. The darkest hour is before the dawning and if the cup of iniquity is full for the saloon, it is but to encourage us to believe that the wrath of God is to be visited upon it shortly.

In California

A Hopeful Outlook on the Coast

By B. B. Tyler

The last summer was spent in California. I had three full weeks of absolute rest in Los Angeles. We, Mrs. Tyler and I, are indebted, incalculably, to Brother J. P. McKnight, of the Magnolia Avenue Church, for an almost ideal home—the St. James hotel. Brother McKnight secured a room in this homelike hotel for us, in anticipation of our arrival. I left home July 1, having the appearance of a broken down old man. The last day of August I returned to Denver thoroughly rested and in perfect health. The summer climate and pleasant associations of southern California did it!

After this season of rest and recuperation we attended the Northern California Convention of Disciples of Christ at Santa Clara. The Disciples own Garfield Park, in the midst of which is an auditorium with a seating capacity of from 1800 to 2000. Cottages are grouped about this auditorium. For a mid-summer outing this place is all that one could desire. Extending through two weeks was a carefully arranged program representing all the general interests of the church. The Centennial was constantly in evidence. The addresses were of unusually high order, both as to thought and diction. Edification and inspiration attended their delivery. California Disciples have big hearts and enjoy large visions. They attempt great things. They talk in a large way—nor is it all talk, things come to pass.

The Berkeley Seminary has made a new departure. The curriculum is original. It is arranged for the Pacific Coast. Conditions here are peculiar. Japanese and Chinese are much in evidence. Two men, brethren Eny and Bentley, who have spent each a dozen or fifteen years in Japan and China, are members of the faculty. H. H. Guy is Dean of the Seminary. It is the purpose of the brethren to train Japanese and Chinese to do Christian work among their people in the United States and in the lands of their nativity. I think I saw the statement that twenty-eight Japanese have enrolled as students in this school of the Prophets.

Every man on the faculty is said to be a specialist in his department. H. O. Breeden will deliver lectures and conduct conferences on evangelism. I. N. McCash will give instruction in the pastoral office and work. For information concerning this unique and up-to-date institution, address President H. D. McAneney, 2213 Dwight Way, Berkeley, Cal. Dr. McAneney appears to me to be the man for the office which he fills.

San Francisco is the most wonderful city on earth! Three short years ago it was a heap of ruins. Today it has a larger population than it had previous to the great fire. More than 84,000 voters recently registered. This indicates a population of not less than 400,000. A few evidences of the destructive fire remain—only a few. The buildings are larger, stronger, and of better appearance, than before the earthquake and fire of 1906.

The Southern California Convention met in Long Beach, August 11 to 22. This was a great assembly. About 3,000 persons registered. The meetings were held in the auditorium which has a seating capacity of 6,000. This building belongs to the municipality, and is given free to all sorts of conventions. There is no charge even for lights and janitors' services. Long Beach is, of course, "a dry town." The Virginia hotel is a hostelry that would be an honor to any city. In this convention there was also a series of splendid Centennial addresses. I am almost persuaded, after the experiences of last summer, that I know something about the Disciples—their purpose, their program, and their achievements! I believe that if I were urged to do so I could now deliver an address on, "Why I Am a Disciple"! The brethren in southern California claim to stand at the head of our brotherhood in their per capita contributions to missions—domestic and foreign. It is claimed that, on an average, their annual gifts to world evangelism amount to $2.20 for each member of the church. What would be the aggregate missionary contribution of the Disciples of Christ in the United States? Southern California, especially Long Beach, is the most religious place I ever visited. Neither Rome, Jerusalem, nor Constantinople, are to be named as rivals! The Spiritualists were in session from August 1 to 15, four meetings a day. The Disciples were in session from August 11 to 22, three meetings a day. The Methodists dedicated a fine church with 2,500 sittings and were in the midst of a revival when I left and Beach. Meantime the Salvationists were in evidence, warning and persuading sinners to flee the divine wrath impending. There is not space to speak of Mormons, Christian Scientists, Divine Scientists, Theosophists, and others. Enough has been said to sustain my contention.

The ministers' meeting, Disciple ministers, in Los Angeles, the first Monday in each month, at the First Church, A. C. Smither, pastor, is quite equal to an average state convention. There are eighteen or twenty congregations of the Christian Church in Los Angeles. The southern part of the state is included in this meeting. The expenses are shared in common. It costs those who live in Los Angeles as much to attend this meeting as it costs the brethren living at a distance. This is an all day meeting. The ladies of the Mother Church serve refreshments at noon. The hospitality is royal. The good fellowship cannot be excelled.

The Centennial addresses delivered at the Long Beach convention had been read and discussed in this ministers' meeting during the year. It is probable that they will be given to the public in book form. They are worthy of this consideration.

Californians are men and women of faith. They believe in themselves. They believe in their church. They believe in their climate. They believe in California. They speak out. Their convictions are spoken boldly, in season, out of season. In other parts of the world comparative degrees of speech are employed. Not so in California! The superlative alone is employed by Californians when speaking of anything pertaining to California. Almost thou persuadest me.

As We Go To Press.

Kansas City, Mo., September 30.—Books closed with three-fourths of a million in the church Extension Fund, and a gain of $20,000 over last year.—George W. Muckley.

Wapello, Iowa, October 3.—Closed last Tuesday night. Truly great meeting at Altoona. Spent blessed hour in sweet communion and fellowship with Brother Medbury and brethren University Church, Wednesday night; mingled with students of our great institution Drake Thursday. Started here today. Organize adult Bible class with forty members. House packed. Brother Hill has things in good shape. E. W. Ford and wife boosting the music. My, what a great family we are getting to be. Pittsburg fifty thousand strong. Well, well, brethren let us sing Blest be the Tie that Binds.—Thompson the Egyptian.

Kansas City, Mo., October 4. Great day to day, thirty-three confessions, 177 to date. Brother Donaldson and his noble band sold their little church and cut loose for a location a mile away. We are therefore in strange and at first unwelcome, unknown territory. Spite such a hindrance to a ready harvest our audiences in our big tabernacle have been very large and our converts mainly new families. Knowing that our main purpose is to erect a fine large working church, every convert we make comes on intelligent acceptance of our plea. We dig dirt this week. It will be a great monument to Donalson. Vancamp doing fine work.—Herbert Yeull.

A Unique Dedication

By A. F. Hensey.

Among the great events to come to pass at Pittsburg there is one which stands unique and alone. This is the dedication of the Congo steamer of the Foreign Society. All those who have heard of the splendid generosity of our Oregon brethren will rejoice that the steamer which is to bear the name of that fair state is nearing completion, and will be set apart to its evangelistic mission during the coming National Convention. And now in loving gratitude Dr. Dye and Ray Eldred and all your Congo missionaries, in the name of the native churches at Bolenge and Longa, and for the sake of the sacred work to which it is devoted, give you a cordial invitation to be present at this dedication. It will be on Wednesday afternoon, October 13, at 5:30, and will take place at the mammoth shipyards of James Reese Sons and Company, Fourth and Duquesne. Any one in Pittsburg will tell you the proper cars to take to get there.

Perhaps never again will there come just this same privilege which you of the Centennial Hosts will have, of helping to consecrate to its work a steamer devoted to such a mighty task on the mighty Congo—the task of giving to the Forest Children of Congoland the precious Word of our God. And how wonderfully He has already wrought in that land, among those people! And who is far-seeing enough to tell what shall be accomplished in His name when every hamlet hidden away in the districts as yet untrodden by the foot of the white man shall hear the wooing story of the Cross? And when the day which is now but in the gray dawning shall burst in noon-tide glory, and the hundreds who now wear His name shall become the thousands, then all will love to

WHEN DINNER COMES

One Ought to Have a Good Appetite.

A good appettie is the best sauce. It goes a long way toward helping in the digestive process, and that is absolutely essential to health and strength.

Many persons have found that Grape-Nuts food is not only nourishing but is a great appetizer. Even children like the taste of it and grow strong and rosy from its use.

It is especially the food to make a weak stomach strong and create an appetite for dinner.

"I am 57 years old," writes a Tenn. grandmother, "and have had a weak stomach from childhood. By great care as to my diet I enoyed a reasonable degree of health, but never found anything to equal Grape-Nuts as a standby.

"When I have no appetite for breakfast and just eat to keep up my strength, I take four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with good rich milk, and when dinner comes I am hungry. While if I go without any breakfast I never feel like eating dinner. Grape-Nuts for breakfast seems to make a healthy appetite for dinner.

"My little 13-months-old grandson had been very sick with stomach trouble during the past summer, and2 finally we put him on Grape-Nuts. Now he is growing fat and well. When asked if he wants his nurse or Grape-Nuts, he brightens up and points to the cupboard. He was no trouble to wean at all —thanks to Grape-Nuts." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

cherish the memory of that day in Pittsbury when we in figure laid our hands in prayerful benediction on the prow of the "Oregon," and bade her "God speed!"

Because this steamer has been made possible by the united gifts of thousands, it is fitting that amid the multitudes she be set apart to her task of winning Congoland. Your missionaries have reason to hope that not less than 30,000 disciples will be present on Wednesday afternoon. Remember the time: Wednesday, October 13, at 5:30 p. m. And the place: The Shipyards of James Reese Sons & Company, at Fourth and Duquesne. PLAN TO BE THERE!

A Message to Christian College Alumnae

Mrs. Luella W. St. Clair.

Will all Alumnae and former students of Christian College who expect to attend the Pittsburg Convention please notify me of their intention and also, if possible, of their Convention address?

A number of Christian College women have expressed a desire to have a reunion during the Convention, and it is hoped at this time to make plans for the Jubilee Reunion to be held in 1911, in celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of the founding of Christian College. Trusting that we may be able to arrange for a Christian College banquet during the Convention, all alumnae and former students are asked to write immediately to

Wisconsin Convention

By J. H. Bullock.

The annual convention of the Disciples of Christ in Wisconsin was held at Richland Center, September 16-19. The convention sermon was given by Claire L. Waite, First Church of Milwaukee. He spoke on the theme "Some Leading Features of Our Movement in Its Early Days." It portrayed many of the conditions existing 100 years ago and showed the great difficulties which confronted the Campbells.

The business sessions of the convention were full of interest and the reports from officers and churches indicated progress during the year. The Second Church of Milwaukee presented the best report. This church was organized by a faithful band of workers from the First Church and is now situated in a splendid location, the lot being purchased this sumer for $4,000. They have recently called Eugene N. Duty for their pastor and he began work Sunday, September 19.

The state organization of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions reported the aim for its special centennial work not only reached but increased three-fold. Wisconsin is proud of this record. Mrs. Effie Cunningham of Indianapolis, Ind., addressed the convention on "The Missionary Farmer and His Farm."

The Bible School session occupied a prominent place on the program. Addresses were given by Mrs. J. P. Wright, Readstown; Mrs. L. A. Kenyon, Milwaukee; Claire L. Waite, Milwaukee, and V. A. Lewis, Readstown. Marion Stevenson, Superintendent of the National Christian Bible School Association, gave two addresses in the interest of Teacher Training and organized Adult Bible classes.

The closing day of the convention was one long to be remembered. W. J. Wright, of the American Christian Missionary Society, spoke in the morning and in his inimitable manner presented the cause of Home and State Missions, holding before the convention ideals for the future success of our state work. In the afternoon following the memorial service and the communion, E. W. Allen, the newly appointed secretary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society made a plea in behalf of state missions and succeeded in raising in cash and pledges over $1,000. The work of the Benevolent Association was presented by Marion Stevenson. In the evening E. W. Allen spoke in behalf of Foreign Missions.

For the ensuing year the following officers were elected: President, J. C. Thurman, Green Bay; vice president, Claire L. Waite, Milwaukee; recording secretary, J. H. Fisher, Evansville, R. F. D.; treasurer, R. A. Nourse, Milwaukee; corresponding secretary and State Bible School Superintendent, J. Harry Bullock, Footville.

The convention goes to the Union Church at Waupun next year.

A Great Year

The missionary year now closed has been by far the greatest in the history of the Foreign Society. More important and far-reaching and definite things have been attained than in any former year.

1. As was announced last week, the funds have been secured for the two colleges, one at Vigan, Philippine Islands, and one at Bolenge, Africa. We already have colleges in Japan, China and India. To provide five colleges like these in a period of ten years is no small accomplishment, thanks to a far-seeing and generous brotherhood.

2. The Congo Boat.—A mission steamer on the Upper Congo is an absolute necessity to the work. The "S.S. Henry Reed" of the Baptist missions, has been floating in these waters for a number of years. Dr. Dye lifted up his voice for a new boat in faith. The brethren in Oregon heard that cry and responded. In consequence, the steamer will be called "The Oregon." We are greatly indebted to George C. Ritchey, Newburg, Oregon, and to all who have in any way helped in this magnificent enterprise. It will be a durable boat and will be a great blessing to that region of "broken gloom."

3. Wharton Memorial Home.—A home to provide for the education of the children of the missionaries. Through the enterprise of the management of Hiram College, and the efforts of F. W. Norton, and the generosity of friends, the home now exists and will be formally opened October 1. This will give joy to the missionaries. This subject was first mentioned in the meeting of the Board of Managers of the Foreign Society in San Francisco in 1905.

4. New Missionaries.—The following new missionaries is the record of the past year: Miss Edna Eck, Bolenge, Africa; R. S. Wilson and wife, Bolenge, Africa; Miss Edith Parker, Tokyo, Japan; Miss Muriel Molland, Nankin, China; Dr. M. E. Poland and wife, Nantungchow, China; W. B. Alexander and wife, Harda, India; J. C. Archer and wife, Jubbulpore, India; H. A. Eicher, Bilaspur, India; E. R. Moon and wife, Bolenge, Africa; Herbert Smith and wife, Bolenge, Africa; Miss Sylvia Siegfried, Vigan, P. I.; Miss Kate G. Miller, Wuhu, China; Dr. W. N. Lemmon, Laoag, P. I.

The receipts have touched high-water mark. There has been a gain every month of the year. The total receipts to September 15 amounted to $317,741, a gain of $79,253. We are now expecting a total gain of about $80,000.

Expressions of deep and growing interest come from every quarter. It has been truly a great year.

to our State Organization. At their first convention, last spring, they took action to affiliate with the General Association, with headquarters at Indianapolis, Indiana. This company of Christian women from across the western seas will be represented at Pittsburg. Our Woman's Missionary Societies in Mexico, Jamaica, India and Porto Rico will be represented by our missionaries. The National Board Meeting will begin 10 a. m., Monday, October 11, in the First Congregational Church, Dithridge street, near Forbes, in front of Carnegie Institute. Tuesday three parallel programs will be carried and each will have three sessions—morning, afternoon and evening.

October 12, 1909, is to be truly a world's convention. All our Woman's Missionary Societies in all lands will hold their October meetings that same day. These parallel meetings were announced a year ago and many have been making definite plans for them. Some states have asked that all the Auxiliaries and Circles in the state shall meet at the same hour, 2:30 in the afternoon. While it is true many societies will have a number of their leaders in Pittsburg, by careful preparation and the enlisting of new helpers, enough will be left to make these home sections of the Centennial Convention great inspirers of purpose for the future.

Each society will pattern its program after the one to be given at Pittsburg. The Twentieth Chapter of Matthew is suggested for the Bible Lesson, as this was the message read at the Birthday service, October 22, 1874. "I love thy Church, O God," was a favorite song, used oft at these first meetings in Cincinnati. October 12, 1909, let us sing it the world around in all of our Auxiliaries.

Reports to date indicate all the states will receive Centennial recognition, either for the doubled membership or offerings, or both. We feel confident at least two-thirds of them will secure the doubled membership. This hour, when the Centennial Medals are awarded to the states, will be one of the interesting features of Tuesday's program. The Medal is double faced, one side bearing an open Bible, the other the head of Thomas Campbell.

The Wednesday morning conference will have the added feature of a breakfast banquet in charge of Miss Mary Alice Lyons of Ohio. These morning conferences are to be held before the general program of the day.

The literature booth will have a number of attractive features, some fine new leaflets just from the press, our new book, Helen E. Moses of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and others which all will wish to see.

The presentation of missionary and pioneer workers will be a foretaste of the gathering of the hosts, not only when the Centennial tasks, but the whole of the world's work shall have been finished.

A Progressive Religious Weekly For Christian Homes

-- Editors --

Herbert L. Willett,

Thoroughly Up-to-Date The Christian Century is a progressive religious paper. It is abreast of the times. It stands for those growing ideals which are fast taking possession of the minds of modern men and women. It is not alarmed at scholarship. It believes in education. It gives a vision of things as they are to be. It places the reader in touch with those great lives the country over which are being spent for the welfare of humanity. It strives to develop in its readers the open mind, a broad outlook and the habit and passion of service.

Devoted to Christian Union Thoroughly up-to-date, The Christian Century is no free lance. It rides no hobby. It loves free discussion but hates the contraversial spirit. Its Editors devoutly believe in the plea for the unity of all Christians proclaimed by Thomas and Alexander Campbell and by the Disciples of Christ for almost a century. The Fathers were the most progressive thinkers of their time. Were they living today they would be leading the procession of religious and social progress.

The Staff of Contributors The Editors are re-inforced by a staff of the best equipped and most brilliant writers among the Disciples. Our pages are full of rich and interesting writing.

George A. Campbell conducts a page entitled "Views of Life" that has been styled by hundreds of our readers as the finest piece of literature produced among the Disciples today.

Errett Gates conducts a page on Christian Union. Dr. Gates is a specialist in this field and writes with authority.

Alva W. Taylor interprets the Trend of the World's Events with illuminating insight.

Professor Silas Jones writes the most helpful prayer-meeting message that appears in current literature.

Professor H. L. Willett conducts a page of Biblical Problems, answering all sorts of questions on the Bible, and presenting an exposition of the Book of Acts (the Sunday-school lesson) which is itself worth the price of the paper.

W. D. Endres conducts a Christian Endeavor meeting each week.

Orvis F. Jordan keeps our readers in touch with Chicago, that mysterious, fascinating and strategic field of Christian work.

John R. Ewers conducts a department in which are presented ideals and practical methods of work for Our Church Men.

An Inspiration in the Home The whole round of life is ours. The Christian Century is an assistant pastor in every home into which it goes. Pastors will find the readers of our paper among the most useful and intelligent workers they have. Its pages are adapted to every member of the family. The department especially for children is conducted by Richard W. Gentry. Our splendid news service is edited by Harry F. Burns. Continued stories of the highest grade are running almost constantly.

We wish you to belong to the Christian Century family.

A Christian Preacher Made $50,000 With a Lead-Pencil in Nine Months

A royalty contract between author and publisher, for "a story of South Missouri," was signed in April, 1908. Between that date, and the delivery of the manuscript, February, 1909, "The Calling of Dan Matthews" was written. In May, 1909, the publishers tendered Harold Bell Wright, in lieu of his royalty contract, a cash offer of Fifty Thousand Dollars ($50,000), which he unhesitatingly declined.

Imperial Valley Press: "From the publisher's point of view, 'Dan Matthews' is a tremendous success. The first edition of 100,000 copies seems likely to be exhausted before the holiday season, and another edition of the same number will go to press in October. One of the largest book stores in Los Angeles sold out its first lot of 500 copies in one week and could not fill promptly the orders that poured in. The indications are that the sale will vindicate Wright's judgment in declining an offer of $50,000 cash for the copyright."

"What Is the Matter With the Churches?"

Duluth News-Tribune: "The well known periodical which has just published a symposium on the subject, 'What is the Matter with the Churches?' might have been spared the trouble of collecting the opinions of prominent clergymen of the various denominations and simply referred their readers to Harold Bell Wright's latest novel, 'The Calling of Dan Matthews.' Mr. Wright has certainly answered the question more successfully than any of the numerous authorities who are discussing it at this time."

Reflections from the Press

"Striking, suggestive and true to life."—Milwaukee Free Press.

"Unquestionably the author knows the life with which he deals."—Chicago Evening Post.

"It is a picture that has been seen time and again."—Philadelphia North American.

"Its portrayal of character carries with it the assurance of truth."—Buffalo Evening News.

"There is an uncomfortably large kernel of truth in it."—Duluth Evening Herald.

"We close the book feeling that its stiff indictment of the average church is essentially sound."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"The story is sufficiently barbed with truth to pierce the heart of a serious matter of this day and age."—Omaha World-Herald.

"Everywhere serious men are asking, that the church justify itself by service."—Los Angeles Graphic.

"It deals with that part of life's drama most vital to every person."—Portland Spectator.

"A skillfully mapped battlefield of human souls."—Chicago Examiner.

"A Corner in Life Seen Through a Temperament"

"It complies with Zola's definition of a novel: 'A corner in life seen through a temperament.' This corner happens to be typical of the four corners of the United States, and the temperament through which we see it gives an honest reflection. If Harold Bell Wright continues in the path he is following he may wake up some morning and find he has written the great American novel for which the publishers and critics have been waiting these many moons."—Duluth News-Tribune.

"It does human nature vast good to read a novel of this sort; it brings clear views of real humanity and its needs and defects, and it opens up long and wondrous vistas of those paths, now charming, now rugged and deep with gloom, that all men, moving forward some high and needed reform, must travel, whether they will or no."—Pittsburgh Press.

Causes Stir Among the Ministers

"Harold Bell Wright's latest book, 'The Calling of Dan Matthews,' is not only having a great sale, but is stirring up much serious discussion inside and outside the church. Indurated theologians are whacking it with dogmatic clubs, ministers who do some of their own thinking are inclined to sympathize with Dan, the young preacher, who looked for human helpfulness in the church and found it a mere shell of convention, and those that are outside the lines and care nothing for theology, while believing in the ethics of Christianity, are confirmed in their view of the uselessness of so-called 'church work' by the keen analytical criticisms of one who has seen it all from the inside. * * * A Redlands (Cal.) preacher reviewed 'Dan Matthews' in his sermon last Sunday. He tried to understand it, but he missed its larger meaning and mistook incidental criticism of details for the main point."—Imperial Valley Press.

"It is always a delicate matter to undertake to deal with the frailties and defects inherent in the Christian church organization as it exists, but Harold Bell Wright has contrived to lay bare disagreeable truths with such kindly candor in a novel, 'The Calling of Dan Matthews,' that the most bigoted, reading the simple but forceful story, should be moved to self-examination rather than impatience and resentment."—San Francisco Chronicle.

Mechanics of Church Conventions

"The mechanics of church conventions, the domination of dollars, the politics of church organizations—all these are seen as with a glass, but not darkly, in this story. The wealthy church nabobs will not read this book, the ministry will denominate it a 'scurrilous attack,' the arraigned officials would not recognize their own pictures when they see them, but the great body of people will 'hear gladly' and rejoice in this recording of truths many are afraid to admit or too saturated with current methods to perceive."—Los Angeles Express.

The Christian Century and the Centennial

An Editorial Foreword

THE host of Disciples that gathers in Pittsburg for the celebration of the Centennial of our history will represent every variety of sentiment regarding a movement which passes its first great milestone this year. There will be those who lack only a few years of being as old as our reformation itself, and who know its history from the beginning. There will be those who have just entered the church and who are almost totally unacquainted with the significance of this enterprise. And between the two there will be every shade of awareness and concern regarding the things most commonly believed among us.

It seems an appropriate moment to record our own convictions as to the significance of this movement and the present celebration. The Christian Century holds very definite views regarding its meaning, and has had frequent occasion to register its own hopes and anxieties regarding the progress of the Disciples. It is perhaps worth while to set down these convictions in brief at this time.

The Disciples of Christ came into being as a people called of God, we believe, for the accomplishment of one definite and impressive piece of work. In so far as they have kept that call and that motive before them, they have been successfully true to the purpose for which they were chosen. In so far as they have forgotten that ideal, they have been and must ever be recreant to the trust reposed in them. With varied degrees of fidelity at different times and in different places they have discharged this important function.

That purpose was the union of Christendom upon the only foundation which offers a satisfactory basis for a united church. It was the broken and distressed condition of both European and American Christianity which alarmed and disheartened those men of God whom we honor in this Centennial year. To them nothing seemed so important as the removal of the barriers that separated the churches one from another. The Disciples have not always remembered the rock from which they were hewed and the hole of the pit from whence they were digged, but those who have studied the story of this movement from its inception know that this was its guiding motive and its most outstanding ideal.

We are not worshipers of the Fathers. By genesis and disposition the Disciples came into activity too late in the generations to idolize any man or group of men. They had seen too much of the danger which comes from that blind veneration of names and personalities. There was but One whom they gave the supreme place in their thought and affection and Who, for them, bore the pre-eminent name. The Campbells, Scott and Stone with their coworkers they conceived as men raised up of God who cried out against the sins of the church and called her to repentance, and as men of God they gave them double honor.

To that position The Christian Century insists that the Disciples must remain true. We are not followers of Thomas Campbell nor of his son, else we should not have been so sensitive when provincial voices named us "Campbellites." But we believe that these early leaders of our work have yet to be rightly apprceiated and set in their true place in American church history. Even after a century we are perhaps too close to them to see them in their right perspective.

The Christian Century believes that one of the greatest dangers confronting the Disciples today is that of departure from the ideals which these men of God set before us. Their creed was simple because their purposes were great. They held with their Christian brethren of all names to the supreme truths of our Christianity.

They accepted Christ as the Lord of the conscience and the Saviour of the soul, the Interpreter of God and the authoritative Teacher of the race.

They believed that the churches around them were all committed to the central truths of the Christian faith, but by laying emphasis upon human statements and devices they had permitted themselves to harden into sects and denominations. They felt that if the essentials of Christianity could be recognized as few and simple—those, in fact, which the early church recognized,—the difficulties of the situation would vanish and the church would be drawn by the gravitation of spirits into its former unity.

They were profoundly convinced that the plan set forth in the New Testament, simple as it seems, was amply sufficient for the modern church, and therefore they lifted their voices in an earnest plea for the restoration of the earlier and simpler type of things, with insistence upon the apostolic faith, the apostolic spirit, and the apostolic service.

Nothing was less the object of their desires, in fact nothing was more repugnant to their minds, than the organization of another denomination. That would be only to add a new factor to the already complex problem. Yet they were unable to realize their ideals for the union of the churches on the grounds which first appeared to them practicable, and presently as a sheer choice between life and death the visible body of Disciples began to take form, whether they would or not.

The Christian Century believes that the Fathers made no mistake in the essential elements of their message; but it also believes that as they adjusted themselves admirably to the changing events and forces of their day, so must the people who in the providence of God have been raised up to continue their work, meet the needs of the new times as they come.

Loyalty to the Fathers is only a just and fitting recognition of their work. Without it we should be both ungrateful to them and unfaithful to ourselves. But loyalty to the Fathers does not consist in holding the particular set of opinions which they held. It consists rather in keeping faith with their ideals and following them to their appropriate embodiment in the church of our own times.

Such loyalty to the Fathers will include an insistence equal with theirs upon the divine character and supremacy of Christ. It will include loyalty to the Word of God, such loyalty as makes diligent use of every help which can throw light upon that wonderful revelation of divine purpose and activity, and then such obedience to its message as shall transform mind and heart into likeness to Christ.

It will include loyalty to the ideal of union among all God's people as the chief aim of our existence, and supreme devotion to the effort to secure such union by every means within our power.

It will include a just and generous recognition of the fidelity, enthusiasm and Christian character of all who follow our Master, and as well an honest effort so to co-operate with them as to bring in that time of peace and unity for which we ever pray.

It will include the recognition of the fact that in so far as we put emphasis upon our own churches, colleges, newspapers, missionary societies and other religious machinery and forget our relationship to the total Church of Christ and the coming of the Kingdom of God, we are not only sinking to denominational selfishness, but are the least excusable of all Christian bodies, since we have ever protested against such narrowness.

In short, The Christian Century believes that, rightly interpreted, the Centennial should be the moment from which may be started new and inspiring forces for the accomplishment of those ends to which historically, we are set. It believes that this is the high purpose of an increasing number of Disciples.

At the same time it cannot fail to perceive that if selfishly interpreted as a moment of denominational triumph, the Centennial might become only the point of departure for an increasing narrowness or sectarian zeal, of fresh devotion to the creation of a more huge and a more aggressively competing organization among the churches of Christendom, and so of ultimate decline to the low levels of that sectarian spirit against which it has been called to protest, and whose end is bigotry, failure and death.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE EXPRESS COMPANIES MASTERED

There is no more intolerable monopoly than that of the great express companies. It is proposed now that they be classed with the railroads and the same laws that apply to freight regulation be made to apply to them. They have successfully resisted all efforts in Congress, but Nebraska has cut rates 25 per cent and the courts uphold the law in every particular. A comparison with the postal service of the government shows that they pay less wages, work their men more hours, charge higher rates and make slower deliveries than the government does in its service. A Parcels Post is urgent and will doubtless be a burning issue in the near-future. When people awaken to the facts it will be quickly enacted. Every land in civilization has it but the United States. Germany carries no less than 250,000,000 packages annually and an eleven pound package costs its sender but 12c. There are 500,000,000 people in the International Parcels Post union but we alone among the progressive nations are not. Our Consuls complain that it loses us millions annually. Germany and Austria, with a combined population about equaling ours, send fifty times as many packages through the International Post as do we.

The Interstate Commerce Commission declares, "a railway is not a private enterprise—it is a public servant, discharging, as an agent of the government, a public function." Is not the express company the same?

LABOR LIMITING THE OUTPUT

We have heard much talk of overproduction in times of financial difficulty. Such accounting for the inability of the people to consume marketable products goes back to the economic half-truths Adam Smith taught that such a thing as overproduction was impossible. It would be impossible if people always had the means to buy. History has never told of a time when mankind as a whole was afflicted with overconsumption. Underconsumption is the universal malady in times of crisis.

New machinery has increased the output from 30 to 300 per cent, but it has not produced a like universal ability to consume. This could be done only by raising the standard of living and shortening the hours of labor. When labor-saving machinery increases output by one-third without increasing the number of workers, it is manifest that it must shorten hours and raise wages to a like extent or it will produce more than can be consumed and thus leave men without work and allow fewer days of work to those who are needed at the machines.

Labor tries, by the device of curtailing the output, to prevent overproduction. It is a crude and inefficient device but it manifests the desire of the workers to protect themselves and their fellows from the dangers of non-employment through overproduction. If competition is war this too is a war tactic. By industrial co-operation alone can we ever hope to arrive at a peaceful solution of such a problem, for men will fight for their own so long as they are pitted against each other by competition. When labor and capital learn that they are co-operators and adjust themselves to the laws of co-operation peace will bless them.

THE PROGRESS OF THE COLORED MAN

The colored man has made no little progress in the past forty years. He has had the advantage of the white man's tutoring, but also the disadvantage of social inferiority. His ideal position would be in a black republic with white tutors. There he would have the advantage of the white man's leading and that of dependence upon his own resources and initiative without social inferiority. But he is here to stay. We brought him here and we must help him become a useful and self-dependent citizen. The south is no more responsible for him than the north. The north was slave territory so long as it was profitable and had it been more profitable in the north than in the south to hold slaves the south would have led the fight for his freedom. It is an American responsibility. If he lived in the north by the million the north would be the land of social inequality on racial lines. It is a national problem but the south must be held most expert because of the intimacy of it to their lives and needs. The north can best do her part by a philanthropic interest—as indeed she has ever done. Intelligent whites nowhere have any objection to that sort of culture that makes the colored man a useful and moral member of society. Thus Booker T. Washington is hailed as the Moses to lead both white and black out of the bondage of industrial oppression and racial prejudice.

The colored folk have today 26,000 churches, 28,000 schools with some 32,000 learning useful trades in 170 industrial institutions and studying in colleges. They have $5,000,000,000 worth of taxable property and own 400,000 homes, 10,000 stores, and forty-one banks as well as many other forms of business. Humanity is never translated into full fledged civilization. It may become moral in a generation but economic power is a matter of progress.

THE FARMER AND HIS THREE BILLIONS

The farmer has a three billion bushel corn crop. It would require a line of freight cars reaching across the continent and back again to start it all to market. The price promises to be high. December and May deliveries are both near or above 60c in present markets The black land that makes the best corn is almost all under cultivation. The future increases of crop must come from more intensive cultivation. It is driving the black lands of the corn belt to speculative prices. In central Illinois, the land that leads in actual per acre production just now, farms sell for as high as $250 per acre and those who purchased it ten years ago at from $100 to $150, a price that then seemed high, have made a speculative profit of from 75 percent to 100 per cent. Many buy it now at $200 per acre as a speculation, believing the taking up of practically all the corn lands and the increased demand for the nutritious cereal will soon create a value of $300 per acre. The young man who has a little money and wishes a safe and profitable investment will do best by putting it in good land and if he be a wage worker and is ambitious to live a free life and insure his old age and his children an honest and modest competence he can assuredly do it by buying a farm in a new country and developing it himself.

The farmer is the richest and most independent industrial class in America. He is likewise the most useful. He is at the heart of our economic life in that he produces the raw material for our necessities. We could wipe the cities of the land from the map in a night and in a few years they would be builded again, but if we destroyed the farms of the land in a night we would perish.

But is the farmer the happiest class in the nation? He has his troubles and not the least of them is his prosperity. He is made unhappy by his plenty as all men are liable to be. Getting something but begets the desire in most men for getting something more. Avarice is a sin native to progress and all flesh is heir to it. But he has no slum, he lives in no tenement, he enjoys fresh air and pure food and a democracy of labor. The baubles of luxury taunt him and the glare of the city lights enchant his sons. He is pouring the millions into the crowds that throng the city streets and ultimately many will be pushed down into the sordid purlieus of the city's shame and this will be the price the farmers' children will pay that a few of them may dominate the world's life in commerce and industry. The pastoral simplicity seems dull to the mind of youth and the terrors of failure do not daunt him as he faces life amid the crowd. More than peace, his hegira to the city tells us, men love the cry of conflict with the elements. To dare and do inspires and the promise of great reward lures multitudes though each one knows not one in a thousand can win it.

UNION REVIVAL AND THE LOCAL CHURCH SERVICES

If there were a word of criticism to offer regarding Gipsy Smith's specific method in his Chicago meeting, or perhaps the method followed by the Laymen's Evangelistic Council, it would be to question the wisdom of their insistence upon the discontinuance of all church work on the evenings that the evangelist is conducting his services. It was their urgent request amounting almost to a command that the Sunday evening services of all the co-operating churches should be abandoned. It is their earnest hope, amounting almost to a request, that the prayer meeting services also be discontinued while the special mission is in progress. We believe this is to be a grave mistake. It may be flattering to the promoters of special services like these to have an overwhelming throng which would need thrice the available accommodations to shelter it. On the first Sunday evening of Gipsy Smith's mission there were nearly 20,000 people trying to secure admission to a hall that would hold at the most 8,000. Resort was made to street meetings, but with only moderate success. If these people could have worshipped in their own churches and gone on the other evenings to the mission, there would have been more good accomplished than by the present method. We believe that evangelists will soon see that it is not only right but good policy as well to support the local churches in their regular ministries at the time they are accustomed to worship, and then unite in solid front on every other occasion when the mission is in session. We believe that if Mr. Smith and his associates in this city were to abandon their Sunday evening meetings and perhaps also that on the Wednesday prayer meeting nights, the churches would respond with greater power on the other evenings and themselves receive a blessing which the present method does not permit.

Editorial

THE Homeric poems exhibit two strangely contrasted figures; the one is Achilles sulking in his tent because of a slight placed upon him by the commander of the army; the other is Ulysses, brave in spite of any reverses, and ever ready for a new adventure. Through long perils of the deep, through the enchantments of Circe, through the horrors of the descent to Hades, he wandered back at last to Ithaca and found rest in the home of which fate and his enemies had so nearly robbed him. His disappointments, of which there were many in his career, had never spoiled the high spirit of chivalry and resolution within him.

Most men's lives are, in great or less degree, marked by disappointments. Of their experiences the lame man in the gospel narrative might be taken as typical. Jesus found him lying in one of the porches of the healing pool. He had been there for many years. They had been years of hardship, failure and disappointment. In pathetic words he said to the inquiring Master, "Another steppeth down before me." How many human tragedies, small perhaps in their present significance, but none the less hard to bear, are described in those simple words, "Another steppeth down before me."

LIFE'S disappointments, however, are the tests of character. Their real effect depends on one's self. A weak nature broods and chafes and withers under disappointments. A strong nature rises with resolute purpose to overcome them and succeed in spite of them.

There are disappointments that come from men's over-estimate of themselves. Naaman thought it degradation for the prophet to suggest to him a journey to the muddy, rushing Jordan and a seven fold plunge into its waters. He would have preferred a more spectacular and dramatic healing. Haman thought himself too important a creature at the gates of Artaxerxes to be ignored by even one humble Jew who did not bow his head. And so both of these pround men were disappointed because they had put too high an estimate upon themselves. Such men are sure to meet many slights. The kind of pride that wears its heart upon its sleeve cannot help having its feelings rudely brushed.

Failures discourage some natures and lead to chronic discontent. That kind of brooding pessimism which regards life as sterile at the best is echoed in the two classic illustrations of the philosophers, Omar and Koheleth. The former says sadly:

> "The Worldly Hope men set their Hearts upon > Turns Ashes—or it prospers; and anon,
> Like Snow upon the Desert's dusty Face
> Lighting a little Hour or two—is gone.
> 'Tis all a chequer-board of Nights and Days,
> Where Destiny with Men for Pieces plays:
> Hither and thither moves, and mates, and slays,
> And one by one back in the Closet lays."

The Preacher, in a similar vein of world-weariness and discontent, writes, "Behold, all is vanity and a striving after wind; and there is no profit under the sun." This is a hopeless resignation to the hard conditions of an ungracious world. Job raged against the injustice of his estate, but Koheleth only sadly moralizes. Job was an untamed eagle dashing himself against the bars of his cage, but Koheleth only looks out with lustreless eye on the heavens where he might soar if he were but free. Life's disappointments have crippled and perverted his spirit.

BUT there are bitterer disappointments than these of personal ill success. When a man of famed integrity is suddenly revealed in the light of a traitor to the interests he has championed, when a public man becomes recreant to his former position and comes crashing to his fall, when a loved and trusted counsellor is shown to be unworthy of the good will of his fellows, then stars fall from the heavens and men shudder as with the darkness and chill of an eclipse. These are disappointments which it is hard to bear and which at first loosen one's faith in human nature.

But disappointments need never lead to failure. The hardest struggles are often of most value in the making of character. It is difficult to understand just what Lincoln would have been had he been reared in a home of luxury and known none of those struggles which so endeared him to the people. Through many disappointments and hardships he gained his kingdom of citizenship and power. When a man comes nobly through his disappointments and even his mistakes, overcoming the one and retrieving the other, he has reason to be proud of his career and he becomes an example to those who watch him. Moses, at the end of his life, was conscious that he had lived neither faultlessly nor without serious fractures of temper and judgment. But so nobly had he retrieved all these and won the regard of the nation that his final estate was a fitting conclusion for the life of a trusted and revered captain.

IN THIS victory of character over disappointment Jesus is himself our noblest example. His life must have been full of disappointments, and yet how little do these find record in the splendidly optimistic pages of the four Gospels. Even as a child in Jerusalem for the first time he must have been puzzled and perplexed by the failure of the nation's leaders to meet his ideals of what great teachers and preachers should be. His sad reflection upon the scribes and Pharisees, the result of years of brooding after that first visit to the holy city, find eloquent and mordant utterance in his denunciation of the "blind leaders of the blind." He must have been particularly disappointed in his failure to win to himself the good will of Jerusalem in the earliest period of his ministry. His retirement to Galilee was only after he saw how little he could trust that superficial faith to which many of the people of Judea had committed themselves. Disappointed and yet not disheartened, he turned to humbler ministries in the provinces. The disciples must have been a constant disappointment to him. They never understood his lofty purposes. When he was looking forward to betrayal and agony they were fashioning their small toys of worldly ambition and success, hoping that somehow the inauguration of his kingdom would further their political expectations. His disappointment over his people voiced itself eloquently in his broken words as he wept over the city, "How often would I have gathered thy children, but ye would not." Yet in spite of these disappointments, nay because of them, our Lord's life was one of unparalleled and divine success. He was made perfect by the things he suffered and of these sufferings his physical distresses were the least. That he did not utterly despair of men is a proof of his marvelous optimism. There were times when, in distress, he questioned the final success of his work as, when he cried, "When the Son of man cometh shall he find faith in the earth?" But these moments of depression were not for long. The triumph of faith was always supreme..

NO TRUE culture can exist without disappointment. All great and true lives have become such in virtue of the things that have been put under foot—pride and passion, vanquished ills, disappointed hopes and broken enterprises all have been subdued and are fragments built into the noble structure of an abiding and triumphant character. God cannot give us unvarying success, but he can aid us to that faithfulness and optimism which can conquer all disappointment and failure. And even when one is tempted to believe that effort is futile and that into every healing spring of opportunity, "another steppeth down before him," there is still the help of Christ who may find another way to bring us to success. Jesus did not take the lame man to the pool, but he lifted him up and set him on his feet. Even so today the Son of Man lifts up to life and power those whose disappointments have only served to make them wait more eagerly for the sound of his footsteps, and to listen with greater concern for the tones of his voice. Life's disappointments are God's opportunities.

Freedom of Thought

THE Disciples of Christ are strong in their intellectual freedom. In spite of friendly admonitions, we have steadfastly refused to write and adopt a creed, and we have done very well indeed without it. It was a daring experiment to build churches of Christ without denominational name or creed, whose terms of membership are as broad as the terms of pardon, and identical with them. All sorts of dire predictions were made, none of which have come to pass. The bible alone is authoritative—not the bible of the traditionalists, nor the bible of the higher critics, but the bible that stands intact when criticism has done its worst and its best, the bible which speaks to each man's soul of God and Christ and immortality.

There are occasional attempts to abridge this freedom, to fetter us with the dogmas of a creed all the more tyrannous because it is unwritten. There is a further element of bitterness in it, because the reactionaries are not members of a dignified, authoritative body, but self-constituted, irresponsible, opinionated, and sometimes mercenary men. They are "orthodox" for revenue only. They are disciples of Demetrius. Or they are by temperament and training, popelets, and when "drest in a little brief authority," issuing bulls and anathemas, and lording it over God's heritage, they do but appear in their own proper, dwarfish persons.

Fortunately, the Disciples are too firmly grounded in the principle of religious liberty to submit to priestly, professional or editorial dictation. Freedom of thought is too sweet and precious to be lightly surrendered. There are multitudes in the creed-bound churches who chafe under the restraint of theological grave clothes, scarcely knowing what it is that vexes and hinders them. Vigorous and scholarly young men turn aside from the ministry, rather than go into bondage to mummified masters, and pitch their tents in graveyards.

Absolute intellectual freedom conditions progress, and guarantees it. Better ten thousand times the vagaries and eclipses of a state of freedom, than the measured, mechanical, galvanized virtue of a hierarchical traditionalism. Our fathers forged their own creeds, each for himself, and we will do likewise, line by line, article by article, to the end of the chapter, and bequeath this right to think, not in grooves, not into the mud, but into the empyrean, to our children and our children's children.

It will be passing strange if this freedom of thought does not develop one of the strongest religious bodies known to Christendom. To be sure, thinking is arduous; brain sweat is drops of blood. Not all will care to exercise this God-given right. Many will be content with ipse dixits and ecclesiastical heirlooms. But there will always be a nucleus of stalwart souls whose thinking will fructify other minds from generation to generation, and keep our tree of life full of blossom and fruit. When we have finally developed far enough to set apart a number of men from treadmill drudgery to the divine specialty of vision and voice, then we may look for a robustness of mind and a depth of spirituality which the world has seldom seen. Our history is glorious, but our golden age is yet to dawn.

It remains to be seen whether the world is ready to sustain a religious movement which is steadfastly open-minded. Disciples must be found in communities as they exist today. We are as much bound by social and intellectual conditions as others. The evidences are not wanting that we are constantly in danger of looking over our shoulders, of quoting the fathers, of building on hard and fast lines, an ecclesiasticism. Do we not look with suspicion on the thinker? Do we not notify the man who breaks with our preconception, that he belong elsewhere? Liberty is not license. But let us encourage every man that dares to think originally, and give original utterances to that thought. If he thinks himself out of harmony with truth, he will think back again. The cure for the evils of intellectual freedom is more freedom.

The Preacher's Library

STUDY is a prime factor in determining a preacher's usefulness. It is imperatively necessary that he maintain his student habits, ,that he keep his mind bright with thinking. And his reading and study must range over a wide field. He has his specialty, but it is of such a character that it demands wide reading as well as close reading. He who would measure up fairly well to the demands of this age must come as near as in him lies to knowing everything. No other calling on earth is so perilous for the student as the ministry. The preacher has no task-master. He apportions his own time. His admirers warn him against hard study! He is tempted to float dreamily through current literature, and indulge a sort of intellectual voluptuousness. Against such temptations he must sternly set his face.

It follows that if the preacher is to be a student, he must have books, and the most of them he ought to own. A good working library is as necessary to him as tools to a mechanic. Close touch with the publishing world will bring new books constantly to his notice, and he will be a regular buyer. We stipulate ownership of books, as many as his purse will allow, because there is a sense of personal intimacy between the man and his books, much like the altogether human relation of friendship. Many books the live man will want to read, do not deserve a permanent place on his shelves. These he can procure from the public library. But the new book will itself awaken a torpid mind, and help to save the preacher from the temptations mentioned.

Recently The Christian Century asked a group of our representative preachers how much they spent in the last year for books. Replies received are quite creditable, showing an average expenditure of $79. This is not large, until we stop to consider the average salary. One man wrote, "The public library enabled me to have many a book my limited salary would have deprived me of. The minister should encourage the community to build up the public library, and help to shape its character. He can quite as much determine the thought of the people by such a course as by his public utterance." Another man in the far west, who has access to fine libraries, spent $100 for books, buying only religious works. He writes, "I find my library, which has now grown into a large one, a chief source of delight, though a constantly growing pastorate seriously interferes with my plans and work as a student." This is a matter which preacher and people must jealously guard against, for their mutual profit.

A man who preaches in a college town writes, "I would have required at least $100 but for the help of the college library, and even then my study would have been curtailed." A preacher who is considered unusually gifted, reports that he has spent an average of $200 a year for twenty years, and now has at least 4,000 volumes. He says, "However poor my work, it is at least better than otherwise it would have been. I have often gone without the new coat, but seldom without the new book." No doubt the preacher's wife has heroically shared the burden and deprivation here hinted at. If we could be made almoners of a fund for any purpose, we would ask for money to buy new books for preachers whose salaries barely cover the cost of humble living.

When we cease to learn, the little knowledge we already have begins to lose its vitality. We need, therefore, a literature of knowledge. The sermon, no matter what the theme, should convey information, as well as stimulus. We need also a literature of power, which awakens the mind, and stirs its creative energies. It ought to be the habit of every man to keep account of his investment and use of time, especially the time spent in study, and the names and titles of books digested. There is no danger of too little society, but there is great danger of too little study.

A Plea For Union

LOGICALLY and chronologically, we find our genesis in the plea for union—our plea, we miscall it, and thereby make it seem partisan. It is the plea of the Master, and loyalty to Him makes us adopt it. It is as much ours as Christ is ours, no more, no less. We cannot, if we would, sectarianize that plea. It belongs of right to all who are Christ's, nor are we alone in its advocacy. The basis we propose may be unique, but the plea itself is catholic, and it is most encouraging that practically all evangelical bodies have adopted it, and many are making earnest efforts to put it into practice.

Divisions are now as unnecessary as they are illogical. The differences among denominations are no more and no greater than among individual members and ministers of the same denomination. Each great denomination arose apparently, in answer to a real need, or out of the exigencies of the case, and made a real and valued contribution to Christian growth and conquest. But if divisions were necessary, they were necessary evils. Or they were necessary because of fundamental evils and weaknesses, now largely outgrown. Therefore the necessity for denominations no longer exists.

And is not this fact plainly indicated by the very conditions in the religious world? Many of these historic bodies are in a quiescent state, while others are moving on by sheer momentum, by the accumulated energy of the past, not by new energy freshly generated. Some of the denominations have been marking time, not marching. Men of affairs see all too clearly the lamentable waste of sectarianism, in men and money and power. They are not interested in our theological refinements. "Give us the essentials," they are saying, "and leave non-essentials where they belong, in the realm of individual opinion."

Whether we look to the church or to the world or to the scriptures, the time has come when the plea for union is most acceptable, strong and triumphant. It rings harmonious with the prevailing note of the age, comprehension, consolidation. It satisfies the reason; it arouses the conscience; it fires the imagination. If we are at once loyal and humble, aggressive and tactful in our advocacy of this great plea, we must continue to "grow in grace and in favor with God and man." For certainly in this plea is one element of strength. It commends us to the favorable attention of thoughtful men everywhere.

It may be asked, without casting any reflection on "the fathers," "Are we quite clear and quite in agreement as to what we mean by Christian union?" And still further, are our requirements and expectations in harmony with the divine will? Recent developments in the brotherhood prompt such questions, and the trend of events is thrusting them more and more upon our attention. If we are to continue in this plea as an element of strength, we must not allow our thought to crystallize.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

May I ask your interpretation of Mark 11:23, "Whosoever shall say to this mountain, Be thou removed,"etc.

Milwaukee. K. H. S.

Jesus wished to illustrate the all-conquering power of faith. To men who believe, all things are possible, because they count no obstacle too great to be overcome. This was the kind of followers he wished. His teaching abounds in figures of speech, and this one of the removal of mountains by faith emphasizes his high estimate of that quality in his disciples. The words must not, of course, be taken literally. In our more sober western speech his saying would mean, "The man of faith accomplishes the impossible."

Why did Jesus commend his mother to the care of John when he had brothers and sisters? B.

The Roman church insists, of course, that these "brothers and sisters" of Jesus were not related to him or to Mary, but were the children of Joseph by an earlier marriage. This supposition is employed to preserve the doctrine that Mary had no other children than our Lord. Such a view is not necessary, however, and seems inconsistent with the plain statements of the New Testament. There is nothing unworthy in the thought that Mary was the mother of sons and daughters younger than Jesus. Yet we know that these brethren of his did not believe in him (John 7:5), and it was not till later days, following the resurrection, that one of them, James, was first mentioned as concerned in the events of the gospel (I Cor. 15:7). Tradition joined the name of another brother, Jude or Judas, to the group of believers. It was natural that Mary, who had been much with Jesus and the disciples during the public ministry, should feel more at home in that group, and especially in the care of such a close friend of Jesus as John, than with her own children, who as yet did not share her profound faith in the Lord.

Does the Bible teach that all men will be finally saved?

Student.

No. The Bible concerns itself very little with ultimate conditions, further than to point out the consequences of courses of good or evil. How long these consequences continue, it does not say. But it makes very clear the fact that any soul that deliberately sins against the light it possesses, suffers the results of that sin, and continues to suffer as long as the love and choice of sin remain. Jesus had the largest love and hope for men. He believed in them and in their ability to achieve character with the help of God, long after their fellow-men had given them over as worthless. But with all his expectation of good he saw quite clearly the tendency of evil in disposition to harden into fixity of character. The man who is unjust tends to remain such, as choices accumulate. If after certain ages all men were sure to turn to God, it would seem like a mechanical rather than a moral universe. When the outcome of a game is certain, from the beginning, it has the appearance of being played with loaded dice. God may be trusted not to interfere with personality by any scheme of divine and benevolent coercion. Men will always have the power to sin if they will, in any world. But we may hope that the incentives to righteousness may become ever more alluring and compelling. In this way, but in this way alone, can one hope for the final salvation of all.

Please explain I John 5:8, "There are three that bear witness, the Spirit and the water and the blood."

W. F. H.

The words preceding go far to explain the meaning of these witnesses to Christ. In verse six it is stated that John came with (or in) water, but Jesus came with (or in) water and blood. The ministry of John was conspicuous for its use of the outward rite of baptism, by which witness was borne to the leadership and authority of the Coming One, as a preparation for whose service baptism was administered. John's baptism of the people bore witness to Christ. So, also, did Christian baptism, by whomever administered. But a more telling witness was borne by the blood of Jesus' death. He also employed baptism, but with him it gained a new significance by its close connection with his death. He came not with water only, but with water and blood. The testimony of the cross to the reality of our Lord's work was far more convincing than any act like baptism could be, because it was the central truth of the Christian faith. The blood of Christ, the substance suggestive of his suffering, his death, his redemptive work in behalf of the world he loved, is an unmistakable witness to the validity of the gospel. But back of both baptism and crucifixion is the Spirit of God, who in the life and death of Christ bore witness to the Father's character and the eternal purpose to call men upward to the higher life. The three witnesses, therefore, agree in their testimony. The water is the place of confession and surrender. The cross is the place of sacrifice and power. The Spirit is the divine manifestation of concern in human uplift and happiness. Water, blood and Spirit all bear witness to the sufficiency and glory of the Master's work.

Please give the meaning of John 1:51, "Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man." X.

When Nathaniel was brought by Philip to Jesus, he was greeted with the words, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." Jesus might almost have said, "Behold an Israel, out of whom the Jacob has been cast." This and the reference to the heavenly ladder and the angels upon it suggest that Nathaniel's meditation in the hour before Philip called him had been of Jacob's experience at Bethel. Jesus' partly veiled references to this train of thought astonished and helped to convince Nathaniel. But Jesus wanted him to know that a new moment had come in the story of God's relation to the world. No longer was the way from man to God a rare and infrequently trodden path. He was himself the Way. Through him a door of approach to the Holiest had been opened. Henceforth, from that very day onward, heaven was open, and the intercourse between man and God was to be constant, with Jesus as the intermediary.

In Genesis 48:18 Jacob said to Joseph, "(Manasseh) shall be great; howbeit his younger brother (Ephraim) shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations." Where and in what nation do we find this prophecy filled? A. F.

Freeport, Ill.

The tribe of Ephraim was the foremost of the groups of northern Israel. By its strength it secured the choicest portion of the land. It was recognized as possessing the headship of Israel. The sanctuary (Shiloh) was located in its territory. It furnished the most celebrated leader of the earlier period (Joshua) as well as the later Jeroboam. In comparison with it, Manasseh was of secondary strength and importance. The reference to "nations" is figurative, not literal. The whole passage refers to Ephraim's superiority among the tribes of Israel.

Views of Life

The Most Striking Character at the Centennial

The announcements tell us that there will be 50,000 people at the Centennial—and perhaps 100,000. Either number will make a vast convention. Think of taking a population equal to that of Des Moines or Winnipeg and setting it down together to consider the things of Christianity! The numbers will be overwhelming and confusing. We will not be able to grasp the hands of more than a fraction of the assembled saints. Many of our old-time friends we will likely entirely miss. But there is one character, the most striking of the convention, that no visiting Disciple should fail to meet and know. He will be there to greet every one of the vast concourse; but he never forces acquaintanceship. Doubtless thousands of the attending delegates will overlook him and return to their homes without knowing him. In failing to know him, the loss, personal and collective, will be inestimable.

We have many saints now looking towards Pittsburg who are worth going far to know. The souls of many are dyed red. They have about them what Wesley called "The scandal of the cross." While they mingle with the throng we know that they have grown strong in treading the winepress alone. But while many are valuable to know, there is one the value of whose acquaintance is inestimable.

I do not speak of the chairman of the Centennial committee and dean of our editors, Bro. J. H. Garrison. Every man of us would be glad to have a few moments of his time during the centennial week, if it were possible; and be helped on our way by his Christian experience, It is not he, however, of whom I write.

Nor is it our mystic secretary. In all these years of preparation he has kept poised. To both prayer and postage, to both communion and committees; and to both religion and returns he has given proper attention. He certainly is worthy of praise; but he is not the most striking character. I write not of A McLean, the man who turns our eyes to the whitened fields. He is a simple, strong soul. He builds ruggedly; yet beautifully. He has the ten-fold strength of purity. Who of our numbers moves more steadily with a single purpose? But the most striking character of the Centennial is other than our worthy Foreign Missionary bishop.

It is not of one of our orators, Medbury, Combs, Sweeney, Powell or Willett I am thinking. Nature and the Spirit of God have done much for these men of pulpit prominence. The fact that they regularly speak to great audiences testifies to their worth.

Neither is it among our debaters that we will find the supreme character. The list, such as McGarvey, Briney, Dungan and others of the older apologists is an honorable one indeed. These worthy men have "justified the ways of God" to many thousands. The younger apologists as Philputt, Maclachlan, Jenkins, and Rice are also striving to lead men to know the good God of our Lord. Proud should we be to know all in both the older and younger group.

The most striking character is not one of our writers. W. T. Moore is dean of our literary men. His Christian and optimistic laugh is heartening and winning. Just for curiosity I wish Bro. Moore might have a comptometer or some such reckoner attached to the palm of his hand so that after the convention is over we might know how many hands he had grasped. Even for such a genial man I think 2,000 a liberal estimate. But every soul present ought to meet and know the most striking character of the Centennial.

He will not be found to be one of our professorial friends, though we owe much to our schools; but he of over-towering significance does not live in an academic atmosphere.

Rev. George A. Campbell, Pastor at Austin, Chicago.

Is our roll complete? No, there is yet the great company of women.

The spirit whom I wish every one to know some might think was Mrs. Atwater or Mrs. Harlan or Mrs. Harrison or another leader of the world's model missionary society; but choice as any one of these is, she is not the character of which I am in search.

Of all the men and women to whom I have referred any religious body might be proud, but they are all too partial, too circumscribed, too conventional to be candidates for the place of highest honor. Be it known, at once, that I am not writing of Christ or of God or of the Holy Spirit. I wish to measure the overtowering character of the convention in terms of humanity.

It would pain me if any of my friends should miss knowing this chief character. So, for their benefit, I shall try and describe him so that the initiated may recognize him. The initiated! That's the word I wanted. I have been writing laboriously, feeling for that word. None but the initiated will he meet. He refuses to reveal himself to those he dislikes. The flippant, careless, and indifferent he disdains. None of these classes will or can make his acquaintance. There will be many at the Centennial who think of it as a great picnic—to these my chief character will be invisible. Blind, also, will be the men and women who have come to Pittsburg without years of toil and prayer in their local churches. The most striking character of the convention dislikes this class very much. They are not even candidates for initiation. They will return to their homes as lean as they came. The factionist will not set eyes upon him who above all others is worth seeing. He who wrongfully makes trouble cannot touch his hand.

The initiated? I have been speaking of the uninitiated. The initiated are those who understand him through likeness of soul. The initiated are those who by sincere worship and earnest work have contributed to the making of this noble character.

What is his appearance? How does he look? Can I describe him? Let us see. I suppose he is looking older than when I last observed him; but I think I can give a few strokes of outline.

He is middle-aged. A few gray hairs are scattered in his head of hair. His body is strong. He looks fit to run a race or take a turn at football. His face, however, is that of one who has thought and felt. He appears determined; but at the same time there overspreads his whole face the spirit of kindliness. You hesitate to conclude whether he be more ready for prayer or for battle. If you observe closely you will begin to see that his face reflects his age. There is the noise of clash about it; and there are the lines of struggle.

If you read his face aright you will know that he has known the culture of the schools and also the hardships of the pioneer. Ah! such a face. So strong, so winsome; so religiously masterful! Surely you will not miss his face. The moment you see it you will know it as the supreme face of the convention. All others compared with his are common and poor.

Mark his dominance in the affairs that the convention has in hand. In the corridors or on the platform or on the street you may hear those of our number berating the past. They have come to disbelieve in the fathers of our reformation. They may be laboring to ignore the path on which we have thus far come. Then our masterful character interprets for us the past. He uncovers the high motives and the mighty messages of our fathers and we all become calm and glad. He has glorified the past.

Then again a group—a larger one, will upon various occasions be casting gloom over the future. They are fearful as to "modern" things. The scholarship of the universities they fear is doing little more than blasting at the rock-truths of our faith. The chief character of our convention is in no wise disturbed by these who warn and threaten. He speaks for openmindedness, for the supremacy and safety of truth. He uncovers the soul of our time just as he uncovered the soul of the past—and we all come to feel that the eternity that stretches before is as surely God's as is that that reaches back.

He has glorified the present and the future. In the influence of his presiding genius he never fails to bring conviction and assurance.

More than once in the convention he will allay the fear of the frantic and warm the heart of the cynic. With great Christian deftness he will show the professor the good of the evangelist and the evangelist the good of the critic. He will join their hands in holy love. If he fails to make all our minds to see alike, he will nevertheless make all our hearts beat as one. His magic word will be love. While preaching salvation by faith, he will also inspire us all to believe in salvation by love. He will call us all to holier and more costly service. He will teach us anew the meaning of the Cross. He will show how that blood-blessing are bound together. Ah! If you should miss him!

You ask whence comes this wonderful and mighty character? You wish to know where he lives and works. I will tell you. He is the child of the Disciples' prayers. He has been reared in their churches. He has heard their sermons and their hymns. He has known from his youth up, their inner altar life. He has been trained not to fear discussion; but at all times to passionately love truth. His creed, example, inspiration and hope is Christ. His kith and kin have lived in the open, not worldly but religiously rich. The winds and the trees and the birds he knows well. He has grown frank, open-minded and rugged. With single eye he has given himself to the wounds of earth. He is restless to bring all Christians to an effective union for righteousness. He has caught the passion of Christ when he prayed "that his disciples might be one." He carries on the work of the forefathers, the world over he goes sacrificingly pleading the cause of Christian union. His associates are varied. He hob-nobs with our veteran professors such as McGarvey and Radford; he delights to visit and encourage Dye, Meigs, Macklin and all our other missionaries. He attends our great evangelistic meetings, and counsels with Scoville, Brandt, Brooks, Wilson and all. He peeps in at organizations not favorably known. He esteems the lonely saints everywhere and is with them in their homes. He is a companion of Wright, Rains and Ranshaw. He knows well, too, the pastors who are preaching for a shameful competence and loves them fondly. He knows every one of our Bible teachers. He is very fond of Moninger, Stevenson and all the workers in their line.

With a degree of humor he associates with our scribes and counsels peace. So you will see that this overtowering character is democratic, human, consecrated, and tremendously in earnest. You must also know that he is wise and firm. He sees clearly and therefore will make demands at Pittsburg. He will want to know as to the genuineness of some of our claims; he will want to know as to our service for the cities; he will want to know as to the longevity of our conversions; he will want to know as to our wasteful contentions; he will want to know as to the abandonment in Christian service of our rich and educated, and he will want to know about religion in our homes; he will want to know if God is real to us. Next century he will make great demands of us; who will be ready for them?

The Old Century to the New

A Centennial Message

By W. T. Moore, L. L. D.

Few men come nearer spanning the whole range of the history of the Disciples of Christ than Dr. W. T. Moore. He is a growing man even to this day. The appearance of a History of the Disciples from his pen is almost an epoch-making event in itself. We have enjoyed reading bits of it in the proof and can promise the brotherhood a volume on high levels of interpretation. We take pleasure in giving Dr. Moore's Centennial message to our readers.—THE EDITORS.

I do not think it will be denied that I have some right to speak for the old century, as my life has extended over more than three-quarters of it. My association with the Disciples of Christ covers about sixty-one years, while my public ministry as a preacher of the Gospel extends over fifty-seven years. Surely I have had good opportunity to know something of the things that are believed among us. It is, therefore, I hope, not presumption on my part when I claim the right to speak, in some respects, for the past in reference to the Disciples' movement.

It is curious to notice how, at the beginning of every new century, decisive steps are taken in the progress of human events. The beginning of the twentieth century definitely marks a new period in the history of the Disciples of Christ. Their great conventions belong to this period. A new spirit also seems to have taken possession of them with respect to the denominations. Having passed the fighting period, the Disciples are now seeking for Christian union by emphasizing the points of agreement, rather than, as was formerly the case, the points of disagreement. There is also a spirit of toleration, even where the Disciples believe the denominations are clearly wrong. It is believed by many that some minor evils had better be tolerated, than that the great evil, of a divided Christendom, should be perpetuated. Disciples are coming to see things in their proper proportion. In the old century they simply saw what was wrong, what was unscriptural and what ought to be destroyed. Now they see these things none the less, but they are disposed to wait on developments, and in the meantime to treat all honest, earnest souls who are seeking for the light with patience and toleration. They recognize that Christian union, if it ever comes at all, must come by successive steps, as it was by successive steps that the church went down into Babylon.

W. T. Moore

It is interesting to notice that this new spirit is not noisy. It is not the spirit of the earthquake, but the spirit of the still, small voice. It is an appeal to a new source of strength. Bluster is an evidence of weakness, hence God has truly said "In quietness and confidence shall be your strength." The Disciples' movement has taken a new start by manifesting this new spirit. It is true that we still have some noisy demonstrations, some turbulent proclamations, some loud reports from protracted meetings, and some fulsome laudations of individual greatness. But all this is only an indication that some men will be weak, no matter in what period they are living. These are signs of that atavism which prevails in all moral movements, as well as in physical things. It is simply a tendency to return to ancestral type. These men coming out of the war period—have passed up to the Red Sea, out of Egypt, but they are in fear of Pharaoh and his hosts, and seem to be sighing for the flesh pots of the land of bondage, rather than to take up the earnest exhortation of our heavenly Father, to "go forward," and to go forward "in quietness and in confidence."

The power which pervades the new day in the Disciples' movement is that of Love. Love has never had a fair chance in this world, where the clash and roar of artillery are regarded as the chief means by which progress must be made.

But the time has come when love must reign with the Disciples, in their churches, and above all, in the hearts of those who are seeking to realize the splendid ideal of the Christian life, as presented in the New Testament scriptures. Quietly and confidently the Disciple hosts must go forward, with Love inscribed upon their banners, for Love is greater than either Faith or Hope. It not only covers a multitude of sins, but it opens the way for all sanctified souls to move in solid phalanx toward the conquest of the nations.

Looking at the past, and estimating the present, it seems to me that the clear message of the old century to the new, is

(1) "Do not repeat the methods of the nineteenth century, but adopt, in the twentieth century, such methods as are adapted to the conditions of the new day. Remember that methods change, principles only are eternal."

(2) Disciples must love one another as Christ has loved them, and avoid contentions about questions which belong to the schools rather than to the church.

(3) They must spend their time, strength and money in seeking and saving the lost, and then there will be no place among them for internal dissensions, petty jealousies and unworthy rivalries. They should emulate one another in good works, and then they will prove to all men that they have been with the Christ.

A Fight for Faith

The Inner History of a Soul Struggling from a Conventional Faith to One of Its Own

The prevailing prejudice that the teachings of the higher institutions of learning are destructive of faith will suffer a rude shock in facing the facts presented in the following illuminating recital of inner experience. The writer is an advanced student in one of our leading universities, possessing a mature and well-poised mind and known among a wide circle of friends and Christian workers as a man of sterling character. The story of his inner struggle, in the later part of which his young wife had equal share, was called forth by a visit with his pastor of old college days who had expressed his grief at the reported apostasy of the young couple from the Christian faith. Lest the visit, which was a hurried one, had not correctly conveyed his present state of mind to his pastor-friend, he shortly afterward wrote him this letter. "I knew," he says in the introduction of his letter, "that our coming to the University would cause you pain, and would bring suffering to those nearest and dearest to us. In order that you may understand why we came, I am going to tell you a little of the story of my life." We are grateful to the author for allowing us to give to our readers a letter of such personal character as this, and we believe its publication will elicit echoes of a like experience in multitudes of others who, without help from those appointed to help, have been left alone to wage the battle against doubt. THE EDITORS.

I grew up in a home where both parents were devout in the extreme. My mother is spoken of by all who know her as one of the saintliest women who ever walked the earth. My father was universally trusted and honored in his own community as few men are. Religion was the subject of our conversation at meals and in our evening talks. My mother died when I was nine years old, and my father did not believe in urging children to join the church. I am of a very analytical temperament, and questioned many things. At last, however, when I was seventeen, I felt I had an answer to every question, and in response to a great need of strength to overcome temptation, I came into the Church of Christ. At that time and since I have been a constant student of Christian evidences. I think there are few of the general proofs for the fundamentals of Christianity with which I am not familiar. My system was complete. I was a loyal Disciple in the most rigorous sense of the term. All others were without promise. I went into Y. M. C. A. work for about a year. Then I went to Moody's school at Mt. Hermon with the deliberate intention of finding whether I could detect any difference between the Christianity there and that in the Christian church. I found it better there, if anything, and I was puzzled; for I felt that since we had more light we should be more Christ-like. Then I went to India as a secretary in the Y. M. C. A. I had never been entirely comfortable in Y. M. C. A. work, for I could not preach all I believed. The secretaries were bright men, most of them better educated than I. They were good men, better than I,—and yet they had not even been baptized. If Christianity was a life, and those who were unbaptized were not Christians, they should still be sinners, and it ought to be possible by daily association to tell the difference between a sinner and a saint. Many of these men, too—men with just as good a right to speak as I, and men whose lives were more fruitful—claimed direct communication with the Spirit, and yet did not see the necessity of being baptized. What was I to think? Nine-tenths of the missionaries, according to my theology, could not certainly be counted as Christians, for they had not taken out their naturalization papers in the Kingdom. But what right had I to say that they were wrong? I simply clung to my original position, and covered my inconsistency by the plea of ignorance of the inscrutable will of God (but if I was ignorant, might I not be in error?)

About this time I was thrown much in the company of one of the most spiritual, consecrated, and fruitful missionaries in India, J. N. Farquhar. This man was a Scotchman, in thorough sympathy with the so-called higher critical school, and a double first honor man from Oxford; and yet he won men to Christ and lived for Him and would have died for Him. This puzzled me, too. Then I was much with a Danish secretary who has given his eyes to missionary work in India. I had the privilege of partly compensating for his loss by teaching him to use the typewriter. Night after night, out there on the roof beneath the stars, Steinthal and I talked of the problems of our work and of my personal life, and it seemed as if the presence of the Master himself was with the man. He had a marvelous influence over the native students, and the apostle Paul did not sacrifice more for his Master than Steinthal—but he, too, puzzled me. "By their fruits ye shall know them." I tried logically to fit all this work and all these lives into my religion, and I had no place for them. I grew more and more uncomfortable. I finally decided that I would return home and eventually go to the field under our own Board, where I could preach a "full gospel"—but that did not make my religion grow to include more than the most insignificant fraction of the people who thought they were Christians, and who were trying their level best to be Christians, and of course I had no place whatever for the men whom I had met in India who were heathen, but who in Christlikeness would put most of my brethren to shame. All these things I kept pondering, and could not rid myself of them.

Then I went to college. I studied history. I read in the sources. I found that all through the ages men had been struggling toward light. I believed that they were progressing. But all this was contrary to my theology; for its ideal was in the past. All life, as I could read it in history, had been an unfolding. But one time there was inserted into history an ideal—perfectly plain, absolutely transparent, so it was said,—and ever afterwards men had struggled toward that ideal, and had believed that in its attainment was eternal life. And each generation of men attained to the truth and saw that the preceding generation was mistaken and therefore damned. All through the centuries men had been dying for what they thought was the faith once delivered to the saints, but they had been mistaken, and their deaths had been in vain. They went on nearly two thousand years, till one day a man said, "We will go back to Christ." That was the master-cry to which men flocked. At last we had attained to the ideal. But as I read history I discovered that all through the ages men had been going back to Christ. Luther and thousands since his day had been saying in effect, "Where the Bible speaks we speak, and where the Bible is silent we are silent." Again I was puzzled, for how could I be sure that this time men had actually gotten there?

Then I looked in the history of the Disciples of Christ. I found that while their platform had been unity, they had been little more successful in effecting unity than others. I found that unity was coming from all sides, and that like men in other ages they had uttered the cry of their century. Then, too, I heard for the first time of the "Antis" who professed to have gone back to Christ, while we had apostatized,—and who was to call them dishonest or imbecile?

Then I studied psychology and philosophy, and found that the testimony of our senses is not very accurate, that we give reasons for what we want more than we want what is reasonable. I found as I had found in history, that all life is an unfolding. I found that a really vital idea must be a growing idea. I found that an organism or institution which ceases to grow begins to die. The story here is a long one, but the upshot of it is two things, viz., that the significant thing about life is growth, and that, so far as we can find out, the form of growth is always determined by antecedent conditions. When I compared this conception with my theology, they did not harmonize. My theology called for static things which were from the beginning; my science called for tendencies toward growth in certain directions from the beginning. Theology called for classes of men sharply divided, for yea, yea and nay, nay; when all my science made me feel that these belong to the Infinite at the end of the story.

So I was more troubled than ever. The way was hedged up before me. Life was robbed of its meaning. I read books and heard sermons, but all to no avail. I was becoming desperate, bitter, cynical, rebellious at the cant and sham of the church. I analyzed sermons and religious methods. I saw that people's religion was largely what they had inherited, even as their politics and their manners and their idiosyncracies. Yet all the while I believed in righteousness, in the mission of the church, in the sincerity of most of its members, in the sweet and devoted Christian lives which had ministered to me all my days. Above all, I believed in the religion of my mother who literally burned out her life for God. Most men today would call her a fanatic, and I reject most of the doctrines which she felt called upon to emphasize, but I believed and believe today that her life was among the most Christlike of earth,—yet her theology, rigorously carried out, would consign me to damnation. I became impatient of the whole theological discussion, and felt like turning to some human service which would take me away from it. I felt that the key to the life of the Master and the master-spirits who have lived in every age was trust in God and loving service to men. I was almost ready to abandon the church because of its dogma and its insistence upon conformity.

It was with this feeling that we came to the University. We had to decide the questions, Shall we continue in the church? Shall we be Disciples? Shall we be Volunteers? We have been here a year. The result of that year you know. It has been a year of joy and opening vision. We feel that we appreciate Jesus as we never did before. We could work in your church far more sincerely and heartily than before. We could go to the mission field with much more confidence in our ability to teach Christ as he would be taught and with more faith in His transforming power than before. The Bible has become a new, living, and wonderful book to us. I cannot discuss just how all this has come about, but it has been the result of a method of study which has been called higher criticism, but of which higher criticism is but the merest item. This method has saved us, as it has saved many others whom we know, from hopelessness and doubt to faith and confidence, and we cannot be too grateful. Again I have pondered the Master's words, "By their fruits ye shall know them." Can it be that when every one of our own men, so far as I know, who has come here for any considerable period, has had a similar experience, the school and its methods are all wrong? Can it be that practically all the theological seminaries in the country are completely on the wrong track? Is hopeless error the fruit of the most thorough intellectual labor of consecrated men? Are students of the history of religion who have had their training in the last decade or two (and many indeed of the older school) completely mistaken? Are the truisms of anthropological sociology false? In view of these questions, is not Gamaliel's position the wise one? Whatever the specific theological positions we may hold (and many of them differ from yours), we feel that we are better Christians now than ever before. You surely could not wish us to reject the best for what seems to us the less worthy.

And may I venture one thing more? I know personally many students in our colleges who are going through our experiences. The number is increasing. Any person who studies biological science, psychology, literature, sociology, or philosophy and coördinates the results of these studies with the traditional religious positions must, in my judgment, be upset. I could write a list of a dozen such among the prominent Christian workers at our old college (I had such a list here, but decided it would be unfair to send it to you). A man who was a successful preacher, whom I know very well indeed, said to me the other day in reference to his religious life, "I tell you, I'm just down and out, and the more I study medicine, the worse I get." Another is keeping up the forms for the sake of his parents, but feels that the whole thing must go. He has been a Y. M. C. A. committeeman during most of his time at college. Two-thirds, at least, of the Student Volunteers in my last year at college were so troubled. I don't think one-fourth of the seniors escape. Many of your most trusted young people are in this condition. I may mention our own sister. Perhaps you remember what a loyal Y. W. worker she was last year. All the time she was questioning the very validity of religion. She will come through all right, because her brother and ourselves will be able to help her; but some of the others will be lost to the church. I have again and again been surprised at the character and number of people who are secretly troubled by these things. Such students are sheep without a shepherd. They feel that it would only pain their pastor to go to him with these things, that he would not understand. I know this is their feeling, and the deepest wish of my heart for you is that you might come to understand. These times of transition are Gethsemane experiences in these lives. I have lost a father and a mother, but neither loss caused me the actual anguish that came with the struggle between the faith of my childhood and that of my manhood. Had it not been for my confidence in others whom I knew who had fought and won, I fear it would have been a losing battle for me.

I have already written much more than I intended to. I hope I have done right. I have written in the conviction, not that my present position is right or final, but that I am growing into truth. I hope I may always grow. I think we miss the heart of Jesus mission when we make any intellectual conformity whatsoever a test of discipleship. Jesus not only said, "He who is not for us is against us," but the converse. Must we settle critical questions before we are Christians? If not, the man who inclines toward one side has as much right to be called a Christian as he who inclines toward the other. Must we agree in order to love? It seems to me the scriptural way is to begin as the most ignorant disciples, knowing only that Jesus loves us and draws us, and to go on through this life and the next, it may be, learning of him. When He has taught us that God loves us and that we must love and serve one another, He has taught us enough to begin on, and I doubt if we shall ever learn much more.

Mrs. ———— and I both feel deeply indebted to you, Bro. ————. You have inspired us and purified us and encouraged us. We crave for you greater and greater power for the Master, and we crave for ourselves your love and continued sympathy.

The Disciples and Social Progress

Alexander Campbell was a slave holder and argued for its justification on Bible grounds in The Millenial Harbinger, which pleased his Southern friends, and he set his slaves free, which pleased the Northern wing to this slave question. This great straddle, called "wisdom" and "prudence" in church circles, was over an issue that cost twenty billions of dollars, equal to five times all the gold coin on the earth, and some hundreds of thousands of lives in which brethren went out to kill each other in one of the wickedest wars of history. If I can see at all, our churches are following this example by straddling the question whether our people shall say "yes" or "no" to the proposition to license the demon grog, now so vaunting. A Christian union that can straddle the slave block and the "Black Hole" and the liquor traffic which has cost more money and more lives than the war, might straddle polygamy and the rest, and ought to have an interrogation point after the word "Christian." When Henry Clay straddled the slave issue by speaking against slavery and still holding slaves, and James G. Blaine spoke in praise of prohibition in Maine, but refused to vote for it, their friends may have called it "wisdom," but there were enough men in the country who thought otherwise to defeat their aspirations, men who called such acts "cowardice" and "trickery" and I fear I was one such myself.

Dr. Errett Gates of the University of Chicago

Such things cause me to pause and to ask in what respect is such a Christian union any better than the Church of Rome or of Russia? What! Christ and Belial made one?

I hope for the happy change you think possible, but old axioms confront me, such as, "Can the leopard change his spots?" I have no doubt our brethren will stand up against the license iniquity after the world itself has led the way; for instead of leading and saving the world the church seems to be calling out to the world to save the church. Please correct my error, brother, and God help you to help us who are of this mind. Jasper Seaton Hughes.

Dear Brother Hughes: Your present communication returns to the point raised in a former letter concerning the attitude of the Disciples toward social reform movements, in particular the anti-liquor movement. You seem to imply that they have dodged this great issue, and can not be counted on to aid in the moral and social betterment of the world. On the other hand, it has been my feeling that the Disciples have outdone all other religious bodies, both as an organization and as individuals, in doing battle against the liquor traffic. Their outspoken and unequivocal attitude on this question has given me especial satisfaction.

I recall the fact that all of the leading newspapers of the Disciples, with their editors, are not only temperance advocates, but avowedly prohibitionist; and that many of the larger conventions of the Disciples have pronounced in favor of the legal prohibition of the liquor traffic. It can almost be said that the Disciples have officially, as a body, committed themselves to prohibition. It is the rare exception to find a minister among us who is not a prohibitionist. I suppose the "rank and file" of the Disciples are divided among the various political parties about as in other bodies. I have been surprised that the devotion of our ministers and editors to prohibition has not given them more trouble. Surely you have no cause for complaint against the Disciples for any "straddling" of the liquor question.

If I were lodging complaint against the Disciples it would be for showing a timorous and calculating one-sidedness in their devotion to temperance, to the neglect of some other great reform movements. It requires no courage today to curse the liquor traffic; it is not even an evidence of great moral acuteness or advancement. The temperance reformer, or even the prohibitionist, is simply moving with the crowd. He is likely to get trampled on if he does not keep up with the procession. State legislatures are voting overwhelmingly in the majority for prohibition, simply as a political measure. They have no thought of doing a religious thing. It has come to be good political sagacity in many states for a politician to come out for prohibition in some form. In their attitude toward the liquor traffic, the Disciples are merely following, not leading moral opinion; they are but creatures, not creators of social consciousness.

What you would like, Brother Hughes, is to see the Disciples creators and leaders of social and moral progress. And because they are not you seem to be a little impatient with them. But when has any body of Christians as such taken such a position? Or, still more vitally, when has the church as such in any generation since the beginning of the Christian Era led in the world's social or political reforms?

After all, is it the church's business as an institution to take any part in political or social movements? I do not attempt an answer to this question here; I do not even pretend to have an answer. All I am attempting is to find out at bottom what your complaint against the Disciples comes to; what fundamental problem it involves. As individuals the Disciples are as active in all good causes as the members of any body of Christians. I am disposed to think more so. I am proud of the fact that they are. It makes my heart warm with joy when I see a Disciple taking a leading part in any great public cause. I feel like throwing up my hat for the Disciples. But I am not disposed to feel that it is the business of the Disciples as an organic body to go into all these reform movements, with their newspapers, colleges, missionary societies and conventions. I could see only contention and division ahead of them if they should.

I want to commend to your reading an editorial in the Outlook of September 4, 1909, bearing upon this very question, entitled, "Van and Army." The editor says: "Every sociologist, amateur and otherwise, delights to criticise the church for its backward attitude toward sociological movements." "The criticism is made so continually that many sincere Christians become discouraged by it, and begin to apologize at a moment's notice because their church is not running a kindergarten in the basement and a hospital on the roof, and giving its moneyed members notice to quit." "Nevertheless, the criticism is neither fair nor sound." "Moreover it is the van of the Christian church which helps to lead every sociological movement today. Take away the men and women whom the church has set aflame with ideals of brotherhood and sacrifice, and every charitable work in America would be crippled tomorrow. The van of the church is pushing ahead eagerly toward industrial arbitration, municipal reform, temperance legislation, improved housing for the poor, the protection of women and children industrially, old age pensions, and every other reform that modern America is considering. It is an undenominational van, shoulder to shoulder, representing no one church, appealing to no ecclesiastical authority."

I am not sure that an appeal to the example of Christ is valid in this matter. But when you cite Alexander Campbell's noncommittal attitude toward the great slavery struggle, would it be fair to reply by citing the attitude of the apostle Paul? He seems to consent to the institution of slavery by seeking the restoration of the slave Onesimus to his master. Was Campbell any worse than Paul? Would you say that Paul dodged the slavery question, which was one of the crying evils of his time? Did he not see it? Did he not feel the wickedness of it?

And what shall we say concerning Paul's attitude toward the liquor evil? It is well known that he advised Timothy to take a little wine for his stomach's sake. Some of us modern prohibitionists wish we did not have that advice of Paul to deal with. Did Paul "straddle" the question? There is, after all, not very much ammunition in the New Testament for our prohibition guns; in fact, the Book seems to put the powder and shot in our enemy's hands in some places. I wish the New Testament were more clear on a good many questions. But because I can not quote it for abolition and prohibition, and single tax, and woman's suffrage, and labor unions, and socialism, shall I throw it away and refuse to use it for what it is good for?

The New Testament, we are slowly learning, is not good for everything, as our fathers tried to make it. It seems also to have been a product of the age, as was Campbell and the Disciples. The apostles were mistaken about some things, as was Luther, and Calvin, and Wesley and Campbell. Paul persecuted the early Christians; Luther advised the bigamy of Philip of Hesse; Calvin consented to the burning of Servetus; Wesley believed in witchcraft, and declared that "a witch ought not to be suffered to live"; and Campbell was opposed to the abolition movement. Can we say anything more than that in these matters these great men were creatures of their time?

I talked with a Lutheran professor the other day who winced at the telling of the whole truth about Luther's weaknesses and mistakes, in a certain church history. The history pleased him in most respects, but he could not use it with his Lutheran students because the book told the whole truth about Luther. The worth of Luther's work seemed endangered, in this good professor's opinion, from any aspersion upon his infallibility. It was evident to me from the professor's conversation that Lutheran ministers and teachers dare not take a free, critical attitude toward Luther.

I have met with some such spirit among Disciples with reference to the Campbells. I am happy to believe, however, that it is not widespread. Nothing more fatal can happen to a religious movement than to bind itself to a leader, a teacher, or an idea, of a past generation. Stagnation is its awful doom. There is no hurt to the Lutherans that Luther made mistakes, unless they have built upon the infallibility of Luther; and there is no hurt to the Disciples to know the whole truth about Alexander Campbell's inconsistencies and limitations, unless the Disciples have made Campbell's conduct and teachings their only rule of faith and practice. I think I have as much respect for the greatness and worth of Campbell's work as any Disciple, but I should be untrue to his spirit and principle if I should treat him as inerrant, or his ideas as final.

Our Church Men

By John R. Ewers

"Get Big Men Behind You"

Andrew Carnegie is probarbly the biggest business man Pittsburg ever produced, and here in his home town he is highly esteemed. Say what you will, he is a master of men. He secures immense results. He may be well studied by the man who seeks for success today in any field. Andrew Carnegie, the iron master, is reputed to hold as his maxim,

Rev. John R. Ewers,
Pastor East End Church, Pittsburg.

"Get big men behind you." If you will study his career you will see how he got Frick and Schwab behind him, working for him. That he is a genius himself no one can doubt, but who shall say that the greatest evidence of his genius is not this very element of being capable of getting powerful men of affairs behind him as helpers? Napoleon alone was great, but he needed his famous group of aides to win his battles and conquer his empires.

Big Men for the Church

What does this mean, men of our great communion, to us who think in terms of the kingdom of God? It means that in our churches we must get the big fellows behind us. Cardinal Gibbons in a recent utterance bewails the fact that many of the world's most intellectual people are outside the church. He blames it on division and on the lack of authoritative teaching, and he is not altogether wrong. Unity of God's hosts and a clear note of reasonable authority would win millions of bright people to the kingdom. But whatever is wrong, the fact remains that many of the big men are not behind us working for us.

The Church Lacks Big Men

Asked what the matter was with the church, Dr. Aked of the Fifth Ave. Baptist Church of New York City, said, "Too many small men." He went on to say that small salaries would continue to secure small men. Great busines men often accuse the church of doing a "peanut business." How many of us have been humiliated by dealing with official boards who would haggle over an electric light bill, or turn down an appeal for a few dollars for legitimate advertising? Men who spend large amounts in their own business, often deal with the church in a small and inadequate way. Give us the big fellows.

Wherever the church has big men you will see big results. Look over our churches and think of the big laymen who are behind some of our ministers pushing. No wonder we find big churches there, with generous misionary offerings and everything on an ample scale. It has been my pleasure, in nearly every church I have served, to have one or more big men and in the church where I now am, I have several big men, so that I know whereof I speak, and I rise to say that much of the credit given to ministers, rightly belongs to the fine, large, generous, unselfish laymen that are behind them.

The Minister and Little Men

On the other hand, God have mercy upon the honest ministers who have to deal with

My Dream

In dreams I find a gate through which I pass
  Along a path, guarded by hollyhocks,
That threads the old time garden's tangled mass
  Of tiger-lilies, marigolds, and phlox.

I follow it until at last I stand
  Before a little house, severely white,
Whose well-worn latch I lift with eager hand,
  And cross its threshold in the waning light.

For it is always evening when I come,—
  An autumn twilight, which the neighboring sea
Chills with its breath—and for a welcome home,
  Upon the hearth the firelight laughs at me.

Beside it lies a cat in monkish frock
  Of furry gray, whose drowsy purr is all
That breaks the silence, save a busy clock,
  Speeding the parting minutes, on the wall.

Wrapped in warm peace I rest, till far away
  In the still house a gentle stir I hear,
Light footsteps through the distant chambers stray,
  Remote at first, but slowly drawing near.

Breathless I watch, while through the open door,
  The friends I lost and long for, one by one,
Gather about me in the dusk once more.
  Then my dream fades, and I awake alone.

For Very Little Folk

The Story of the Good Little Piggie and His Friends.

Once there was a little piggie, a very good little piggie, who obeyed his mother so well that often she let him out of the pen to play with his friends on the farm. One afternoon this little piggie was playing with them, when suddenly he heard his mother calling, "Piggie, wiggie, wiggie, wiggie, wiggie!"

"Piggie dear," she said, as he ran to her, "take this and trot as fast as you can to market and get me a pail of milk for father's supper tonight."

So Piggie took the pail between his teeth, and off he went to do what his mother told him. Now, you must remember that this little piggie was such a dear, good little piggie that he had a great many friends among the other animals. So he had not gone far when who should spy him but his friend Bossie Calf. "Hello, there!" said the calf. "Where are you off to, Piggie?"

"I'm going to market to bring my mother a pail of milk for father's supper tonight," squealed Piggie.

"Are you? I believe I'll go, too. I am so fond of milk." And the calf leaped over his master's fence and away he went, scampering after Piggie.

By and by, who should come along but Piggie's friend Billy Goat. "Mercy on us"; baa-ed Billie. "Where are you going in such a hurry, Bossie?"

"Going with Piggie," said the calf.

"Where are you going, Piggie?"

"Going to market to bring my mother a pail of milk for father's supper tonight," squealed Piggie, in a great hurry.

"Are you? I believe I'll go, too. I am so fond of milk." So Billie Goat ran out of the barnyard and after the calf.

Just as they were passing the house, who should spy them but Rover, the dog.

"Where are you going, Billie," barked Rover, running out to the gate as he saw them rushing along. "Going with Bossie," said the goat.

"Where are you going, Bossie?"

"Going with Piggie."

"Where are you going, Piggie?"

"I am going to market to bring mother a pail of milk for father's supper tonight," squealed Piggie, in a great hurry.

"Are you? I believe I'll go, too. I am so fond of milk." So Rover hurried along up the road after the goat.

Just as they turned into the road, who should come jumping along but Tabby the cat.

"Well, well," he meowed. "When did the circus come to town, Rover?"

"This is not a circus parade," said the dog, the goat, the calf and Piggie all at once, as they ran on.

"Then, where are you going, Rover?" again meowed Tabby.

"Going with Billie," barked Rover.

"Where are you going, Billie?"

"Going with Bossie."

"Where are you going, Bossie?"

"Going with Piggie."

"Where are you going, Piggie?"

"I am going to market to get my mother a pail of milk for father's supper tonight," squealed Piggie, in a great hurry.

"Are you? I believe I'll go along. I am so fond of milk." So Tabby raced along after Rover.

When they got to the market, Piggie told his friends to wait outside while he hurried in and got the milk for his father's supper. It did not take him long, and he soon came trotting out because he was to hurry back home.

"Give me a sup for politeness' sake," meowed Tabby the cat, as she stuck her head in the pail. "My, that's good!"

"Pass it to me, Tabby," barked Rover the dog, "for politeness' sake. My, that's good!"

"Give me a sup for politeness' sake," said Billie Goat. "My, that's good."

"Do not forget me, Billie, for politeness' sake," said Bossie the calf. "My, that's good!"

"Oh, dear; oh, dear!" squealed Piggie, when he saw what had happened. "What shall I do?" And away he trotted all by himself with an empty pail, to tell his mother that he did really and truly get the milk, but that his friends had "supped" it all up!

But just then the farmer came with a great big pail of milk and gave it all to them, so that the good little piggie and his father and mother had a fine supper, and much more milk than Piggie could have brought.

THE FACE OF CHRIST.

What kind of a face do you wear? Ought you not to give this a thought? You are always thinking about what kind of clothes you wear. I can hear you now. "Mother, when can I wear suspenders?" and that long drawn out, "M-o-t-h-e-r, Tommy Trumbo is wearing long p-a-n-t-s."

And there you are, all the time, wearing a long face and don't know it. You probably wouldn't look good in long trousers, but you certainly don't look good in that face.

The kind of a face one wears is much more important than his clothes. Old faces are harder to put off for new ones; they stick. They are worse than clothes that button in the back. The best way is to put on a Sunday-go-to-meeting face and wear it all the week. For no face full of sunlight and good cheer ever wears out.

The world is full of faces. The past is full of faces. What kind of a face shall we take for our model? There is the face of Helen of Troy, beautiful to see; the face of Judas, a false face; the face of the good Samaritan, full of sympathy; but there is another face, the face of faces. Get mother to show you the picture a great Italian has painted of the face of Jesus. It must be that this picture looks something like the Christ. Something shines out of the eyes; like some pure light far above us, it seems to draw us, and we yield to its power. Jesus' face must have been thoughtful; it must have been strong, for he died very bravely. It must have been steeped in tenderness, for he loved all mankind. To look on such a face men dropped their fishing nets and left the beaten walks of life. To wear such a face means to look like children of the King. He who so dresses is the true nobleman.

By Professor Willett

Nights and Days on the Deep*

When Paul appealed from Festus, the procurator of Judea, to the emperor Nero, he understood full well all that it implied. He must expect to continue a prisoner indefinite. ly. Indeed, there was small probability that he would ever secure his freedom again. This seems actually to have been the case, for the scattered records of the New Testament leave us in doubt as to whether Paul ever emerged from his Roman prison except to witness with his death to the faith he had preached.

The Way to Rome

But, on the other hand, Paul knew that the appeal to Caesar would have two distinct values. It would free him from the present and pressing danger of assassination at the hands of the Jewish fanatics in Jerusalem, and it would open to him an assured pathway to Rome, the center of the world, the capital of the empire, the starting point of all its influences, political and commercial, which made it the wonder of the country. Here he wanted to be, that he might touch the heart of the world with his message of the Christ. There was a time when he had been satisfied with the provincial ministries of the Asiatic world. When the vision came to him at Troas, calling him into Europe, it seems to have been a surprise, but now his mind was widened with the contemplation of the world's needs; nothing less than a continental apostolate satisfied him. He must see Rome.

Criminals in Rome

The transportation of prisoners to the capital was a very common matter in the empire. Roman citizens had always the right of appeal to the emperor. But in addition to this there were certain state criminals who were more likely to meet adequate justice in the capital than in the provinces. Probably great numbers of prisoners, both civic and military, were taken to Rome annually. There is a dreadful suggestiveness attached to this practice, for it cannot be doubted that the Roman populace dearly loved the spectacle of human torture and death. It took a great many victims to satisfy the lust for blood which had been kindled in Rome as early as the times of Tiberius. It was difficult to feed the insatiable appetite unless victims were brought in by the score and hundred. It must not be supposed that Roman justice had so far declined that transportation to the capital implied condemnation, but when the hearing of a state prisoner was to take place before an emperor like Tiberius, Claudius or Nero, it can easily be understood that a caprice of the royal mind, inclined strongly toward the horrors of the arena, must have sent many a guiltless victim to those shambles of humanity.

Paul's Companions

Paul was committed to the hands of a centurion named Julius who seems to have been a kindly and gracious man. There was a considerable number of prisoners to make the same journey, guarded by Roman soldiers who were responsible with their lives for the safety of the captives. Luke was apparently a member of the company, though whether as a prisoner or a passenger cannot be determined. And Aristarchus, a Macedonian friend of Paul's, is mentioned in the same list.

The early portion of the voyage was uneventful. The centurion put his prisoners on board a ship whose destination was Adramyttium, a city of Mysia on the coast of Asia Minor. It was impossible apparently to secure passage in a ship going directly to Rome. The sea traffic of that period was very heavy, but it was mostly in freight, and passenger service was subject always to the demands of the freight routes. They would have to change ships on the Asian coast. Already the winds were unfavorable, and they were compelled, after touching at Sidon, to pass through the Sea of Cilicia on the north side of Cyprus, whereas a more direct route would have passed south of Cyprus.

Beginnings of Danger

At Myra, a city of Lycia, they disembarked, and were fortunate enough to find an Alexandrian corn ship sailing to Italy. These ships brought the food supplies to Rome, and not infrequently that city was put to serious inconvenience by stormy weather which delayed the arrival of the ships from the south.

Now began the dangerous part of the voyage. They hoped to reach their destination before navigation closed in the autumn; but the winds were not propitious and several days passed before they were able to arrive abreast of the island of Crete. They finally reached a port on the southern coast of the island, whose name was promising, Fair Havens. The interest of Luke in all the details of this voyage is very clear, as in most of the travel narratives of Acts. Apparently he was familiar with the sea and its usages, for his language is not that of a landsman, but of a practised voyager.

Dangers of the Sea

By this time the autumn was fully come. The Jewish New Year was past and the Day of Atonement, which came on the tenth day of the seventh month, corresponding to the last of September and the first of October, had been left behind. To Paul, with his knowledge of the Mediterranean, it seemed too late in the year safely to trust themselves further upon the Mediterranean. At the longest it would only be three or four months before navigation would open in the late winter and then they could proceed safely to Rome. He begged the centurion to take this course.

But the latter was unwilling to stay where they were. It could not have been a matter of expense, because the resources of the Roman government in all the ports and on all ships were at the disposal of an officer journeying to the capital with a company of prisoners. But the centurion and the captain were anxious to reach a safer port, and no doubt the latter of the two wished to be rid of his responsible commission as early as convenient. Moreover, the captain of the ship insisted that there was no special danger and that they might well proceed. To a landsman it often seems marvelous what risks sailors take in going to sea in unsafe vessels and at the most unpropitious times. Perhaps long custom makes them indifferent to perils that seem very vivid to less experienced minds. At any rate, they determined to go on, and in this judgment it appears many of the company of prisoners and soldiers joined.

The Tempest

They were not necessarily bent on reaching Rome that autumn, and gradually there seems to have come to them the conviction that the last portion of the journey was impossible. But, at least, they wished to reach a better harbor and they determined to make for Phenice toward the western end of Crete. It was this part of the journey that brought them to disaster. They had hardly left the sheltering port of Fair Havens when down from the high mountains of Crete there swept one of those sudden and terrific tempests called in the text Euraquilo, a term that was probably used by Roman seamen to denote a northeast wind. The ship was caught, and as it was impossible to control its movements, it could only be allowed to drift. The small boat which was taken along for safety in an emergency was towed behind, and when they made an effort to bring it on deck, it was with the greatest difficulty that it could be accomplished. The continuance and severity of the storm made them anxious regarding the ship itself and they passed cables around it, whether under the keel or from stem to stern is not described, but probably the latter, as the former would have been very difficult in such a storm.

Paul's Assurance

But their great fear was that they should be driven to the coast of Africa and there fall upon the quicksands of the great Syrtis. To avoid this they took down all the sails, hoping thus to let the storm go by without being carried so swiftly before it. But dangers increased and soon they were compelled to throw overboard some parts of the ship's material, though what, is not stated. The grain was not sacrificed until later in the voyage. Then came a time of dire distress. Many days passed in the continued tumult of the tempest. Hope gradually vanished from their hearts. In the midst of this time of desperate distress it was Paul who encouraged them with the assurance that in spite of the mistake made in leaving Crete, he felt confident that they would gain harbor. Of this he had been assured in a vision of the night. When they left the coast of Crete Paul had warned them that the voyage could only be undertaken with the certainty of severe loss even of human life. Now he assured them that only the ship and its cargo must be sacrificed; all of those who journeyed would be saved.

*International Sunday-school Lesson for October 31, 1909. Paul a Prisoner—The Voyage, Acts 27:1-26. Golden Text: "Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in him, and he shall bring it to pass," Ps. 37:5. Memory verses, 22-24.

The Stormy Coast

After two weeks of this terrible experience, in which they had managed to avoid the African coast by desperate efforts, but were wholly unaware of their position, they found themselves one night approaching land. Without compass the ancient mariner had to depend wholly upon the sight of the heavens for his course. But the heavens they had not seen by day or night for all this time. They had no conjecture, therefore, where they were. The darkness added fresh terror to the situation. The noise of the breakers they could hear in the distance, but there was no comfort in the sound, for the coast meant only a more certain death. Their soundings showed that they were coming closer to the shore, and with the greatest anxiety they let down four anchors out of the stern of the ship, that it might not swing round with the wind, and waited the issue of daynight.

The next morning showed them the island of Malta and with it their most desperate danger. The soldiers decided that their only chance for life consisted in the massacre of the prisoners and a bold dash for shore in the little boat. Paul prevented this by sternly warning the centurion that this step would be fatal. The ship was rapidly going to pieces, having been beached at a point where the surf was very high. The only chance was to cling to floating bits of the wreck. At last all the 276 men got safely to land in one way or another. And so another peril of Paul's life was safely passed and he was set down in this strange and hazardous manner upon a spot which has been memorable from that day to this as one of the interesting scenes in his journey to Rome. From this place onward the voyage was made in safety, and soon Paul came to the shores of Italy, where rejoicing friends welcomed him and bore him company to the gates of Rome.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

TOPIC OCTOBER 20.

The Cynic's Challenge Accepted. Psalm 4:6-8.

This topic might have been stated, "The Slanderer Answered." Some one told a malicious lie. The psalmist and his associates were brought into trouble and danger. He prayed for protection and for the revival of faith in the hearts of those who were discouraged by the tongue of slander. His enemy may have been a cynic. Doubtless there is a cynical element in the character of every liar. Men who have no regard for the truth cannot be said to have profound faith in the moral outcome of human endeavor. Perhaps we are justified in classing the liar among the cynics.

The Slander of the Multitude

"Thou shalt not take up a false report." The ancient command does not deter many who pretend to believe the Bible "from cover to cover" from accepting with eagerness and spreading with zeal false reports about public men. Dr. Osler made a facetious remark about the disposal of men sixty years old and many believe, in spite of all explanations, that he advocated the chloroforming of old people. If we would only deal honestly with the reputations of men, the truth would have a better chance. Had we asked the question, "Is it likely that a man of Dr. Osler's standing and ability would advocate the killing of old people?" the absurdity of the report about him would have been manifest. We have no right to believe on the testimony of some reporter unknown to us that a man honored by leading universities for his knowledge and character is acting like a mental and moral idiot. If the multitude delighted in the truth as much as it does in the sensational, there would be no ground for the conviction of a foreign writer that "no civilized country in the world has been content with newspapers so grossly contemptible as those which are read from New York to San Francisco." The inaccuracies of the newspaper are the inaccuracies of their readers. We have not sufficiently developed our sense of responsibility for what we read.

Who Will Show Us Any Good?

The faint-hearted among those whom the psalmist represented began to doubt whether fortune would ever smile upon them again. They and not their enemies asked, "Who will show us any good?" But the discouraged man is always in danger of becoming a cynic. One who feels that the world holds nothing good for him will have difficulty in believing that justice and truth are more than idle dreams. The psalmist was saved by his faith in God. He lay down to sleep in the confidence that his destiny was in the keeping of Jehovah and that slanderous tongues could do him no permanent injury. His faith put him in possession of a future in which he saw the vindication of the righteous. It is the function of religion to give meaning to the present moment by disclosing the possibilties of the soul. The religious man does not act according to the pleasure or pain of the moment; these do not constitute his measure of value. He fixes the value of an experience in accordance with its spiritual content. The malicious lie may be embarrassing for a time but he will not shun his duty and he will not be alienated from God because some one has said the thing that is not true. It used to be required of men of honor that they display their love of truth by fighting any one who lied about them. In some benighted parts of the world today pistols and knives are considered the most persuasive arguments for personal dignity and integrity. The man of faith disposes of slander by what he shows himself to be. George Washington was maligned by political opponents. His answer was his service to his country. He did not desert the post of duty to indulge in wrathful denunciations of his detractors. His is an example of true faith. We trust God when we devote all our energies to the righteous cause.

Christian Endeavor

By W. D. Endres

TOPIC OCTOBER 24.

Why Some Men and Women Do Not Succeed. Josh. 1:1-9.

The question of success is a question of ideals. We succeed when we realize that for which we strive. If the ideal be low and unworthy, the success will be of like character, if the ideal noble and lofty, then the success will be of the same nature. Mr. Harriman acquired both fame and riches. Viewed from these standpoints he was a great success; but because of the business methods employed in the building up of his fortune we do not think of pointing him out to American boys and girls as a moral ideal.

Christian Success

From the Christian point of view there is little doubt as to what we mean by success. Certainly it is not the gratification of a vain ambition, nor is it the piling up of a great fortune. It is the achievement of a good character which can be realized only by adherence to and the doing of worthy deeds. Too often we assume if we do not say that only those succeed who attain a personal distinction in a given field of activity. But to choose such a standard is to doom ninety-nine out of one hundred persons to failure. Only a few men become famous through their fortune, or their accomplishments in science, invention or art. Who in your community has attained such distinction? Possibly one, but most likely none at all. Are you willing to admit that the thousands who make up your community along with yourself are failures in life? Are they not honest? Do they not toil? Do they not have good homes? Are they not companionable? Is not the world a little brighter for their having lived? Then have they failed? Impossible! He who has been clean in his personal life, true to his family, industrious in his daily task, just to his fellows, kind to the helpless and walks humbly before his God has succeeded even though an ungrateful world allows his bones to bleach in a potter's field.

Such a standard places success in the reach of any man, no matter how lowly his station or narrow his opportunity. The opportunity is before the washerwoman and the princess alike. The widowed mother who supports her children with her daily wage may be just as successful as the multi-millionaire, with a long record of philanthropic deeds. Many people fail of success because their ideas of what success is are erroneous.

Need of Will and Courage

Nor must we overlook two very essential qualifications in every man's equipment for success. Oversight here is the cause of many failures in life. They are force of will and courage of conviction. These are pleasure loving days and we buy it sometimes at great cost. Two young men threw off what they called the restraints of the Christian life, and sought the pleasures of dissipation, carousals, and sensual indulgences. After a time they tired of them, told their pastor what they had been doing, and sought such relief as he was able to give. But when told what to do, one did not have the courage to right himself before the world. The other lacked courage and strength to do alone what both acknowledged to be right. They are living in sin and misery today and making confessed failures of their lives. These young men are types of thousands who are ruining their lives because they lack courage and force of character.

Church Life

Charles S. Earley has moved from Lenora, to Hill City, Kan., where he has accepted a call to preach.

Arthur Downs, minister at Mayview, Mo., is holding a meeting with his home church assisted by Charles E. McVay as singer.

The Disciples of Mississippi are looking forward with enthusiasm to their state convention to be held October 28.

T. A. Boyer of the First Church, Oakland, Cal., was called to Illinois by the death of his father.

Grenville Snell is in a good meeting at Mound City, Mo. A week ago there had been sixteen accessions to the church.

J. T. Ogle, Paris, Texas, was sent to the Centennial by his church. This expression of esteem will yield a ten-fold harvest for the church.

Rev. Harry F. Burns, Office Editor of the Christian Century.

The church at Greenville, Ill., is planning for a great meeting in January led by Evangelists Violett and Dakin—Ivan W. Agee is the minister there.

Guy I. Hoover and wife, of Tipton, Ind., are attending the Centenial convention, with light hearts, for their church, very graciously, pays their expenses of travel.

C. E. Boynton, Huntsville, Texas, has accepted a call to the North Side Church, Dallas, Texas, and will begin work there about the first of November.

Chas. M. Schoonover and wife are attending the Centennial Convention by the courtesy of their church at Bonham, Texas, which elected them delegates with all expenses paid.

H. H. Wilson of the North Side Church, Fresno, Cal., has accepted a call to the Pacific Grove, Cal., church. His people at Fresno greatly regret his departure.

The church at Manilla, Ind., with W. R. Jinnett as pastor, has just closed a meeting in which they had the assistance of Roscoe C. Smith as evangelist and F. E. Trucksess as singer.

Large audiences greeted W. B. Craig the two Sundays of his ministry with the Lenox Ave. Church, New York city, October 3 and 10. It is reported that the church has called Mr. Craig as pastor.

Two more churches—Armington, Ill., and Maryville, Mo.,—are sending their pastors to the Centennial Convention. John C. Lappin and L. O. Bricker are the respective pastors. This growing custom among our good churches is both just and courteous and should become a habit everywhere.

A. L. Ward, pastor of the church at Boulder, Colo., reports that more than one hundred people have expressed their preference for the Christian Church, in the union meetings being held by "Billy" Sunday in that city.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Craig, of Logansport, Ind., have but recently returned from a two months' vacation spent in Canada and the Northwest. Mr Craig has announced a series of sermons on the general subject, "Messages from Mountains, Clouds, Deserts, and Rivers."

Nathaniel and Ezra Jacks, father and son, closed a meeting at Clarendon, Texas, September 27, in which there were forty-four additions to the church. The evangelists speak highly of the work of the pastor, J. D. White.

H. E. VanHorn has just entered upon his fourth year of service with the church at Capitol Hill, Des Moines. The Des Moines church has a way of keeping its preachers with them, and the growth of the churches there is in no small degree due to this fact.

J. C. Todd is doing excellent work at Bloomington, Ind. The church in this university town is rapidly becoming one of the best in the brotherhood. It supports Mrs. Alexander Paul, Wuhu, China, as Living-link missionary.

H. M. Garn, lately pastor of the church at Augusta, Ill., has been elected teacher of New Testament Greek in Christian University, Canton, Mo. Mr. Garn has a good educational equipment for his work, and the school at Canton is to be congratulated upon adding him to her faculty.

The Teacher Training Class of the Los Angeles City Union has selected E. W. Thornton of the Naomi Avenue Christian Church as their instructor. He has nearly 100 Sunday-school teachers now enrolled. Mr. Thornton has equipped himself especially for this work.

W. F. Turner of the Central Church, assisted William Price, minister at the Howett Street Chapel, Peoria, Ill., in a meeting continuing eighteen days with twenty-one confessions of faith and seven others added to the church. C. H. Altheide led the music. The attendance and general interest was splendid. Mr. Turner says "the people had a mind to work," and predicts good things for the chapel in the future.

Miss Martha Abigail Keeler, the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Keeler, of the Englewood Church, Chicago, entered into the larger life, September 26, 1909. Miss Keeler had since her eleventh year been a member of the Englewood Church, and unusually active in its work. She had but recently become a teacher in the Sunday-school, and at the funeral service conducted by her pastor, C. G. Kindred, the class attended in a body.

John R. Ewers, of Our Church Men department, and pastor of the East End Church, Pittsburg, is making large plans for the development of the Sunday-school. In his bulletin he says, "We propose to make our Sunday-school the best department in this church. The best people are to teach, the best equipment is to be secured, the most modern methods are to be employed, the graded lessons are to be introduced, and new scholars are to be attracted to our elegant school."

A very successful work has been accomplished in a quiet way by J. P. Myers, pastor of the church at Shelbyville, Ind. This congregation built a beautiful new church in 1901; since that time they have been heavily burdened with debt. About a year ago they were led by their pastor to undertake as a Centennial aim, the clearing the church of all indebtedness. They are within three hundred dollars of the goal, and have set October 10 as a day for a great celebration and mortgage burning.

Our presses begin to turn too early this week to publish the usual telegrams. Many of our readers will be able to get the latest reports face to face with the evangelists and other workers at Pittsburg. However, we have on hand a wire from W. J. Minges, received October 4, too late for publication last week. It comes from Kansas City, Mo., and says "Thirty-two added yesterday; two hundred and fifty-one in seventeen days. Considering size of church and limited field, this meeting is a signal victory. Meeting continues."

The new $25,000 church was dedicated at Petersburg, Ill., the last Sunday in September by F. M. Rains. At the time of the dedication there remained an indebtedness of $7,500, but this was more than provided for by the pledges of the day. A thing prophetic of a better day was the attitude of the other churches, every one of which dismissed its services that they might have fellowship with the Christian Church, and they joined with her in rejoicing at the dedication of this beautiful house of worship free of all indebtedness.

Word has been reecived at this office of the death of J. B. Mayfield, until recently pastor of the church at Butler, Mo., where his son, W. M. Mayfield, now ministers. It will be remembered by many readers of the Christian Century that only last spring Brother Mayfield was compelled on account of failing health to give up his work at Butler. For many years Brother Mayfield has been pastor of churches in Illinois and Missouri, and in each of these states there are many to whom the announcement of his death will bring sadness, and who will find their consolation in the hope of the Christian.

A lack of grace is too frequently shown by a new pastor toward the work of his predecessor. Sometimes the incoming leader is tempted to describe the condition of the church in depreciative terms in order to enhance the significance of his own work. This is not so with B. H. Cleaver, who has just taken the church at Lewiston, Ill. His appreciation of the ministry of Walter Kline who preceded him is refreshing. "Mr. Kline did much for the congregation," he says, "bringing it to a place of respect in the city. This is a county seat, the church building is rather inadequate, but the congregation is united and anxious to do larger things. Especially is this true of the Bible-school, which was more than quadrupled during Mr. Kline's ministry."

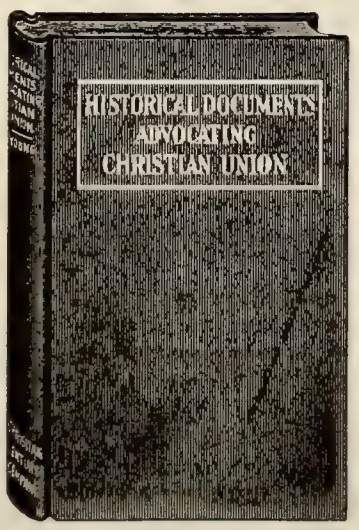
Another church has been dedicated in Baltimore, Md., named the Wilhelm Park Church. It is an outgrowth of a mission which has been conducted for several years at Wilhelm Park, the meetings being held at the home of various members of the congregation. Funds for the erection of the church were raised by popular subscription, and the lot on which the building stands was donated to the congregation by the Union Stock Yards Company. Thomas B. Shearer, of Flemington, Pa., who will be pastor of the church, delivered his first sermon in the new building before a large gathering on the evening of dedication day, October 3. Peter Ainslee

Centennial Hymn

By W. T. Moore.

Tune—"Eventide."

One hundred fruitful years have rolled away,
Our faithful pioneers have gone to rest;
And here on this memorial, happy day,
We honor those who now are with the blest.



But while we honor all our sainted dead,
We'll praise him most who made their lives complete,
We'll place the victor's crown upon his head,
While all assembled here bow at his feet.

Then gracious Lord accept the praise we bring,
'Tis all on earth we have to offer thee;
Make glad our thankful hearts while now we sing
Thy praise on this our second jubilee.

And as we turn to meet the coming strife,
May thy strong arm uphold and keep us still,
Be to us yet the Way, the Truth, the Life,
And we will try to humbly do thy will.

officiated at the dedicatory service, assisted by B. A. Abbott and H. F. Lutz.

By courtesy of his church, E. J. Arnot, of the Northwest Mission, Chicago, will attend the Centennial celebration at Pittsburg.

James N. Crutcher is speaking to large audiences in his church at Sioux City, Ia., and the church is most hopeful over the prospects for growth. Mr. Crutcher will not attend the Centennial convention, being detained by a union meeting under the leadership of W. E. Beiderwolf, which begins October 10. Immediately after the close of this meeting Mr. Crutcher will lead his church in a two weeks' meeting.

Cecil J. Armstrong, pastor at Troy, N. Y., is prospering exceptionally in his work this year. Perhaps no little of his success is due to the habit of private preparation for his pulpit ministry. In a personal note to a friend he reveals the fact that he reads one good sermon every morning when he first reaches his study. "I do not read it," he says, "from a homiletical point of view, nor do I read for sermonic material. I read it for the spiritual good that I can get from it. I try to imagine that the gifed preacher is in his pulpit and I am in his audience." If sermons are good for the people they are surely equally good for a preacher. And inasmuch as the preacher has but little chance to hear preaching it is well for him to habitually cultivate such a habit as Mr. Armstrong describes.

The University Church, Bethany, Nebraska, was dedicated the first Sunday in October. F. M. Rains was in charge of the service. This new building is one of the most beautiful, most commodious, and serviceable houses of worship in the state. It is built of Milwaukee pressed brick, with cement stone trimmings and tile roof. The auditorium has a seating capacity of fifteen hundred and the Sunday-school assembly room of one thousand. There are twenty-four Sunday-school class rooms in the building and each department of the school can meet in a room of its own. Harry Otis Pritchard has been pastor of this church for two years, and it is under his leadership that this great work has been accomplished.

At Albia, Iowa, where C. V. Allison is pastor, a record has been made during the last year which shows what business management can accomplish. A year ago when Mr. Allison became pastor of the church there was a debt of $2,200, accumulated by current expense deficits. Now the regular offerings of the church have exceeded the expenses even during the summer months. The pastor says the changed conditions are because of the work of the finance committee, which secures a pledge from every member of the church, and then keeps an account with each member, sending out to each one a statement each quarter. When one falls behind with his pledge, the committee sees that a personal call is made and prompt adjustment of the matter arranged.

W. A. Parker, who, during the past eight years has accomplished a very remarkable work at Emporia, Kansas, has resigned and entered Harvard University, where he will pursue a course of study leading to the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. Mr. Parker was one of the important factors in the direction of the work of the Disciples in Kansas, and in his own city, both within and without his church, no one was more universally loved than he. But for some time Mr. Parker has been feeling the need of the special study implied in the work for the higher degree, for the man who would lead the people in meeting the great issues before the church today; therefore his action. He leaves a united church, and one that will doubtless continue to win new battles for the cause.

Eugene N. Duty, the new pastor of the Second Christian Church, at Milwaukee, Wis., corner Prospect avenue and Park place, is a native of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and a graduate of Bethany College, Bethany, Va. Previous to studying for the ministry he was connected with the Mellon National Bank of Pittsburg, the largest banking house in Pennsylvania. He was called to the pastorate of the Chapel Hill (W. Va.) Christian Church and held the position for two years. He is an A. B. of Bethany College and has spent a year in the Yale Graduate and Divinity schools, and had he remained another year he would have taken his M. A. and his theological degree. Mr. Duty expects to finish his course in Chicago University in the near future, while still holding his pastorate in Milwaukee. Mr. Duty is a preacher of more than ordinary merit. He supplied the pastorate at Naugatuck, Conn., during the summer months for the First Baptist Church of Naugatuck, Union City, Conn. While there during the three months from June to September, Mr. Duty took fourteen into the church, seven by confession and baptism and seven by letter or statement. The Second church in Milwaukee was organized during the past summer, Professor Sherman Kirk, of Des Moines, leading them in building a house in less time than a week.

Another church has been after H. O. Breeden to become its pastor. This time it is the Central Church, Denver, Colorado; and their call has been accepted by Dr. Breeden, who began work with the church the first Sunday in October. Dr. Breeden is too well known by the readers of the Christian Century to need a word of commendation at our hands. His work of eighteen years in Des Moines gave him a lasting place in the hearts of Disciples everywhere. For the past three years he has held most helpful meetings in all parts of the country. During the last few months some of the best churches in California, and Eureka College, have sought to bring his genius to the solution of their tasks, but he was not in a position to accede to any of their requests. Mrs. Breeden has been ill for many months, but is now, we are glad to know, rapidly improving, and her physicians think the Colorado climate will be a further benefit to her. This is a great move for this great old church, and we dare to hope that Dr.

Baptists and Disciples are Drawing Nearer Together

Every Disciple and every Baptist will wish to be informed upon the history of the relationship sustained between these two bodies in the early days . The most authoritative work on this subject extant is

The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples

By Dr. Errett Gates

Read what Leading Religious Journals say:

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American church.—The Congregationalist, Boston, Mass.

As one reads this history and then looks in on the present, he is filled with the hope that the separation of 1830 was not final. The Disciples have not changed much. They practically occupy the position of 1830. The Baptists on the other hand have really given up the Philadelphia Confession of Faith with its obsolete Calvinistic doctrines and are so near to us in the New Testament plea that had they occupied this place in 1830 there would never have been a separation. We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature,—The Christian Worker, Pittsburg, Pa.

Breeden's work here may even surpass what he has done in former years.

The Sunday-school at Chagrin Falls, Ohio, held its annual rally October 10. P. C. Hill is superintendent.

Nelson H. Trimble, pastor of the Christian Center, Baltimore, has been extended a call to become pastor of the Metropolitan Church, Chicago, from whose pastorate A. T. Campbell recently resigned. The wife of Mr. Trimble, is an ordained minister and is assistant pastor of Christian Center. Mrs. Trimble is conducting evangelistic meetings at Fork, Baltimore County, Md., and twelve members have already been added to the church. At Joppa, Md., a meeting held recently by Mrs. Trimble resulted in fourteen new members.

The Christian Temple of Baltimore, Md., celebrated the eighteenth anniversary of the pastor, Peter Ainslee, Sunday, October 3. The church was richly decorated and a special program of service rendered. A number of letters of congratulation were read from prominent ministers throughout the brotherhood. In his address to his congregation Mr. Ainslee pointed out some items of growth during the years of his leadership. He said in part: "This day marks the eighteenth anniversary of my ministry with this same congregation, which on October 1, 1891, numbered less than one hundred, and now it has become one of the largest in the city. In these years I have seen four churches sent out from this congregation and a mission planted and maintained by this congregation at Wuhu, China. I have also seen the undenominational home for young ladies established at 1524 West Fayette street, which has had on its register the names of more than 300 young ladies in the ten years of its history. I have likewise seen the seminary open its sixth session for Bible study; I have seen the beginning of an orphanage society and I have seen eighteen of our young people enter the ministry or other schools for larger preparation for the ministry and missionary fields. I have seen the valuation of our property, including the temple and its branches, increase from $10,000 to $115,000 in these years." Mr. Ainslee will ask his people at the end of two years more of pastoral ministry to give him a two years' leave of absence that he may do evangelistic work to which he has been often called.

Dr. Arthur Holmes, whom many of our readers will remember for his address at the Congress last year, and who has been for four years Religious Work Director of the Y. M. C. A., Philadelphia, has just accepted the position of Instructor in Psychology in the University of Pennsylvania. Mr. Holmes received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from this university last year. He and J. B. Lichtenberger, who has just entered upon his duties as Assistant professor of Sociology in the University of Pennsylvania, will represent the Disciples in this great university. Of the work of Dr. Holmes the Philadelphia Y. M. C. A. bulletin says: "Our religious and educational activities have been brought to a high state of efficiency under his careful direction. In this connection we quote our General Chairman's comment on his service: 'Dr. Holmes' resignation is accepted with sincere regret, as I feel he has rendered a valuable and very satisfactory service to our Association in connection with the religious and educational work. I wish you would tender him the very best wishes of myself as well as the other members of the Committee of Management for his success in the important position which he is about to accept in the Psychological Department of the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Holmes is an Ohioan, reared in the country, where he laid the foundation of his education in a district school. With an early mechanical bent, he spent several years at a trade, which brought him the double result of means to secure further college training and the practical disposition which has opened to him the fraternity of railroad men. In 1899 he was graduated from Hiram College, Ohio, and entered immediately upon the double task of a pastorate in Philadelphia and graduate work in the University. In 1904 he finished his graduate course, spent a year in teaching and preaching, with further study in Ann Arbor, Michigan, at the State University, and came to the Y. M. C. A. in 1905. He received his doctorate from the University here in 1908."

The Third Church, Indianapolis, has broken ground for the new building at Broadway and Seventeenth street. The new property will represent an outlay of about $80,000. Harry G. Hill is serving his third year with this wide awake congregation.

Granville Snell recently held a very pleasant meeting with the Orchid Church, DeKalb County, Mo. Results, twenty additions, fifteen confessions and baptisms. The music was in charge of Charles M. Wales, pastor of Union Star. Mr. Snell is to return for a meeting there next year.

The Richland, Mo., meeting conducted by J. M. Lowe, closed Oct. 3, with twenty-three accessions, mostly men, a goodly number for a discouraged conutry church. The evangelist was well paid and a neat sum left in the treasury. New lights were installed, a C. E. Society organized. Mr. Lowe is now in a short meeting at New Bloomfield, Mo., where a new church was dedicated last Sunday by T. A. Abbott.

Walter L. Martin has closed his work with the University Heights Church, Fredonia, California, and will after the Centennial be ready to accept other work. During the last year of Mr. Martin's service at Fredonia there were fifty-six accessions to the church in regular services, and special attention was given to the work of the Sunday-school.

The Sunday-schools of Bonham, Texas, are an important feature of the life of the city. During September, the average attendance for all the schools of the city was 2,012, and the total offering $55.42. At the Christian church the average attendance was 395. The time has come when the man who would make a true estimate of the forces that make the life of a town, or country, can not fail to consider the Sunday-school.

A Beautiful Gift Book for Anniversary or Christmas

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.
700 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO

Chicago

By Orvis F. Jordan

The past three weeks we have been outlining the present possessions of the Disciples of Christ in Chicago. We have ventured to lay bare our weakness along with describing our strength. We have dragged the skeleton from many a family closet and have dealt with the utmost candor with our situation here. We are now turning from the role of historian and diagnostician to that of prophet. Here we shall have more liberty, though we shall endeavor to prophesy upon the basis of our present achievements.

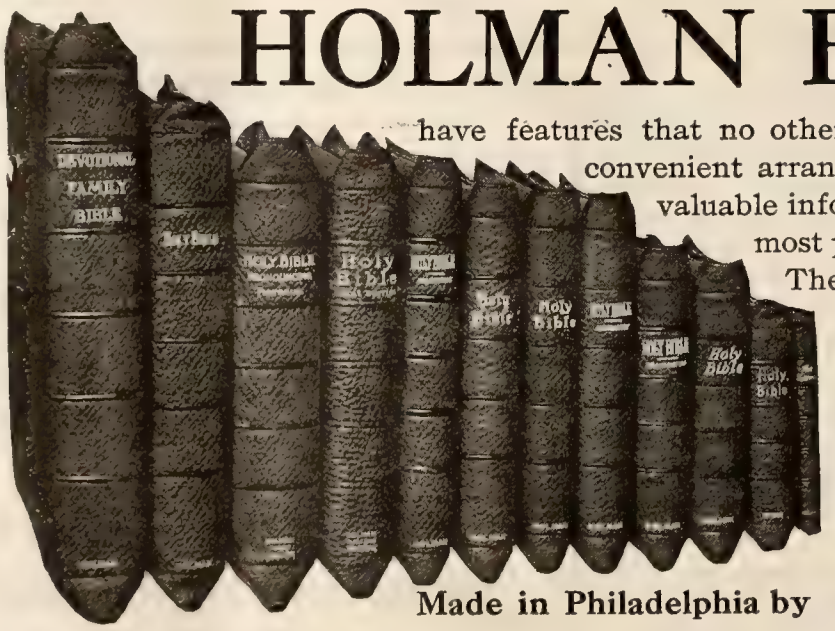
Our Present Possessions

We have not lived all these years in Chicago in vain. As the decades have come and gone, we have gained vision through experience and are more ready than ever to attack our problems. It is a long sweep from the time when the pastor of the largest church in Chicago wanted that we should have a single central church in the city, to the present hour when we are frankly recognizing the necessity of diverse churches with varied programs. Of the fifty years of history in Chicago and more, no period has been more fruitful than the past fifteen years. For our first twenty-five years we had only four churches to show for our labors and none of them housed in adequate buildings. The past fifteen years we have increased this number until we have twenty-two churches with settled ministries and now several of our churches have buildings worth thirty or forty thousand dollars and we have a total of eighteen church buildings either partially or totally paid for.

Not only do we have the five thousand Disciples in the twenty-two churches, but we can boast of an unusually competent group of church workers in the ministry and the laity. Our ministry will strike a higher average in ability and education than any other in the city. We have a larger per cent of university trained men and have more men known over the city in proportion to our numbers than any other group here. Where in Chicago is there a preacher like our Dr. Willett? Where is there a pastor in any pulpit of the city with more thorough scholarship or with keener analysis of church problems than Dr. Ames? Where is there a writer in the city's ministry with a more human touch than that of George Campbell? We pause not from lack of other names that are worthy of mention. With a group of preachers only one-fourth as large as the next largest religious body in the city, and only one-tenth the size of the Methodist ministry, we are given an equal share in the councils and projects of the city's life. In our ministry are the younger men who will not simply pattern the strength of the older group, but are already striking out in new paths of achievement.

Our churches, too, have learned much. Through the survival of the fittest we have at last a group of churches adapted to the city environment. Many have died in the days gone by and many have been born. Out of them all is a group that has esprit de corps and experience in the city task. They were projected on a wave of revivalism. They have learned to be conservative and constructive in their methods and to suspect the newly arrived leader who would finish the task in six months. They have evangelism more than any group of churches in the brotherhood, but it is a quiet, teaching evangelism that is producing the solid results that were achieved by the similar evangelism of the fathers of the movement.

We have a missionary policy which is intensive rather than expansive. We have looked out on the work of the great religious bodies who have succeeded in Chicago. We have seen that they struck a blow only with a clinched fist. They never went into a community except with a program big enough to succeed. We are now working on this plan. We are paying enough to get good mission pastors, some of them as strong as our largest churches can employ. We are getting ready to stimulate and aid building projects. We are refraining from going into new communities without seeing our way clear to carry on a worthy work. Such a policy could only come out of experience. From the mistakes of the past, as well as its successes, we have our guidance for the future.



What We May Expect to Come to Pass Shortly

We are on the eve of greater things in Chicago. Our brethren here have keenly felt the rebuke which came with the publishing of the pictures of our church buildings. One pastor jocularly offered to bribe us if we would not print the picture of his place of worship. But we are soon to have better church buildings. We think that before next Easter we shall join in the dedication of three new church buildings in Chicago at Austin, Evanston and Chicago Heights. These are but preliminary steps in each community toward buildings that will be worth fifty thousand dollars each. Other churches are on the eve of building so that within five years, the grouping of our church buildings will tell another story.

Our churches are on the eve of trying new methods. The Irving Park church proposes introducing a building for social purposes fulfilling the function of a Y. M. C. A., since there is no such organization in the suburb. The new Austin building will be called the "Annex" or some similar name, for it will be the home of social activities. The Chicago Heights church is projecting a social program. The Hyde Park church has its own peculiar methods. The Harvey church is now busy studying local needs with social program in view. The Evanston church has several institutional features in actual operation, among them a night school—the only one in the suburb—with an enrollment of twenty-five. The Metropolitan church will erect an out and out down-town institutional church. The Englewood pastor dreams of a training school and a neighborhood house. This does not exhaust the list of programs for social effectiveness. We have had our period of dogmatic interest. It has left our ministry with a great majority on the side of a modern theology. We are now to have our period of social interest in which we shall avail ourselves of modern thinking in an even more vital way.

We are shortly to have more initiative in the great movements of the city. We are represented in the best clubs of the town. Here the prophets of Chicago's future gather from every profession and every walk of life. Our men have come to have ideas about things and programs for action. It shall soon be that we will not simply be asked to co-operate but we shall find the religious forces of Chicago looking to us for leadership in critical times.

Why We May Hope for Great Success in Chicago

While we may frankly recognize that we have not yet attained, we have no reason for pessimism over the ultimate outcome. Some would say, the Disciples are a rural people and will never succeed in the cities. All churches were predominantly rural fifty years ago. Some have made more rapid adjustment. We are destined to make more thorough adjustment.

First of all, we shall succeed in Chicago and in every metropolis because we are liberal. "In matters of opinion, liberty" is not an idle boast for the Disciples, even in the light of recent events. No self-appointed pope has ever gotten undisputed sway among us. No attempt at the suppression of free speech has ever succeeded or is likely to succeed. The city man is by nature a radical. He will brook no church that would put a blind bridle on him. There is no church in the city today with such a definite program and yet with such a range of liberty along with it as have we. It augurs our acceptance by the city mind.

We shall succeed in the cities because we are democratic. We are democratic by reason of our recent extraction from the country life. We are democratic because we have a brief history and few traditions. It is our good fortune that we have no more immensely rich men than we have. The note of democracy has been sounded in the city and will be taken up by a million voices. We have no rented pews to bar out the poor. We have not even a clerical aristocracy. We shall be a church of the people, with some very rich and some very poor, but with the solid and moral middle class in our ranks.

The test of a prophet in Deuteronomy is whether his word comes to pass. We feel there is no soul in our brotherhood that has true reason to hope for anything other than success in our great cities.

Gipsy Smith in Chicago

Gypsy Smith began his Chicago campaign last Sunday evening, and before the greatest congregation that ever greeted an evangelist in this city. The crowds were simply overwhelming. They began to gather in front of the Seventh Regiment Armory building, where the meetings are held, in the middle of the afternoon, and at 6:30 the building was packed. But still the throng came, filling the street and spilling over into adjacent halls. Overflow meetings were started, and policemen were summoned to handle the crowds. It is doubtful whether any other evangelist in the world could have drawn such a multitude, and the President of the United States would hardly have met with such a greeting.

An Amazing Spectacle.

The spectacle within the building was amazing. The great armory extends from street to street, and its galleries are like hill sides. Every foot of this vast space, except the passage ways, was occupied. The churches of the city seemed to have emptied themselves into the building. Many persons had come long distances, for the armory is not located in a church neighborhood. How many of the unconverted element were there is difficult to say. But it was the typical Chicago multitude on such occasions, laughing freely over every little pleasantry of speech and applauding enthusiastically when a sentiment struck them on the right spot. The good brethren who say "Amen" and "Hallelujah" also were there.

The choir was immense and the singing as good as could be expected under a low roof. The preliminaries were numerous. Chairmen introduced chairmen, and then Dr. Gunsaulus was introduced to welcome and introduce Gypsy Smith. The peerless pulpit orator did his part in great form, and there was warm applause when he said that what ailed Chicago was sin, and what it needed was the redemption of the Cross. Dr. Gunsaulus' oratorical voice and majestic tones made it a little difficult for the weaker vocal organs of the evangelist. But the Gypsy's high tenor voice has good carrying qualities, and, while it sometimes broke into harsh fragments when he attempted to be emphatic, yet he reached the outer rim of the great assemblage with good effect.

The Old Pathos.

The old pathos, with a suggestion of tears, is still in his tones and there are times of tremendous earnestness. But his first sentences were broken by long pauses and the delivery was painfully slow. However, almost any preacher can warm up when he is "going for church members," and that was what the evangelist did—they all do. A lot of church members spend time and money getting ready for an evangelist and a multitude of other members leave their churches to attend his meetings, and then he sails into them. Finney did it, Moody did it, Billy Sunday does it with a vengeance—they all do it. It may be heaven's appointed way.

Are You Christians?

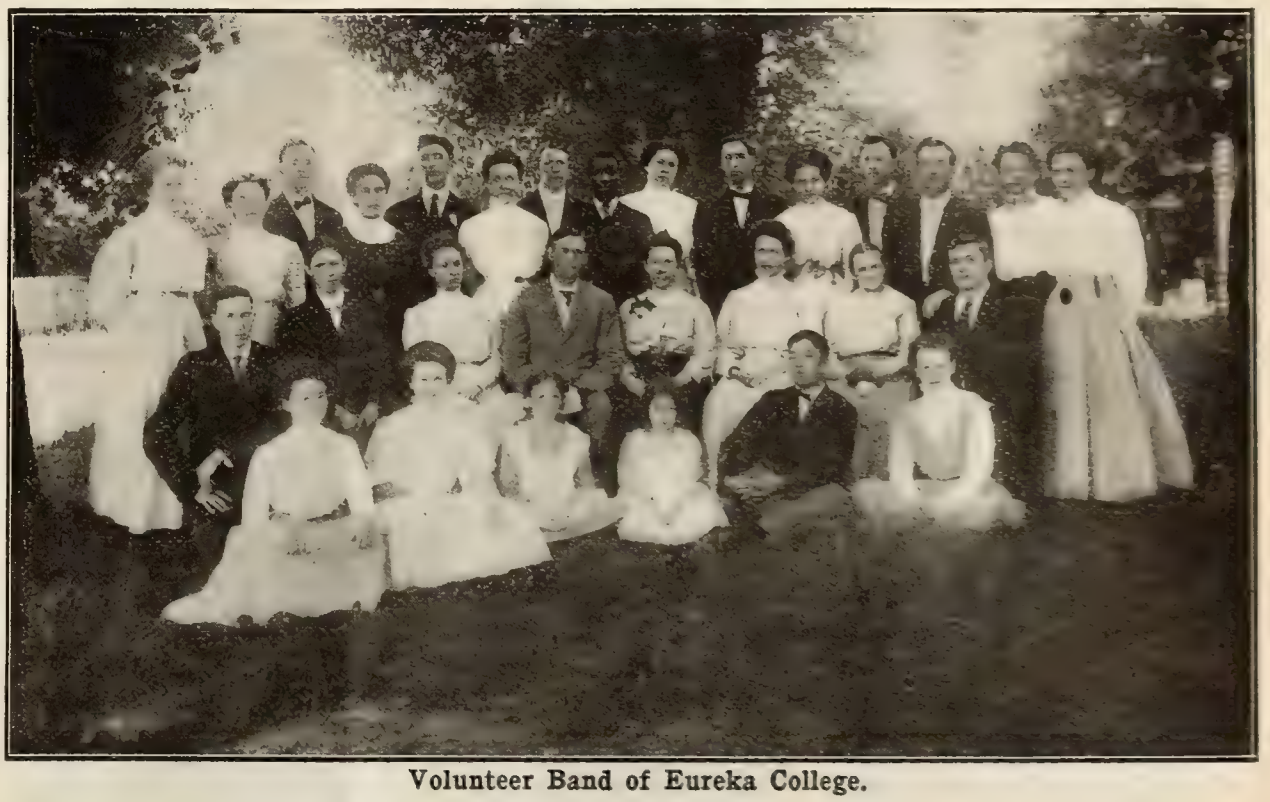
But the first question which Gypsy Smith raised was, "Are you Christians, or are you good on Sunday and bad all the rest of the week?" And he hammered it in so hard that the great majority of Christians present must have been ready to say with the Apostle Paul that they were the chief of sinners.

The evangelist then passed to the critics and besought them to keep still until the meetings were over. Then they could judge by the whole result. But if they did not like his way they ought either to do bigger things in their own way or to keep still. In a word Gypsy Smith's reply to the critics is the same as Billy Sunday's—"let them deliver the goods."

The discourse could not be called a sermon, but was of the character of a preliminary address. It ended, however, with a solemn appeal to all who "wanted to be better" to stand up. There were many responses to this modest request and moderate test. But the daily papers were hardly justified in calling them all conversions, as they did the next morning.

In behalf of the Evangelistic Council, which is managing the meetings, it was announced that $8,000 had already been spent in preparation for the campaign, for chairs, advertising and other expenses. The council has shown great enterprise and devotion in its efforts to make the campaign a complete success.

Chicago Church Notes



The next Quarterly Rally of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society will be held in the First M. E. Church building at the corner of Clark and Washington streets, October 24, at 3:00 p. m. The main addresses will be by Dr. Edgar P. Hill, superintendent of the Presbyterian Missions in Chicago and by Dr. H. L. Willett who will speak on the Pittsburg convention.

A general change of pulpits is planned for the first Sunday in November. Each pastor will be sent to another church than his own by a committee appointed for that purpose. Each visiting pastor is expected to speak on Chicago missions.

The Austin church began excavations for their new building a week or so ago. They will build on the rear of the lot a building for the Sunday-school, and the institutional activities of the church. This preliminary section of the building will cost about eigth thousand dollars. The congregation is meeting in a hall while they wait for the completion of the building. It will be remembered that their old building was destroyed by fire a year and a half ago. They expect to dedicate at Christmas time.

The Volunteer Band of Eureka College

Eureka College has perhaps the most remarkable band of volunteers in the United States. Out of a total student attendance last year of less than two-hundred there were twenty-seven in the band of volunteer missionaries. Some of these graduated last year. One of them. Miss Edna Eck, will go to Bolenge in November. Two others, William Adams and Ernest Pearson, are studying medicine this year preparatory to going to the field. It is safe to say that an unusually large percentage of them will go to the field in the course of the next few years. The writer had the privilege of teaching nearly all of them in college mission courses and knows their temper. They are dead in earnest. Last winter they went in groups to the churches far and near, showing stereopticon views of mission lands and scenes and holding missionary rallies. They reached altogether a multitude of people with their message and their inspiration. They are planting a like campaign this winter. They come back more enthused than ever over the great work of carrying the Good Tidings to all the world and they leave an inspiration behind that could only come from such a band of consecrated young missioners.

Volunteer Band of Eureka College.

In the group in this picture are the two little daughters of Dr. Dye, and Mark Njoji, the colored man who was here with Dr. and Mrs. Dye last year, aiding in translation. Another is Michio Nakamura of Tokio Bible College who is at Eureka studying to be more useful to the cause in his native land. With the increased attendance at the college this year there should be others added to this band that holds so much promise to that greatest of all lives—the life that goes unto the uttermost for help of their fellows.

Pictorial Bethany and Photographs of the Centennial Convention

One of America's greatest photographers—Mr. R. W. Johnston—has prepared a series of superb views of Bethany, W. Va., and vicinity, and told a sympathetic story of those whose names were associated in the beginning of the nineteenth century with the restoration of primitive Christianity.

The plates are large and remarkably clear and distinct, and are printed by the duotone process, which gives to an unusual degree the impression of beholding the actual scenes.

Among the particularly beautiful views are those of Brush Run Church, Buffalo Creek, where the Campbells were baptized, and the panorama of Bethany.

Whatever the camera can preserve of convention sights and scenes will also be reproduced in a supplement by this master scenic artist, and both sent prepaid on receipt of fifty cents.

Pittsburg, Pa.

The Centennial at Home, in Permanent Home

Every word spoken in any session of the Centennial will be taken down in shorthand. All that is of permanent value and vital interest will be printed in the Official Report—a volume of over five hundred pages, 5½x8, in fine cloth binding, with gold side stamp and illustrations showing over two hundred persons and points of note. Whether or not you attend the convention, you want to secure the masterly addresses and the full proceedings of this epoch-making gathering of the Churches of Christ.

To enable every home to have a copy of this monumental work, the committee has placed the price to advance subscribers at $1.00. During the first thirty days following the convention the price will be $1.25, and after that period $1.50. In each case the committee pays postage or express charges. All orders must be accompanied by cash payment.

The number of the Reports will be limited. Those who order now will be sure to receive their copies promptly upon publication.

A Respite

EMMA A. LENTE.

I said unto my tired Heart: Let's go away together;
We'll leave these murky, smoky skies, and find the bright, blue weather;
We'll breathe the air of piney hills, and drink at sparkling fountains;
And see no stretch of high-walled streets, but gaze on glorious mountains.

Oh, far and far we'll go away, beyond the reach of worry.
And, where the hours are long and still, forget our rush and hurry.
No clanging bell, or 'phone, or rule shall summon us to duty;
We will put by the stress of life, and find some of its beauty.

For Mother Nature gladly gives to seekers her dear treasures;
She welcomes us to fields and woods, with all their varied pleasures—
To quiet streams and leafy shade, to pools and grassy reaches,
To breeze-swept hills, and orchard slopes, and stretch of shining beaches.

We'll hear the larks' and thrushes' songs, and children's gleeful laughter,
And days will pass full swift and soon, with sweet nights following after.
Oh, Summer tempts with flowers and fruits, and lures with charms and graces,
So let us slip the leash, and flee to find her restful places!

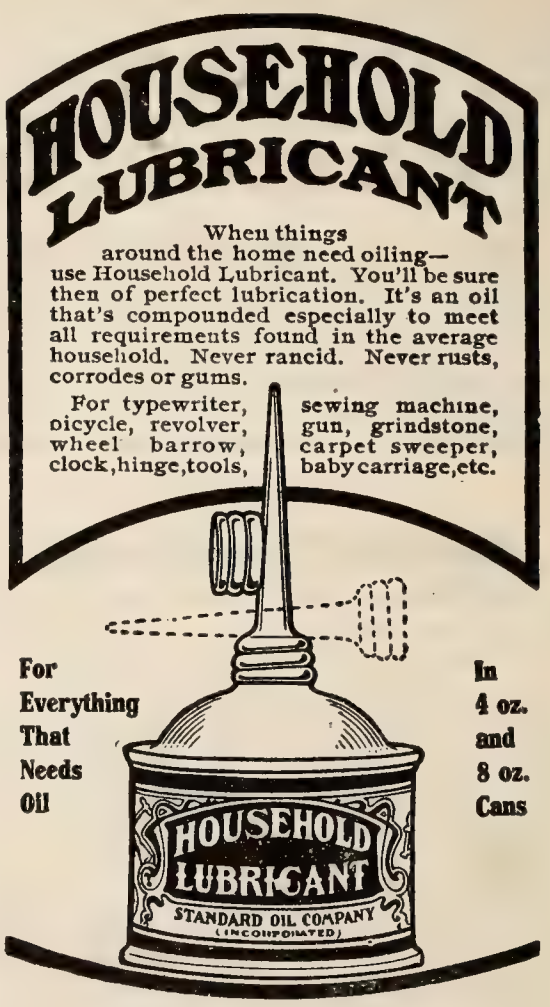
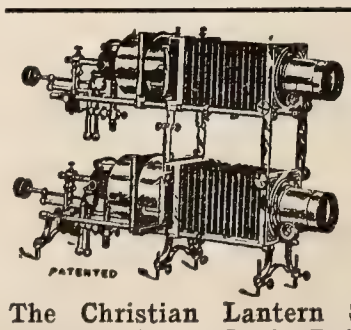
Another Church at Lincoln, Nebraska.



On Lord's Day, October 3, the University Church of Bethany, Nebr. dedicated its new $40,000 house of worship. This is one of the largest and most commodious church buildings in the state of Nebraska. The building is 110 feet in length, exclusive of approaches and steps, and 85 feet in width. It is built of Milwaukee pressed brick with stone trimmings, opalescent glass windows, and tile roofing. It has one of the largest and best equipped Sunday-school plants in the country. There are twenty-five class rooms besides the general Sunday-school assembly room, which has a seating capacity of 1,000. The auditorium is exquisite in every detail, and has a total seating capacity of 1,500. The auditorium is finished throughout with quarter-sawed oak, with heavy ornamental plastering, and delicate tinting in russet, cream and blue. There are offices, rest rooms, parlors, kitchen, dining room and study. This building was erected at an unusually low figure, due to the fact that it was designed by one of the deacons of the church and built by another of the deacons. The architect was J. C. Cordner, and the builder of it F. M. Young—two men of God, consecrated to the work of the Kingdom. It has been said by competent experts that the building could not be duplicated in any of our cities for less than $50,000.



Dedication day witnessed one of the greatest displays of generosity that one is often privileged to see. F. M. Rains, the veteran dedicator, who has dedicated more than 700 church buildings, remarked that it was one of the greatest displays of generosity that he had ever seen. It was necessary to ask for $20,000 in order to clear the building of debt, and not only was this amount quickly reached, but the total amount aggregated $23,500. This is the more remarkable when it is known that there is comparatively little wealth in the congregation, and there was no individual gift on dedication day for more than $500.

Bethany Heights is a suburb of Lincoln, the capital city of Nebraska. It is Lincoln's most beautiful suburb and is rapidly growing in population and prosperity. It is the seat of Cotner University, a school which has the third largest number of students of any of the schools of our brotherhood. The enrollment for this year will aggregate about 500, no students being counted twice. The church and the university have the very closest relationship; hence this was not only a victory for the church but a victory for Cotner University as well.

The Bethany Church is a wonderful church in many respects. First of all, it has more tithers in it than any church in our brotherhood save the one at Bolengi, Africa, where its missionary, Mrs. Royal J. Dye, labors. In the next place, it is a great missionary church, supporting, as has already been suggested, Mrs. Dr. Dye. And the centennial years marks the greatest missionary giving in its history, notwithstanding the fact that during this year it has raised $40,000 for the new church building. It is remarkable also in that many of its members have gone to the foreign field and there are at the present time twenty-five young men and women who are volunteers for Christian work in heathen lands.

The minister of the church is H. O. Pritchard, who has been minister for the congregation for two years. Mr. Pritchard is a Hoosier by birth, having been born and reared near Franklin, Ind. After graduating from the public schools and Franklin High School, he attended Franklin College for two years, then going to Butler College of the University of Indianapolis, where he received the degree of A. B. in 1902, and the degree of M. A. in the same institution in June, 1903. Mr. Pritchard then attended Yale University, receiving the degree of B. D. from that institution in 1906. He has held but two pastorate, the first one at Shelbyville, Ind., where he ministered four years, during which time the church grew in membership, missionary giving and spiritual life. During the present pastorate the University Church has greatly increased in members, generosity and spiritual power. It is one of the truly great churches of our brotherhood. The present relationship between pastor and people is ideal, and the minister is universally loved and respected by the people, and they are equally well loved and respected by him. The church has sent their pastor to Pittsburg and given him a month's leave of absence with salary and expenses.

Mr. Pritchard comes from old Pritchard stock, being related to the venerable Henry R. Pritchard, so universally known and esteemed by the Disciples of Christ. He possesses many of the qualities of his illustrious ancestor, and no doubt will come to have a place among our people equally important to that of his progenitor.

Mr. Pritchard is a frequent contributor to the columns of the Christian Century, the author of the articles which appeared in our column some time ago, entitled "Side Lights on Serious Problems."

The Books Have Closed

The books of the Foreign Society closed September 30 for the missionary year, showing total receipts of $350,685.21. This is a gain of $76,360.82. The churches as churches gave $146,081.60, a gain of $17,733.79. There have been enrolled thirty-one new Living link churches.

These are the largest gains in the history of the Foreign Society.

little, stingy, pusillanimous (look that word up in the dictionary) narrow, inefficient officers. Get big men behind you. Men who will not retrench. Men who have foresight and energy. Men who are not afraid to work themselves as well as lay down tasks for others. Men who have put the real solid coin into the church as into a business. You have heard of Mr. Heinz, the pickle man, the 57 varieties man? I heard him talk in a big Sunday-school convention yesterday. He is a great Sunday-school worker. I heard him declare that his biggest dividends were derived from the Sunday-school. Money, time, organizing ability, talent, all of these he puts into the church work. He is a tower of strength to the Pennsylvania Sunday-school work. And right at his side stands another big laymen, God bless him, Mr. Wanamaker.

When Mr. Wanamaker first organized his store in Philadelphia and started the department store idea, the leading business men of that city of brotherly love went to him and begged him to attend a banquet where he could be praised for his new and great idea. Raising his hand, he said, "Gentlemen, I thank you, but I cannot do that. I am only standing on the scaffolding of my project." Now as you enter his immense stores in Philadelphia and New York you can see the vision that even then had form in the giant brain of this busines king.

Men of Vision Conquer

Give us men of vision, like that, and we shall conquer. But if we are to be led by the reactionaries, by the men who, with microscopes, quarel over theological atoms, by petty beings who see only our own people, who say, "We, as a people," seven times in one breath (and that means so much more than, "We, as a denomination!") if we are to be led by such, our days are numbered.

Again these are days of efficiency. Three great railroads boast that not one person was killed when traveling on their trains last year. That means good tracks, good trains, good signals, efficient trainmen. Faithful and capable, ah, what words! Can the church boast of such service? We carry only two out of six past the age of fourteen in our Sunday-schools. Thousands are spiritually maimed and even killed, by our unfaithful and incapable methods each year. Oh, in this year of boasting, let us bow our heads in shame for our inefficiency. The voices of ten thousand orators and the blare of ten thousand trumpets cannot drown out this wail of the injured and neglected.

Pardon me for lugging the skeleton into the feast, but nothing is more dangerous than an over-confident optimism. Yes, we have done great things and we are still pitiably weak.

Go After Them

Remember the saying of Mr. Carnegie, "Get big men behind you." If you are a church officer ask yourself how your influence counts. Get out of the crab-apple class. If you are a minister ask yourself whether you ever dared to go after the biggest men in town. If not, what is the matter? Yes, it is a great Centennial, a grand fellowship, a noble accomplishment, but "God give us men," or rather under God let us go after large men.

The County Evangelistic Meeting

Evangelist Scoville Gives the Results of His Experience in Conducting Evangelistic Meetings for All the Christian Churches of a County

My dear Brother Editor,—Having long had a desire to see what could be done to strengthen, inspire and stimulate the country churches, from which have come many of our very greatest and best leaders,—editors, educators, missionaries, and ministers,—I was exceedingly thankful when the way was opened for a county evangelistic campaign in Steuben county and Johnson county, Indiana, in the present summer. I had been engaged for about two years for a meeting in Angola, and talking the plans over with Bro. Vernan Stauffer, who is our great leader in Steuben county, as well as the pastor of the Angola church, we decided to make the meeting a county meeting rather than a meeting for the county seat church only. We built a tabernacle in Angola, and seventy men were sent out by Bro. Stauffer for the purpose of visiting every house in the county, leaving a card of invitation and talking up the meeting.

The North Scott, South Scott, Metz, Flint and Fairview churches united aggressively in the work. Two services were held in the new church organized at Orland during the last year, which was fourteen miles away, and one service as held in Hamilton, which was located ten miles away, on the border of DeKalb county. Steuben county has a com pact organization for aggressive missionary work, and this past experience and co-operation was invaluable to us in pushing the county campaign. There were over 400 accessions to the churches of the county (I believe the exact number, confessions, letter and statement was 437), the Angola church the South Scott church something over forty, receiving the largest per cent of the convrts; and I do not know the number received by each of the other churches. After closing the county seat meeting, we went one night to each of the country churches, with great crowds and most excellent results in each place.

We conducted the Johnson county meeting at Franklin, Ind., with our great temperance worker, Dr. H. J. Hall, as chairman of the County Committee, and Bro. Lee Tinsley, county superintendent of Sunday-schools. Bro. M. B. Ainsworth, pastor at Franklin, had been in the county only a few months, but we had assisted him in a meeting in Danville, Ill., a year ago. Hence he was able to lend invaluable assistance in speaking in different churches of the county in preparation for the meeting. There were eighty-three converts the last Sunday at Franklin; 425 in all during the meeting. We tried by every possible means to get the church at Kansas City to let us off up until the Pittsburg Convention, and then we could have made this a most wonderful ingathering, but local conditions made it impossible to grant this request.

We have sixteen churches of Christ in Johnson county, including Franklin, M. B. Ainsworth, pastor; Union and Nineveh, Lee Tinsley, pastor; Bargersville, Bro. Robinson, pastor; Mt. Carmel, Bluff Creek, Ernest Linton, pastor; Mt. Pleasant and Trafalgar, B. S. Dailey, pastor; Providence, Bro. Moore, pastor; Chapel and Samaria, Bro. Aber, pastor; Rock Lane, William Mullendore, pastor; Pisgah, Bro. Record, pastor; Needham, S. J. Tomlinson, pastor, and also Greenwood, H. W. Milner, pastor, and Edinburg, George Sweeney, pastor, which are quite good-sized towns, but too far away from the county-seat to receive any especial benefit from the meeting.

We built one of the largest tabernacles we have ever worked in at the county seat, and, besides sending out the committee of seventy all over the county, three of our workers, Bro. W. J. Minges, Bro. Maxwell Hall, and Bro. Albert E. Buss, went in there almost a week ahead of the meeting, and conducted an evening service in each of the churches of the county, excepting two. Then for two weeks during the meeting we held two services a day in the country; one in the morning and one in the afternoon, or one service at 2, lasting until 3, and then with

MAY BE COFFEE
That Causes all the Trouble.

When the house is afire, it's like a body when disease begins to show, it's no time to talk but time to act—delay is dangerous—remove the cause of the trouble at once.

"For a number of years," says a Kansas lady, "I felt sure that coffee was hurting me, and yet, I was so fond of it, I could not give it up. I paltered with my appetite and of course yielded to the temptation to drink more. At last I got so bad that that I made up my mind I must either quit the use of coffee or die.

"Everything I ate distressed me, and I suffered severely almost all the time with palpitation of the heart. I frequently woke up in the night with the feeling that I was almost gone—my heart seemed so smothered and weak in its action that I feared it would stop beating. My breath grew short and the least exertion set me to panting. I slept but little and suffered from rheumatism.

"Two years ago I stopped using the coffee and began to use Postum, and from the very first I began to improve. It worked a miracle! Now I can eat anything and digest it without trouble. I sleep like a baby, and my heart beats full, strong and easily. My breathing has become steady and normal, and my rheumatism has left me. I feel like another person, and it is all due to quitting coffee and using Postum, for I haven't used any medicine and none would have done any good as long as I kept drugging with coffee." "Theres a Reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

an automobile reaching another country church for a 3:30 meeting, lasting until 4:30. Most of these services were only inspirational, without invitation, all uniting in the county seat meeting at night.

Of the country churches, the Union and Nineveh and Bargersvil churches, located nearest to the country seat, received the largest number of converts. The Franklin church, of course, received more than any of the others.

I believe the county seat meeting can be made a wonderful factor in our work in the future, by conducting, say a two or three weeks' meeting in the county seat, and then putting a strong pastor and singer, or two evangelists in each of the churches of the county, and run a meeting for two weeks in the individual churches simultaneously. I firmly believe that at least 500 more people could have been reached for Christ and His church, in two weeks in Johnson county. The membership of the churches at a great distance will drive in, and that repeatedly, and we reach the members of their families, and reach, too, many of the men who could not be reached in a small meeting in a country church (and that is a big factor in the county meeting, reaching many of the best men in the county), yet it is hard to bring in night after night ten or fifteen miles people who have not been in any way connected with the church before. Hence a county seat meeting should be followed by a local meeting in each of the co-operating churches.

The county meeting demonstrated another fact very plainly, and that is, that the country church has as great a need of a pastor as a city church, and the pastor should live with his people. The country churches which had their pastors right out with them all the time in this meeting, showed wonderful strength in organization, and zeal in soul winning. I know some count it a sacrifice to live in the country, but a man among us who preaches at a country church should live in his home field, be with his people in joy and sorrow, and in all their great country gatherings. There are other things besides weddings and funerals which need a pastor. I believe a call in the country will go farther and last longer than a call in the city. I would not speak lightly of student preaching, nor of the pastor who goes to his church only on Sunday, but I will say that a minister could do about seven times as much good, and do about seven times as great a work by being with the church seven days of the week, as they can by getting in Saturday night or Sunday morning, and leaving the field immediately after church Sunday night. It will cost a sacrifice, but what a holy, happy, sacred, victorious sacrifice!

The last Sunday in Johnson county was one of the greatest sights I have ever beheld. All the Sunday-schools as well as the churches of the county dismissed their services for the whole day, and we had a great union communion service in the morning; then in the afternoon, the greatest Sunday school Rally I have ever witnessed. The schools were all there with a banner for each school, and some of them with a banner for each class. The parade was organized by County Superintendent Tinsley, and the superintendents of all the Sunday-schools, and, led by the Indianapolis Y. M. C. A. band of thirty-seven pieces, the parade was over ewelve blocks long. While there were over 1,800 in the tabernacle in Sunday-school, in the afternoon, large throngs of people were turned away, who could not even get inside. The inspiration of that sight will live in the hearts of the boys and girls of the Churches of Christ in Johnson county for a life time. I feel confident that multiplied thousands could be reached for primitive Christianity, if our country churches would go together in groups and hold great union meetings during the summer season, with all the churches within a radius of eight or ten miles uniting. Make the central meeting as great as possible in a ten for tabernacle, for two or three weeks, and then go to the individual churches for another two or three weeks. "In union there is strength." and the country people would be surprised to know their strength when once they come together. Both the Steuben

The New England churches have long felt that it would be very helpful to the cause for which the Disciples of Christ stand, if our National Convention could be held in one of our eastern cities. Animated by this conviction the churches of Boston and Everett, Mass., unanimously decided to ask for the National Convention of the Churches of Christ in 1910. The New England Convention, which met in Haverhill, Mass., September 9-12, heartily approved of the action of these churches and voted to join them in making this request.

Still more significant is the fact that the invitation has been cordially seconded by the Baptist Ministerial Conference of Boston and vicinity. Resolution to this effect was adopted unanimously by this conference on Monday, September 27. At the same session of the conference three prominent Baptist ministers were appointed fraternal dlegates to the Centennial Convention and it was resolved that "as many others as may attend be given credentials as fraternal delegates."

The attitude of the Eastern Baptists toward the Disciples of Christ is well expressed in a statement which was read before the annual convention of the New England Christian Missionary Society on September 11. A word with respect to the origin of this document is perhaps necessary. The movers in the project of inviting the National Convention in 1910 wished to submit to the brethren in our annual New England convention evidence of the favorable attitude of the Baptists of Massachusetts toward such an undertaking, and as nothing of an official nature could be done by the Baptists before our convention an unofficial statement was sought from a number of their leading ministers. The following document was the result:

"To the New England Christian Missionary Society (of the Disciples of Christ) convening in Haverhill, Mass., September 9-12, 1909. Greeting:—We, ministers of the Baptist church in New England, and members of the Baptist Ministerial Conference of Boston, believing that the two great bodies of Christians known as Disciples of Christ and Baptists should be united into one body as speedily as it is possible to bring it about consistently with the principles of both, rejoicing in the advance that has already been made toward that end as seen in the active union of churches in various localities, as well as in fraternal commingling in congresses and conventions and evangelistic efforts, and desiring to aid in this great work in an effective manner, hereby heartily pledge ourselves to use our influence in causing our conference, on September 20, 1909, to cordially second your invitation to the National Boards of the Disciples of Christ to bring the regular National Convention of Disciples, for October, 1910, to Boston. Furthermore, we will do all in our power to assist in making that National Convention a success, should it come to Boston, especially in the way of strong, effective, practical steps toward the union of the two peoples.

Praying that your action at Haverhill upon this move may be as cordial, harmonious, earnest and prayerful as our own, we subscribe ourselves,

Yours brethren in Christ.

Here follow the names of nineteen prominent Baptist ministers of Boston and its vicinity, some of whom are of national, and even international reputation. The promise they made was faithfully fulfilled. On september 20, a committee of three was appointed to bring in a report upon the matter and a week later, as has been already stated, a favorable resolution was unonimously accepted by the Baptist Ministerial Conferunite in inviting the National Convention of 1910 to Boston.

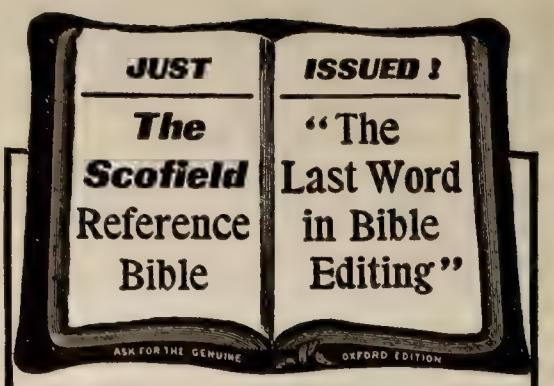
Drake University

By W. F. Barr.

The twenty-ninth year of the history of Drake University has opened most auspiciously. The enrollment at the opening of the second week is about two hundred in excess of that of the corresponding date one year ago. The character of the students is most satisfactory and the faculty is unusually strong. The convocation address was a masterful one. The chaplain was at his best and every one in the great auditorium which was filled to its capacity felt the uplifting influence of the speaker. Mrs. Morris, the new dean of women, entered upon her duties and has already taken a large place in the hearts of the women of the University.

Never before have the young women of the university been so well provided for. The women's gymnasium, the new rest room, the more commodious Y. W. C. A. quarter, and the dean of women all tend to comfort, happiness and confidence on the part of the girls.

The faculty, the church, and the student body will be well represented at Pittsburg. Every movement for the betterment of humanity is supported by this progressive community and school.



The men's gymnasium is approaching completion. The young men of the school have put forth herculean efforts to get the much needed building and are able to see where nearly all of the money necessary for its completion is to come from. If some good friend of the cause would remember us with a check for about five thousand dollars, great results could be realized among the young men here for years to come.

Christian College Begins Fifty-ninth Year

Christian College, Columbia, Mo., has opened with the largest attendance in a number of years. Already many states are represented among the student body and there has been a large increase in local patronage. More and more Columbia is becoming recognized as the educational center of the great Middle West and careful parents who wish the most desirable environment and influences for their daughters are showing their faith in such ambition by the selection of Christian College.

Mrs. St. Clair's value as an educator of young women has been demonstrated in two of our best-known schools, and her return to the headship of Christian College has met with the heartiest response from alumnae, former patrons and all friends of the college. At the opening convocation on Friday, September 18, a large assemblage filled the spacious auditorium, the Board of Trustees, faculty and speakers occupying the rostrum. The enthusiastic occasion was in the nature of a welcome to Mrs. St. Clair upon her return to Missouri.

With Mrs. St. Clair again at the helm, with a strong and able faculty and a large student corps, Christian College is beginning her fifty-ninth year under highly favorable conditions.

The Centennial Conventions

Impressions of the Great Gathering at Pittsburg

We are able to present this week only a small part of our Convention news. The more detailed reports of the societies, the record of many incidents of the Convention and the summaries of results achieved and impressions left we must postpone for another week.

Meantime, it is enough, perhaps, to affirm with emphasis that the first centennial of our history as a religious body seeking the unity of the people of God has been celebrated in a manner sufficiently notable to attract the attention of the entire religious world. No minister or church throughout the country could be entirely unconcerned in the events which transpired last week at the junction of the Allegheny and the Monongahela Rivers. Old Fort Pitt was never dignified with such a series of religious gatherings as then took place.

The impression on the city of Pittsburg was notable. While many thought that the newspapers gave only a partial and divided attention to the great gathering, apology was found for them in the fact that an athletic event of almost supreme local interest was in progress at the same time. But if the open-hearted generosity of the Pittsburg churches on the Sunday was of moment as signifying the right kind of awareness, surely Pittsburg was greatly impressed by the Centennial Conventions.

The impression on our own people was even greater. The very hugeness of the Convention was enough to daze the average visitor. A part of the confusion regarding time, place and details felt by every one present, in spite of all the information furnished by the printed programs, was due, unquestionably, to the monster character of the assembly, so far beyond the records of any previous gathering of the kind. Those who were present will never lose the impressions of the week. As time goes on those who found most to criticize will forget this feature and dwell with satisfaction upon the social inspirations, the prophetic messages, and the uplifting worship of these meetings. It will take time for the most appreciative and intelligent student of the Convention to grow up to any adequate conception of its size and meaning. One must think it over in quietness and let it flood his soul through all its channels and bays with its significance and its inspiration.

It must have suggested to the least attentive a whole series of new ideals toward which the Disciples are setting themselves either consciously or unconsciously in these first days of the new century. Not as before must we do things in the time to come. Our period of experiment and hesitance is now closed. We know sometihng of our resources and opportunities. We know the definite task that has been placed before us of God; to stand timid and hesitant, to fall back upon mere watchwords, to allow others to go before us in the divine privilege of the holy mission, is no longer possible.

"He has sounded forth the trumpet that can never call retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment seat.
Oh be swift, my soul, to answer Him; be jubilant, my feet.
Our God is marching on."

The Centennial of the Disciples of Christ was a completion and a beginnig.

Convention Notes

The long awaited Centennial Conventions of the Disciples of Christ have come and gone; and not one of the many thousands present could doubt that the event was one of the most notable in the history of American Christianity. Probably larger convocations of Christian people have been held at various times and places, especially in the great interdenominational gatherings such as the Christian Endeavor Societies and the Young Men's Christian Associations. But we know of no single religious body that has furnished at any time in American history so large a company of people gathered in a convention holding its sessions during the entire period of more than a week.

Pittsburg was the appropriate place for the celebration of our Centennial. In the vicinity of this city the events with which our early history is connected had their scene. It was in the Allegheny Valley that Thomas Campbell first attempted those definite efforts for Christian unity which aroused the churches of the region to the fancied dangers of unification, and the Brush Run Church, the first local congregation resulting from the work of these reformers, was located only a few miles distant. Pittsburg was the natural gathering place for the historic memories of the early days.

The Convention halls centered at the Carnegie Institute, provided by Pittsburg's most famous citizen for the housing of the art and science collections connected with an educational plant which promises to be one of the noblest in the world. The main hall in Carnegie Institute has sittings for some 2,300 people. Its beautiful lobbies were the appropriate place for the interchange of greetings by the thousands present. On the lower floors the exhibits of the colleges and publishing houses were arranged, while in rooms beyond the collections of sculpture were the missionary exhibits. All these places were thronged constantly with the wearers of the familiar Centennial Convention badge.

The other places at which sessions were held were far less satisfactory than Carnegie Hall. Duquesne Garden, a skating rink of large dimensions, was first used as a double hall, a screen being stretched across the center; but this was found impracticable and confusing, and later the entire building was thrown together and used on such occasions as were available by reason of the imperfect heating facilities. Some blocks away was Luna Park, an amusement resort where a large hall was available. But this had the same disadvantages of chill and lack of attractiveness. In addition, three or four of the neighboring churches were used for many of the sessions.

This variety of meeting places and the changes necessitated by unfavorable conditions in several of them were features which met most criticism from visitors to the Convention. The element of uncertainty as to where any particular program would be rendered almost amounted to exasperation. In spite of any efforts the local committee could make to notify the different audiences where the next day's sessions would be held, there were thousands of Convention visitors who wandered about in hopeless confusion regarding the whereabouts of the men they were most anxious to hear. The program designated the different meeting places by letters rather than by names. But these letters themselves were changed from day to day as different halls and churches were used, so that confusion was inevitable. Some of the sessions were held as far away as East Liberty, and necessitated great inconvenience as well as perplexity. No one questioned that the local committee made the best arrangement it was able, but the results were keenly disappointing in this regard at least.

At this writing it is impossible to say with definiteness what the total convention attendance was. Members of the committee reported on Thursday night that more than 30,000 had registered and that at least 10,000 were expected over Saturday and Sunday. The attendance at the communion service on Sunday afternoon was estimated at 26,000 by the local papers, and should have been a fair index of the strength of the Convention. But as this included the membership of the local churches, the numbers are probably too high for the visiting delegates. The total capacity of the halls used at any one sitting probably did not exceed 10,000. This necessarily left a large proportion of the Convention unprovided with sittings at any one time. But of course, few of the delegates were able or anxious to attend the sessions continuously.

The arrival of Convention visitors on Monday and Tuesday was enormous. Train after train poured in with special parties all the way from California to the Atlantic. One of the most notable delegations was that from California, which, considering the distance it had come, was remarkable in size. The largest single party was that from the Independence Boulevard Church in Kansas City, brought by Mr. R. A. Long. This was accompanied by the Third Regiment Band of Kansas City, one of the interesting features of the Convention.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE DEATH OF CHINA'S GRAND OLD MAN

Chang Chi Tung, the grand old man of China, is dead. He has been one of the Celestial Empire's greatest viceroys for many years, and was more than eighty years old. He was one of the first of the great men of the nation to see the light. Years ago he wrote "China's Only Hope." It reached a sale of more than a million. It was a plea for justice, for progress, and for national morality. He saw the designs of the imperialistic powers and wept for his beloved country. In this book he roused the nation to the world wide issue of modern civilization. At the time of the Boxer troubles he was reported in danger but his influence was very great and was powerfully exerted in the reforms that followed. But for his age he would have wielded even greater power. Recently he ordered that the New Testament be taught in the schools of his province along side the Confucian classics. Like Thos. Jefferson he counted it greater to be the founder of schools than ruler of millions. His province was populated by as many people as the German Empire and by Chinese custom he wielded even greater authority than does the Kaiser. He was a staunch defender of his own nation's integrity and one of its true patriots. In this he was a timely example to his countrymen for China must evolve a nation-wide patriotism in place of her deadening provincialism before she can become that cohesive power that will take rightful place among the first nations of the earth.

The question may well be asked whether there is any true hope of China's becoming modern until she loses her worship of ancestors and puts young men into her places of authority. Age is reverenced in China and children are taught to do only what their fathers and grandfathers would do. The nation ruled by patriarchs moves slowly for the aged are conservative and turn to the past more than the future. It is doubtless fortunate that the youth of China are not given power in a day or they would move too rapidly and bring a conflict. But the energy and initiative of the younger men of China will be her chief hope of progress. Aged men with the vision of Chang Chi Tung are rare.

Recently another Viceroy has commended the study of the Gospels. He said to an audience of American and English missionaries "My hope is that the teachers of both countries will widely spread the Gospel more than ever, that hatred may be banished and distress dispersed, and that the influence of the Gospel may create boundless happiness for my people of China."

DO THE CITIES FURNISH MISSIONARIES?

It is rather startling to find that few missionary volunteers come from cities. The American Board (Congregational) finds that out of 388 missionaries sent from New Hampshire and Vermont during its history but 6 came from city churches. In Massachusetts out of 556 sent but thirteen came from Boston. It would be more than interesting to make a wide investigation of this matter. It would be significant were it found universally true. Our country churches are the strongholds of missionary enthusiasm. There is provincialism in city churches that they would scarcely acknowledge. It is the provincialism, not of isolation but of preoccupation. It was also found that practically all the above missionaries came from churches aided at some time by the Home Missionary Society.

ACROSS WIDEST AFRICA

The Sudan is a country as large as the United States. An American, Walter Savage Landor, recently made a journey from the Abyssinian to the Senegambian Coast. In all he traveled some 6,000 miles. It is a country little known to the white man though it has been the scene of stirring events here and there in the past few years. Khartoum is on the eastern borders and all recall the tragic martyrdom of General Gordon and the Grant-like persistence of Kitchener in clearing Upper Egypt of the fanatical Mahists and laying the Khartoum railway. England is now governing this Nubian country in peace but strangely it is not favorable to missionary work, fearing it will arouse the fanaticism of the Mohammedans. France is building roads into the west central interior and Timbuctoo is no longer the city of mystery. The Great Sahara is found to be much more than an unbroken desert of sand and the peoples of the Southwest especially are a much higher type of folk than the negro of the Niger and the lands north of the Kongo. The Arab has marts and sends his caravans far and wide and is establishing his religion with no little zeal. But he gives no real education and his sacred Koran must not be translated into the vernacular. The new convert is either taught a few of its sacred precepts or enough of the Arabic to be able to recite in a meaningless manner its sacred text. But he is pre-empting the land and giving enough of better morals to fix his rule for generations unless Christianity hastens to send the better way. The Sudan Pioneer Mission has two stations in the east, one at Assuan, the site of the great Nile Dam, and the other at Daran. Five white missionaries are at work and $18,500 was contributed to their cause in 1908. The society has money in the treasury but needs workers. It is a trying pioneer field but one that will some day be glorious by the memories of these pioneers. There is a school for girls with an attendance of eighty, the Gospel of John has been translated, medical work is done and a wide distribution of literature made. In all the vast western portion of the country there are no missionaries but a people of wonderful virility ready for their coming. Abyssinia is at the beginning of a breakup. When Menelik dies the foreigner will be able to break down the seclusion his powerful rule has sustained and the true Gospel may be carried to that oldest of so called Christian nations. Menelik has craved modern ways but has not been willing for western peoples to bring them because of his fear of imperialistic powers.

THE CONGO COMPANIES AGAIN CONVICTED

The newspapers report that the American missonary under trial for slandering the Congo administration has been acquitted. This is doubtless the case of Rev. Shepherd who was cited to appear at the mouth of the Congo, 1,000 miles from his place of work, to stand a trial for stating that the natives were driven to labor, compelled to collect a certain amount of rubber, and severely punish, even mutilated, for failing to bring in the amount demanded. If so the Congo administration is again convicted by its own courts. Mr. Shepherd, a colored missionary from America, has proven himself a man of great courage. He has dared to risk his all in the enemy's country for the sake of freeing his people from the tyrannous yoke of Leopold. When the Belgian government took over the Congo administration it was hoped things would be improved and the wrongs righted. The charges made by Mr. Shepherd antedate the change in administration but the news regarding the reforms of the government are not at all encouraging. The impressing of labor has not been stopped though its severity has been forbidden. The expropriated land is still in the possession of the exploiting companies. There can be no freedom for a people that are impressed for labor and whose land is taken forcibly from them and turned over to syndicates. Both our government and Great Britain have refused to give official recognition of the Belgian government's power under the new arrangement until genuine reforms are inauguarted. Justice demands that the Berlin conference be reconvened and the Congo put under the supervision of the powers. One thing of hope is found in the new government and that is that they are fulfilling Leopold's original contract to see that all missions should have ground, without discrimination, for their work.

THE APPALLING INCREASE IN DIVORCE

The rate of divorce in the United States has increased from twenty-nine per 100,000 in 1870 to eighty-two in 1905, the latest available statistics. Put another way, in 1870 there was one divorce for every 3,441 of population while in 1905 there was one for every 1218 people. Today one out of every twelve marriages result in a divorce. The city rate is much higher than that of the country, a fact true in all nations. Japan only has a higher divorce rate. Twenty years ago one out of every four marriages there resulted in divorce. In those days the husband had almost supreme rights as in Old Testament times. Matters have greatly improved there but late statistics are not at hand. In Europe the marriage rate is decreasing and the divorce rate increasing. Catholic countries are often cited as examples by anti-divorce advocates but they neglect to tell of the illegitimacy of those countries. Austria heads the list here though Ireland is at the bottom be it said to her credit. The awakening of intelligence seems to bring an independence of restraint among those classes that are just awakening to individual freedom. Poverty increases illegitimate births and the districts seem to lead in numbers, doubtless due to the fact that prostitution in the cities leaves no statistics, while country places do not have that horrible traffic.

The divorce problem is thus seen to have many complicating elements. The increase of divorce may mean the decrease of adultery. It may mean the freedom of womankind from the old marital bondage. Twice as many women obtain divorces as men but adultery is the husband's cause oftener than it is the wife's. It is rather surprising to find that divorced women marry much sooner than divorced men and that 80 per cent of the decrees are granted at the place of bona fide residence. It seems to be only those who have money and small causes go to the states where divorce is easy. One-third of the petitions are denied by the courts and 20 per cent of those granted are directly due to drink. The number where domestic trouble arises through drink cannot be determined but would doubtless be large.

The matter of divorce is a social problem. Ecclesiastical law has befogged the issue. Separation at least should not be denied to those whose lives are made miserable by the delinquencies of a companion who will not reform. The domestic relation is the most fundamental of all social institutions. Remarriage might be forbidden and thus the integrity of the marriage bond sustained but to compel one to live in a home that makes life a slavery and destroys all personal happiness is scarcely demanded by the law of either man or God. The home is the basic human institution. Even though its sacredness demand that there be no divorce allowed may not that very sacredness also demand that it be not made unholy by a state of domestic life that ruins the characters of all who live within it? The English custom of granting separation without divorce commends itself from the standpoint of the state and church. Illegitimacy in England is less than in any other country except Ireland though in London both prostitution and illegitimacy are at their worst.

The delegates were registered at the Convention Headquarters on Liberty street in the heart of the city, and were there provided with the Convention badge and program. The badge was a copper pin, bearing on its face the representation of the Brush Run Church, built in 1810, and bearing the dates "1809-1909." Beneath, suspended by a yellow and black ribbon, the colors of Pittsburg, was a shield bearing the portraits of the four founders, quartered by a cross bearing the words "Disciples of Christ," "Centennial." Above a turreted head bore the words "Pittsburg, October 11-19, 1909." On the reverse side were the words from the Savior's prayer, "That they all may be one, that the world may believe." The program was a convenient leather-bound volume containing the entire official program, a collection of Convention songs, the history of the churches of Pittsburg and vicinity, a sketch of the pioneers, and other interesting data, especially numerous illustrations.

Vendors of badges, flags, buttons, and other souvenir materials were numerous in the vicinity of Carnegie Hall and drove a profitable business. The missionary societies, in addition to their exhibits, sold souvenirs and photographs representing the localities where the missionary work is done. The publishing houses both those of the Disciples and other large publishing interests, had stands in the basement, where books and other useful materials were offered for sale.

The weather was only satisfactory during part of the Convention period. On Sunday the 17th it was almost perfect. The sun shone with warmth and the wind was comparatively low. But during the other days of the week clouds prevailed and part of the time there was light rain. Yet this inconvenient weather did not seem to dampen the spirits of the thousands who were in attendance.

The Hotel Schenley was the official headquarters of the Convention so far as any hotel could be. It was the only hostelry located within easy walking distance, and naturally those who desired accommodations close to the Convention halls chose this place. Considerable inconvenience was experienced through the evident desire of all the hotels in Pittsburg to profit by the great crowd of baseball enthusiasts who thronged the city during the middle of the week. Many delegates found their reservations entirely ignored and were compelled to go elsewhere, after they had supposed themselves fully provided for. The hotel people apparently believed that the baseball crowd would be a more profitable one than a convention of church delegates.

The Convention program was, on the whole, satisfactory. An earnest effort had been made by the Centennial Committee to secure a thoroughly representative list of speakers. No one could complain that any section of the country or group of interests had been forgotten. Not all men who are doing successful work as preachers or teachers are, however, inspiring convention speakers. And for this reason the general average of the Convention sessions was probably below that of our usual annual gatherings. Some of the addresses were notably fine. Those who heard such speeches as the ones given by George H. Combs, Arthur Holmes, Charles S. Medbury, A. B. Philputt, S. J. Corey, Dr. Johnston, and others that might be named, will not soon forget them. On the other hand, there were some addresses far from adequate when measured from even the average convention standpoint. But this only illustrates the familiar fact that the larger the range of selection, the less possible is it to have all the utterances first rank in character.

Probably the address most discussed was that of Mr. Samuel Hardin Church on "The Progress of the Disciples During the Century." It was not a notable address either in form or content, but it became such by the violent antagonism it aroused through some of its utterances, quite unnecessary, as it seemed to us, upon matters of cherished Christian belief, such as the virgin birth and immersion. These references, needless in themselves, were unfortunately received with hisses by some thoughtless members of the audience. This inconsiderate and petulant action did more to advertise the address and to lower the tone of the Convention than any other episode during the entire series of sessions. It is an unhappy fact that people's capacity for irritation is in inverse proportion to the strength of their religious convictions. Men who are profoundly convinced of the great realities of our religion are not easily swayed into petulance when these convictions are attacked. It is the child who loses his temper, and the man who has not yet ceased to be a child.

The meetings of the acting Boards of the Home and Foreign Missionary Societies were held on Monday afternoon. The reports of the Foreign Board were enthusiastically received, and plans were made to send F. M. Rains and wife on a visitation of the mission churches in the Orient. The meeting of the acting Board of the American Christian Missionary Society was less significant. The reports of the auxiliary boards, Church Extension, Ministerial Relief, and the Board of Temperance were more effective and inspiring than those of the mother society. The Centennial year has not marked the growth in the work of the Home Board that should have been expected and was hoped for. But perhaps for this fact there are sufficient causes.

The President of the American Christian Missionary Society for next year is Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, a most worthy choice. The retiring Secretaries of the Society, W. J. Wright and G. B. Ranshaw, are succeeded by I. N. McCash of Berkeley, California, and Grant K. Lewis of Long Beach, California. The Society has gone a long distance to secure its secretaries for the next administrative period, but it has found admirable men and may look forward to satisfactory progress in its work. No other changes of importance were made at the Convention. The committee on publication society, from which much had been expected, presented a colorless report without recommendations.

An interesting incident of the Convention was the launching of the Oregon, the boat which is to be used by Dr. Dye and his colleagues on the Congo. This event took place at the docks on the late afternoon of Wednesday and was witnessed by a large section of the Convention. Funds were raised to assist in paying for the vessel. This is the first time in our history that such an event has occurred; but it may well be regarded as the precursor of many similar events.

The most notable single item on the Convention program was the great communion service on Sunday afternoon. The weather, which had been cloudy and cold throughout the week, was for a few hours almost ideal. The service was held on Forbes Field, the Pittsburg baseball grounds, close to the Carnegie Hall and opposite the Hotel Schenley. The splendid grandstands and bleachers, built of steel and cement, accommodated in all nearly 30,000 people. With the exception of the east bleachers the sittings were completely occupied. The service was simple and impressive. Small leaflets containing the entire program were in the hands of all. The tables were spread in the center of the field and along the front of the three galleries of the grandstands. Administrators at each of these tables were assisted by deacons and all were controlled by signals from the center table on the field below. The entire service lasted less than an hour and was confined entirely to the printed program. It was simple, solemn, impressive. Probably no company of people so numberous has gathered for the sole purpose of celebrating the Lord's Supper in the entire history of the Christian church. It will be a blessed memory for all those who were present on this notable occasion.

The Sunday services were among the most important features of the Convention. It had been the understanding of the committee that none of those who had a place on the regular program should be asked to speak at the Sunday service, but the local committee found itself compelled to depart somewhat from this arrangement. Most of the churches of Pittsburg and vicinity opened their pulpits freely and cordially to the Disciples, and, so far as information could be conveyed by the local press, the churches of all the denominations were well attended by the visiting Disciples. In addition, there were regular Convention sermons morning and evening in several of the Convention halls. The reports from these services were highly satisfactory. The privileges afforded this great company of visiting Disciples by the preaching, together with the impressive communion service of the afternoon, did much to compensate for any of the inconveniences and disappointments of the early portion of the Convention.

Most of the colleges had banquets on Friday evening. They were all of them notable for large attendance and enthusiastic spirits. College singing was the feature of the hour, and the toasts related to the welfare and hopes of the different institutions. The Bethany banquet numbered 780 attendants, and through the generous offer of Mr. Long a fine beginning was made toward the enlargement of the endowment.

The two great meetings of the Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ, held in Luna Park on Tuesday afternoon and evening, were splendid indications of the enthusiasm which may be generated in the great body of our men by proper leaders. Inspiring music was rendered by Mr. Long's band, and the audience of men that filled the spacious hall to its limits listened with attention to the earnest and urgent addresses which pointed out the present opportunities for men's work in the church and the ways in which that work could be made most effective. The brotherhood idea has come to stay. Other religious bodies have taught us how to use it; and under the leadership of Mr. Long as President and P. C. Macfarlane as Secretary, we may well expect to see great things accomplished.

After all, the most interesting features of a Convention of this character are in connection with the social intercourse of the convention halls and hotel lobbies. This is where sentiments are freely expressed. Men are naturally conservative in their public utterances, but they talk freely when in the intimacy of private conversation. It is manifest that the legalism and traditionalism of the Disciples is giving way to a more just and adequate conception of the gospel. The forces that have bound us to narrow and bigoted views of truth are losing their hold on our people. The men and women who made up this Convention came nearer to representing the great average of our membership than any convention held in recent years, perhaps in all our history. And conversations with all classes of convention visitors revealed an expectancy of better conditions, a weariness of strife and controversy, and an enjoyment of the noblest elements of Christianity, that promise immense growth toward better things in the future. Our second century will be marked by elements which have been held in repression during the last period of our first century. The right to think frankly and fearlessly, the privilege of co-operation with all who follow the leadership of Jesus, the appreciation of literature that is clean, high minded, generous and Christlike, all found expression in the daily conversations of the lobbies and corridors as well as in many of the best addresses of the Convention.

This personal element in our conventions is one of the most rewarding of their experiences. The privilege of meeting the men and women whom one has known in other years, or of whom one has heard with the desire to know them in more personal ways, is a privilege realized only in these great gatherings. At Pittsburg one was certain that all his friends were there if he could only chance to find them. This, of course, was not easy, considering the great numbers of those who were in attendance. But the disappointment at the inability or the delay of meeting some particular friends was more than compensated by the numbers of those who, in the meantime, one was sure to find.

The Return of Missionary Influence

Almost every variety of motive has been emphasized in the great work of world evangelization. It has been pointed out that this ministry was the object of gospel preaching, for Jesus distinctly swept the horizon with his glance when he gave the disciples their commission. We have been told of the world's need of the gospel, of the degraded conditions which prevail in the lands of heathenism, of the joy of missionary service, of the new heroism that comes with the call of the cross, and of the reflex influences which come back to bless the home churches.

All of these are impressive motives to missionary work, and not less so is the consciousness that we shall never know all the wonders of our holy faith until it has produced its legitimate types of character among the dwellers in the Antipodes. We know what our American, English, French, and German types of Christianity are. We know the magnificent personalities which the gospel has produced in these lands. But we do not know as yet what a typical Christian, fully cultured and inheriting Christian traditions, will be in India, China or Japan. Only time and the diligent prosecution of the gracious work of missions can reveal these things.

But there is still another angle from which the work of missions becomes not only important but imperious. There is such an involvement of all men in the fortunes of each other that no one can remain in a dwarfed and ignorant state without its influence upon all the rest. A part of the human race is today living in some measure of Christian light and intelligence. But how small a part as yet! As long as vast sections of the race still remain in superstitition, ignorance and squalor, so long must these same conditions appear with more or less insistence even in that western and supposedly Christian civilization which is the boast of our century. How much of our own immature and unwholesome condition, as it reveals itself in the slums of great cities, and the ignorance and vice of whole classes of our people, is attributable directly to the world's tardy and backward attainment of healthful, moral and spiritual estate.

Dr. Jowett, a foremost English preacher, who has recently visited our own country with inspiring messages, speaks wholesome and stimulating words on this theme. He says:

"So long as China's hordes are stagnant we ourselves will remain immature! So long as the cannibal tribes of tropical islands drowse on in their animalism we ourselves will not be fully awake! So long as anywhere in broad England any man is mentally or morally dwarfed, every other man will be hindered from gaining his appointed stature! No man will walk at his full height so long as any man remains a pigmy! One moral cripple affects the pace of the race! And therefore if a man 'goes wrong,' if he becomes morally filthy, whether in slum or suburb, there is no isolation-hospital in which his nefarious influence can be safely confined. Prison-walls may isolate bodies, they cannot destroy the nerve communications of the race. We are every man and woman the poorer for every man and woman in gaol today."

Thus the motives for missionary work gather one upon another. The longer we work at the tremendous task the more important and far reaching it seems. All questions as to method and practicability fade away into nothingness in the face of the meaning that missions have in our modern life. The race simply cannot become healthful and happy until the work of missions is accomplished.

The Pledge of Good Fortune

I promise to treat myself as an individual; to seek the good fortune of strength and beauty and accomplishment and goodness; to place human considerations before material considerations; to decline all profit gained at the expense of men and women and children; to work only for human wealth.

I promise to treat others as individuals; to help them in their quest of personal good fortune; to put no obstacles in their way; to remove all obstacles that I can; to treat their efforts after perfection seriously and sympathetically; to avoid personal ridicule and disparagement; to cultivate a universal comradeship.

I promise to further social welfare; to promote the idea that prosperity consists essentially in persons and only incidentally in things; to be true to this faith in public and in private, in work and in play; to help, so far as I can, the freedom of noninterference and opportunity; to seek in all social intercourse the seriousness and beauty of a high purpose.—C. Hanford Henderson, in The Children of Good Fortune.

No cheating or bargaining will ever get a single thing out of nature's "establishment" at half-price. Do we want to be strong?—we must work. To be hungry?—we must starve. To be happy?—we must be kind. To be wise?—we must look and think. No changing of place at a hundred miles an hour, nor making of stuffs a thousand yards a minute, will make us one whit stronger, happier or wiser. There was always more in the world than men could see, walked they ever so slowly; they will see it no better for going fast. And they will at last, and soon, too, find out that their grand inventions for conquering (as they think) space and time, do, in reality, conquer nothing; for space and time are, in their own essence, unconquerable, and besides did not want any conquering; they wanted using. A fool always wants to shorten space and time; a wise man wants to lengthen both. A fool wants to kill space and kill time; a wise man, first to gain them, then to animate them.—John Ruskin.

Thomas Campbell and the Principles He Promulgated

*By Professor Herbert Lockwood Willett

To the superficial observer most great events appear as the issue of causes almost wholly casual and often trivial. Incidents that seem insignificant become the hinges of history. Movements pregnant with undreamed of results are started into life by episodes of the most passing character. Rehoboam, the young king of Judah, treated with discourtesy the popular request for milder government, and a breach was rent in the fabric of Israel's life so deep that the centuries never healed it, and so tragic that the nation never regained its lost prestige. A youth in a German monastery went one day in sore travail of spirit to his superior to ask for assurance and peace. He was sent to read in the chained and neglected Latin Bible, and the issue of that morning's reading was Luther's far-flung translation of the Scriptures, and the rise of the Reformation. Napoleon's guide at Waterloo nodded his head when the emperor asked the practicability of the ground that sloped down to the advancing squares of Wellington. The charge was sounded, the Old Guard flung their sabres to the sun and literally hurled themselves to their death in the treacherous embrace of the fatal ravine, and the star of Corsica and of France fell crashing to its ruin.

When Thomas Campbell, a seceder Presbyterian minister of Northern Ireland, arrived in ill-health, with scanty means, and quite alone in the New World in the spring of 1807, and upon presenting his credentials to the seceder synod in Philadelphia, found assignment to the Presbytery of Chartiers in Western Pennsylvania, it must have passed as an incident hardly worthy of two lines of record in the narrative of the sessions. Yet from that moment may be dated the series of events which issued in the "Declaration and Address," the formation of the "Washington Association," the establishment of the Brush Run church and the thousands of churches that have followed it, and the promulgation of a world-wide plea for Christian unity. But a truer reading of history forbids the superficial explanation of world-shaping events as accidents. Their moment of emergence may bear this semblance, but their causes are a part of the eternal purpose. The most momentous things that have happened on this planet have been the successive Divine visitations by which elect souls have been made the receivers, the guardians and the dispensers of new spiritual values. It is in the soul's realm that this overplus of life, these visions of the truth, these special calls to a great task, have been most mysterious and august. The prophets and saints who are the media of such disclosures are a predestinate race. Not by accident is their testimony given. An incident may bring it forth, but the divine purpose has fashioned it. Augustine did not owe his new life to the mystic words heard in the garden of Milan; Luther's message was not the product of Pilate's staircase; nor was that "sudden warmth" of heart which Wesley felt in the meeting in Aldersgate street the cause of the great Methodist awakening. It was not the visitations that made these men. It was the men rather who made the visitations. They were made for the vision as their eyes were made for light.

Even so was Thomas Campbell called of God to be the prophet of the most needed reformation of modern times. It was his keen sensitiveness to the disasters that had fallen upon the church through its division that made him quick to hear the voice of God calling him to a new and imperial task. It was the fair vision of what the church had been, might be again, and indeed ideally was, that fired his spirit with the passion of a prophet. He saw the failures of the church in the light of its eternal purpose and essential unity. In such men religion takes on the form and discerns the spiritual power which belong to their time, their own generation. It makes of them preachers to their own age, not one gone by. But it is never from their time only, never from their mere modernness, that they derive their power. What makes their message full and true is their sense not of time, but of eternity. In them God is reasserting himself. They are absolutely assured that it is not they alone who speak, but that Another is speaking through them. The "thus saith the Lord" of the Hebrew prophets was with them no figure of speech. It was the statement of a fact. St. Francis be-

Campbell, of which the stoutest highlanders, under the leadership of lieved himself divinely commissioned to redeem Europe from its degradation, and it was his unquenchable conviction of that call that made him the power he became. Savonarola preached in the garden of St. Mark's and in the pulpit of the Duomo the messages of whose divine source he was so profoundly convinced that more than once he broke down in sheer terror at their tremendous meaning. What kept Luther to his task against the authority of popes and without the protection of princes, was his immense sense of a call from heaven. There has never been a genuine and impressive arousal of the church to a new task without this internal driving power, this sense of divine urgency, in the heart of some great leader.

Such a man, my brethren, was Thomas Campbell. We have known him all too little. In the rush and stress of the early days men made little record of events and utterances. The grief of mind with which he had pondered on the distracted and broken condition of the churches issued in earnest but fruitless efforts in behalf of harmony. Then to him, as the one man of his age who had the clearness of vision to see the city of God in its rare and undivided beauty, came the call to be the messenger of the Spirit in arousing the consciences of men to the sin of disunion and the love of brotherhood. Pen and voice joined in the task. He gave himself with unrestrained ardor to his mission. With keen sympathy for the affections that bound his fellow Christians to ancient and venerable symbols, he none the less made effort to turn their thoughts from human to divine leadership, from instruments of organization to ideals of service, from denominational possessions to universal responsibilities. While he thus moved, prophet-like and with persuasive voice among the people, he met all the opposition of tradition, the cynicism of skepticism and the indifference of content. But there were some whose hearts the Lord had touched. If at first it seemed that all had joined the conspiracy of disdain, he learned ere long that there were some who would not bow the knee to Baal, and were ready to take up the defense of the new truth. Of these the boldest was of his own household. With pride and satisfaction he watched his son maturing his courage and mastering his weapons. Nor was he alone. Others soon rallied to the same standard, and where the father had spoken with gentle and persuading voice, the son and his companions went out like champions to the fray. Soon the noise of battle arose, and before the long campaign was ended and the right of the new message to the attention of the church had been vindicated, the man who had first seen the vision and had first spoken the word had fallen into silence. In the splendor of those later achievements his greatness was almost forgotten. A few utterances from his pen found their way into the Christian Baptist, and the earlier volumes of the Millennial Harbinger. A short tribute to his memory, distressing in its brevity, was prepared by his son at the time of his death. A few surviving memories of this Father of the Reformation complete the story as we know it. Most of the Disciples of this generation have been content to link the name of Thomas Campbell with that of his son by way of compliment, and almost as an afterthought. My brethren, we have not know him as we should.

The story of Mr. Campbell's career cannot be told in the brief compass of this address. Nor is it necessary, for in your hands you have an admirable statement regarding the fathers, prepared by one who has entered deeply into their spirit, and in recent days much has come from the press, though not yet enough, in interpretation of their lives and ministries. As one calls up the name of Thomas Campbell the few yet significant facts of his work which have survived to us come rapidly to mind. The Scotch blood of the Clan the dukes of Argyle had boasted for generations; the emigration of one of these families to the north of Ireland in the eighteenth century: the birth of the three boys, Thomas, Archibald and Enos, in County Down, the oldest being born in 1763: the deeply religious character of the family, connected as it was with the established Church of England: the preference of Thomas for worship of the Presbyterian order, his deep and searching religious experience, and his dedication of himself to the Presbyterian ministry; his educational discipline as student in a military academy near Newry, as a teacher in the central part of Ireland, again as a student at the University of Glasgow and the theological school of the Seceders at Whithburn; his marriage to Jane Corneigle, the daughter of a French Huguenot, in 1787: the pastorate of the Seceder church at Ahorey in County Armagh, and the effort to augment the slender resources of the household by the conduct of an academy at Rich Hill: the gradual breaking of his health under the double burden; the lonely journey to the new world in 1807 in search of strength, and perhaps a new opportunity; his assignment by the Seceder synod in Philadelphia to Western Pennsylvania; the distress of spirit through which he passed by reason of the bitter sectisms that were working the division and decline of the Presbyterian churches of the region: the efforts at union made by him, and the ecclesiastical censures that followed; the publication of his great appeal for unity, "The Declaration and Address,"—which everybody reveres, and, alas, nobody reads—and the beginnings of that life-long career in behalf of the great principle of which he thus became the new discoverer and the advocate—these are the facts which need only fresh recalling as the significant items in a long and most notable career.

Thomas Campbell did not originate the idea of Christian unity. Every new departure, however radical and startling, carries with it something of the past. Luther and Calvin can only be understood in the light of the pre-Reformation theology. As Protestantism marched from the house of bondage it plentifully plundered the Egyptians on the way. Methodism began in Anglicanism, and the Salvation Army in turn is the child of Methodism. Earlier voices had pleaded for the restoration of the lost unity of Christians. The Roman Catholic church, confronted by the courageous efforts of Waldo, Wicklif, John Hus and Jerome of Prague to find purer doctrine, had applied the enginery of persecution, torture and martyrdom in the effort to crush out dissent and restore unity. The reformers, once free from the tyranny of Rome, trembling at the breach they had made in the walls of Christendom, and at the growing disunion among themselves, tried various devices of conference, compromise and co-operation in order to repair the evil of division. Romanists and Protestants were both deeply concerned as they saw the separative results of recent events, and in some instances, as the correspondence of Leibnitz and Bossuet proves, made earnest attempts to come to agreement. Richard Baxter of Kidderminster lamented the broken and weakened condition of the church, and organized leagues of Christian union in different parts of England, the object being to bear witness to this principle, and give it visible demonstration. Milton's dream of a simpler faith and a united church was not read till twenty years after his death, but it profoundly moved the souls of some at least who mourned over the fragmentary and ineffective nature of the Christian forces of their day. These and other influences, both in Europe and America, had prepared the way for Thomas Campbell's work. Of some of them he was aware; of others unconscious, but of all he was the heir and the interpreter. The man of prophetic type, who most truly speaks the message of God for his generation, is not necessarily he who studies the course of former times and carefully calculates the direction which religious thought will take; nor he who carefully balances the tendencies of his own day and chooses the line of least resistance and of greatest promise. Rather is he the possessor of a soul sensitive to the needs of the hour, conscious of the unspoken longings of the church of God for nobler ideals, smitten with the sense of failure in the present activities of his brethren, even while they are most jubilant over a shallow success. In a word he is the man who, because of his truer vision, discerns the way in which Almighty God is moving, and tries to get things out of his way. And such a man was Thomas Campbell.

He was not an intellectual or religious genuis, rising to eminence independent of the dower of the past or the gifts of his environment. His inheritance was favorable. Generations of stout and fearless Scotch ancestors had poured their blood into his veins. He was the child of that philosophical movement which, with its rejection of Cartesianism, its appeal to fact, and its theory of knowledge as the direct result of sense perception is most closely associated with the name of John Lock. Not less formative in his method of thinking was the influence of that modification of Calvinism brought from Holland, and widely diffused through Scotland after the secession, and known as the Covenant Theology, with its insistence upon a progressive revelation, marked by successive covenants, of which the Jewish and Christian Scriptures were the record. Nor must one forget the more immediate and profound effects of such "independent" preaching as that of the reformers Glas, Sandeman, Walker, Hill and the Haldanes, the latter of whom, with their appeal to the Bible as the sole authority in belief and conduct and their ringing protests against the divided estate of the church, had created a widespread sentiment of reform in Scotland and Northern Ireland. The effects of all these influences are clearly discerned in the character and utterances of Thomas Campbell, as well as in those of his illustrious son. Many other men of that age were the children of just such forces, but on no one else did they exert the impressive influence visible in Thomas Campbell's career. He was the one man of his generation, the native soil of whose spirit, enriched by these Providential gifts of sun and shower, was capable of developing that tree of unity whose seed was of the divine planting. Dante affirmed that the truly great man is he who sees the divine vision for his generation and tells it to the world. Such a man was Thomas Campbell.

We might easily gratify both our sense of delayed appreciation of the fathers of this movement, and our denominational pride by fulsome eulogy on this Centennial day. It would be a genial, perhaps it is an expected, service to enumerate their virtues, which were conspicuous, and obscure their faults, of which they doubtless had some small store. Perhaps it is the work of the eulogist which is expected from those who review these records today. If, however, this becomes the controlling note, we shall both miss the deeper readings of their history, and shall go away to presently forget what manner of word they spoke. If this centennial hour brings us ought of abiding value, it must be found in the frank and honest study of the careers which brought us into life, and of equally searching self criticism in the light of the ideals those men cherished and proclaimed. This is a severer and a more humbling task. But if it can find adequate performance it will leave us with a truer appreciation of the fathers and a juster sense of our own strength and weakness.

As the story of Thomas Campbell's life is pieced out from the scanty materials that fall to us, simple candor compels the confession that he was not a great man in the sense of much that the world calls greatness. Though dowered with an excellent intellectual equipment for the times, he was not one to be described as widely read. Though always effective in public speech, he had few of the graces and none of the arts of the orator. Though unwearied in his devotion to the cause he loved, he had little of that fiery zeal which has made the strength of many of the reformers. In intellectual power he was not so resourceful as his son. In public address he was not so eloquent as Walter Scott. In the ardor of his service he was not so notable for tireless energy of effort as Barton Stone. They were competent for tasks at which he would have failed. And yet not one of them, nor any of the illustrious men who stood with them or followed them has approached him in commanding and prophetic personality, and the supreme sense of infinite values. Great reformers they were, men of majestic gifts and compelling influence. He was the one man who as a prophet of God saw the vision of God's purpose for his generation, and with unquenchable faith and boundless patience set himself to its interpretation. Without the assistance of these men Thomas Campbell's message could not have been effectively voiced to the world. Without his vision of the will of God for the age and the word which that vision compelled, these other men would have gone unnoted to the end of the day.

He was a rare compound of the noblest virtues of the Christian life, the simple and beautiful virtues of which Protestantism has too frequently been forgetful. He was modest with a humility that asked not great things for self, but only for God. When censured by his Presbyterian brethren, he accepted reproof rather than be the cause of strife. Like Milton, "he traveled on life's common way in simple lowliness," and evermore "his soul the humblest duties on itself did lay." In personal piety he lived on lofty and serene levels. The Word of God was to him a daily study and an unfailing delight. Prayer was no formal utterance, but a precious experience of communion with God. His home was a place of devotion. There the altar fire never died down, and his children went forth into the world safeguarded by these sheltering ministries as by walls of fire. His convictions were correspondingly deep. The Word of God, carefully studied, truly interpreted and finding its climax and final meaning in the Person of Jesus, was to him "the sovereign law of decision in religion and in the conduct of life." To the end he held the profoundest evangelical convictions concerning the Bible and the Christian doctrine. His courage was equal to the steadfastness of his faith. No Scotch covenanter, face to face with royal persecution, could have been more fearless and unflinching in defense of his beliefs, especially where he felt that important biblical truth was at stake. Yet his whole career was marked by an exquisite courtesy which was the astonishment of those who knew him and an example which has not always marked the conduct of the men who revere his name. He believed that all who made the effort, however ineffective, to follow after the Lord he loved, were his brethren and entitled to the name of Christian. From the beginning to the close of his work he fully recognized the Christian character and estate of all who accepted Jesus as their Lord and made a sincere effort to conform to his will. Toward all of every name who professed the Christian faith he felt the close relationship of a fellow believer. He saw in them the likeness of Christ, however obscured. He would have affirmed of them as the monk Ambrosius said of Arthur's knights:

> "For good ye are, and bad, and like to coins,
> Some true, some light, but every one of you,
> Stamped with the image of the King."

The harsh and mordant criticisms that have sometimes characterized our speech regarding our brethren of other churches could no more have fallen from Thomas Campbell's lips or defiled his pen than a nettle could root itself upon a glacier. His attitude was ever kindly, considerate and appreciative. The sin of division, so patent in the Christian life of his time, never blinded his eyes to the virtues, whose emphasis and cultivation in all was the surest road to harmony and union.

"The Principles he promulgated," so reads the theme. And yet it obscures the one element in the work of Thomas Campbell on which most emphasis ought to be laid. He held firmly to many truths; he promulgated but one principle. He accepted the great evangelic verities of his age and every age. To him God was a living reality, a divine presence, the Father of Spirits, the inspirer and hearer of prayer. This faith he shared with all the saints of all the years. The Savior was the perfect God-man, who for us men and our salvation had taken up the cross and by his atoning ministry and death had opened to us the gates of life. In him alone was life, and that life was the light of men. He had come that they might have life and have it abundantly. His was the preeminent name, nor was there salvation in any other. Loyalty to that Master on whose head were the crowns of celestial sovereignty was a privilege so royal and a duty so supreme that it was difficult to find adequate speech for the great theme. In this loyalty he rejoiced to hold fellowship with all of evangelical faith. He counted this the precious and unquestioned confession of all the children of God. The Bible was the inspired record of God's chief redemptive relations with men, and since it contained all needful truth regarding the divine education of the race for immortality, its statements might well be taken as final. Therefore the motto was devised, "Where the Bible speaks, we speak, and where the Bible is silent we are silent." But stated more accurately, this motto applied rather to the New Testament than to the entire Bible, and in the teaching of Mr. Campbell it virtually stood for the person and message of the Christ. The list of truths held by him as fundamental and proclaimed by him as sacredly implicit in his utterances might be greatly lengthened. But of this there is no need. He accepted the primal truths of our holy faith as they have been held by all true believers everywhere and in all generations.

However, when one turns to ask what was the essence of his message, the answer must be given in clear and emphatic form. Mr. Campbell did not concern himself with a variety of interests. "Principles" is not a word that defines his statements. He held to one principle and one alone—the union of God's people. To that one theme he devoted his life; he lived for nothing else. No really first-rank interpreter of God has ever had more than one commanding truth to proclaim. It was so of all the prophets. It was so of Christ. Men of the second rank can concern themselves with various ideas. The great prophets know but one. Thomas Campbell shared the fundamental convictions of his age and ours on the essentials of the faith. But the one principle which absorbed him and claimed his life was the truth that the church is ideally one, and ought to realize that unity in actual and visible experience. To him this was the most outstanding and impressive fact in all the range of the church's life. Others might devote themselves to different tasks. But as for himself, and all who were minded to stand with him, this was the supreme need and duty. He was keenly sensitive to this crying necessity of the time. It haunted his soul like a prophetic burden. The waste places of Jerusalem, where the debris of sectarian strife lay scattered and obstructive, filled him with as profound a sorrow as Nehemiah felt in his night circuit of the city. With that same restorer he might have cried "Why should I not mourn when the city of my fathers lieth desolate and its gates are burned with fire." His hope and passion was the restoration of its undivided glory. The beauty of that vision allured him. The music of the reunited church already filled his soul. Though as yet a choir invisible, its anthem floated to him as if a door in heaven were left ajar, and cherubim were singing. To the realization of this hope he devoted all his energies through the lengthening years of his life.

Nothing is more pathetic than the surprise and keen disappointment with which the skepticism and indifference of the churches on this theme filled him. When at last it became evident to him that the very sentiment of union from which he had expected so much was issuing in the formation of a new body of believers, he felt the deepest regret and trembled with apprehension for the future. And when he looked on the rapid growth of the movement and saw it pass from his shepherding to the care of his strong and masterful son, he watched it with mingled sentiments of joy and anxiety, for how promising and yet how capable of evil that future might prove. Charlemagne had watched with hope and yet fear the Norman ships ride into the harbor of Paris. Even so did Thomas Campbell see the advocates of Christian unity growing numerous, aggressive, self-conscious and militant, for he understood how easily a lofty and divinely given mission may be construed into the platform of a new and needless sect.

When one looks back upon the life and labors of this great and humble-hearted man, and then contemplates the complex of forces called into being by his message and the efforts of his followers—forces some of which have carried farther than he dared to hope in the realization of his great ideal; and have had no small effect upon American Christianity in preparing the way for the ultimate union of the churches; and some of which, though marshalled under watchwords of his devising have been among the hindering causes of continued disunion, one feels like paraphrasing the cry of Wordsworth in the words, "Campbell, thou shouldst be living at this hour. The world hath need of thee." And that cry, that finds echo in so many choice and elect souls in this mighty current of purpose and effort, must assure us that he is here, not only in that mystic sense in which the rare spirits who have entered into life watch from their high thrones the progress of their life-work in the world, but in that more potent sense in which the ideals of one great leader become the ruling motives of succeeding hosts. Thomas Campbell lives today, and out of the dust and confusion that has too often obscured his prophetic vision and exalted purpose in the days since he was here, there emerges with ever greater radiance to the discerning eye the figure of the real explorer into the untrodden regions of Christian unity, the real discoverer of the way back to the land of heart's desire, the true interpreter of the Savior's prayer and the apostle's plea.

He is here today, looking on with solemn and yet confident gaze. Perhaps this is not the way he would have chosen to realize the great purpose. If he watched with deep interest not unmingled with anxiety the rapid growth of that company which first rallied to his call, a company that soon found fresh commandership under different leaders, changing watchwords, other minds, we may be sure that there have been times in our history when he might well question whether its primal purpose had not been lost. The first clear emphasis upon Christian unity soon gave place, necessarily perhaps, to the attempt to restore primitive Christianity, and this in turn was defined in such various ways as to lead to instant and continued controversy. One after another matters of minor import, with which he never had stopped to concern himself, usurped attention, till the one principle of unity was in danger of total eclipse. With what disquietude of spirit must he have beheld the fierce animosities generated by vituperative and insulting words hurled at those antagonists whom he would have made his friends. With what astonishment and alarm would he have seen a considerable company of those who rally to his name content to forget the purpose of his call, and settle into the more congenial task of building a denomination, with all the machinery which the denominations have devised. With what pained wonder would he have looked upon the spectacle of his followers sneering in self-righteous exclusiveness at Christians worthier and more Christ-like than they who had not learned as yet to forget the fine heritage of denominational history. With what depression of soul would he have seen swaggering boastfulness of numbers and of power usurp the place of humble-minded service and single-hearted witness to the principle. He knew, as we are slowly learning, that numbers do not spell efficiency; that even a small company of convinced and consecrated men and women, passionate and eager to bear their high testimony concerning the imperious need of unity, is more effective than thousands of passionless and uninformed adherents, passive, unaware and content to pronounce shibboleths of union while disdainful of the simplest efforts to realize unity. The lesson of Gideon's band is still worth pondering.

But Thomas Campbell's testimony has not been lost upon the unreturning wind. He looks upon us today as no frustrate and dismantled ghost. Greater and more impressive grows the company of those who believe in the instant practicability of all efforts for unity, and are working at the task. If the men who followed him felt themselves in the heat of battle compelled to raise other issues than the one he had voiced, and to coin other watchwords than those he had employed, he knew in the greatness of his faith that the time would come for fresh and vital emphasis upon the primal truth he spoke. If in the campaign that had to be waged against a confident and entrenched sectarianism a later band of warriors found it necessary to carry lesser ramparts before the central citadel of disunion could be taken, he was content to abide the issue of the ultimate rally and the final charge. The men who followed him saw that much must be done before the church would even listen to the one principle of unity. They set themselves to immediate tasks, not always in the spirit of their first leader, nor with his ideals always clearly in mind. Sometimes they even fell into the subtle error of accepting the central truth as the slogan of a sect, the platform of a party, rather than a testimony to the truth. But these errors pass as the purposes of our work and the figures of our first leader and his Master and ours are more clearly seen. A century of history is recorded, how wonderful in its achievements, how heartening in its enthusiasm, how humbling in its mistakes, how incisive in its lessons. A new century dawns. The issue is clearer than ever. The company of choice and consecrated spirits grows. The voices of many not of our communion join with ours in the Savior's prayer. It is time to finish the work. No theory of union is ours, but a notable and compelling task. No tarrying for counsels, conventions and compromises is necessary, but instant effort The sentiments of disunion are still strong, but every man may build upon the walls of the city of God opposite his own house. There is work for the humblest and the greatest. No voice should be silent. In the true church there can be no dumb tongues. Every hearer is a herald. Our obligation to all the essential truths of our holy religion is not less majestic than in the past. Our companionship with the people of God in every missionary and philanthropic ministry is as necessary as ever. But above all things else, devotion to the one principle of unity among all Christians is the duty of the hour. To forget this is to miss the very ground and vindication of our separate existence. For this Thomas Campbell pleaded, and a Greater than he. For this he still pleads, and still more urgent is the voice of the Lord. With clear and ringing testimony on this theme we could realize the object of our hopes and prayers in a single generation. And the passionate desire that this shall be is the proof that we shall accomplish it. Sursum corda. Lift up your hearts, my brethren. Gird up your loins and light your lamps. Through the shadow of the years we sweep into a broader day. The time of the church's unity and salvation draws near. The night is far spent and the day is at hand. "Night's candles are burnt out, and jocund day stands tiptoe on the misty mountain tops."

The Calling of Dan Matthews

Reviewed by Alva W. Taylor

Harold Bell Wright's new story, The Calling of Dan Mathews, is in the printing of the second edition of 100,000 copies at the end of the first month after being issued. It has been the first seller in New York and among the first six in other places. It bids fair to be one of the big successes, if not the biggest of the season. And it is a church story. True it is not a conventional church story. It is inevitable that it should arouse some criticism and a great deal of ignoring among the conventional church defenders—those who think that because the church is good there should be no criticism of any of its ways, as if the very fact of its goodness should not make its defenders the more desirous of criticising and remedying its errors. On the other hand it will receive, perhaps, a caricatured praise from those who are ever alert to pick the flaws in the church and to obscure her virtues with an undue stress of her faults. They will be so glad to use the criticisms that they will obscure the real religion and love of truth the book exalts.

The story is full of that subtle picture of natural life which creates "atmosphere," The frank and sincere young preacher; the blunt, truth loving, big-hearted old doctor; the guileless, earnest nurse, a veritable little sister of the poor; the cheery Irish mother and her grateful, crippled Denny; the hard working young physician, lost in his task for surcease of pain and fighting bravely on with such tools as church and country environs furnished for his task; all these furnish the protagonist for the tale and work out the problem of sincere human effort for right and truth in the little city of Corinth.

On the other side as the antagonists are the "Ally," that subtle spirit of every community that peers into the lives of men with a wicked leer, that distorts motives and insinuates its slimy but invisible and noiseless presence into the most sacred places and scoffs and scorns and feeds the antisocial in men with its horrible pabulum of gossip; and there is the old conventions of church life, the traditions, the pious elder who "sells the poor for a pair of shoes" (not a common factor in modern church life, however); the truly good elder, so far as his lights lead, but the man who takes himself too seriously and believes that whatever is (in church) is right; the mercilessness of womankind and all humankind in visiting the sins of the father upon a poor defenceless girl; all these play through the pages and furnish the elements of the conflict.

Young Dan has been raised in the Ozarks, amid nature, and in a home that despised all that was artificial. He is healthy in body, mind, and soul. He determines on the ministry as the calling opening most opportunities for a life of service. In the seminary he studies the past and is tied to its traditions and theological formularies and graduates to accept a call to Corinth, where his natural abilities give him large audiences and great promise. In his own heart, however, he finds his theology is not answering the human questionings around him. He is too sincere to parley and goes straight to the heart of the matter by using that which helps men in their present conditions. This brings the antagonism of the "watchdogs of the faith," the reports of his deviations "from the faith once delivered" spread suspicion among his brethren in the ministry far and wide and he receives cold courtesy from them. He fights like a hero for his convictions and is worsted, the ally fighting with sinuous power by craftily turning the gossips into the green fields of Dan's love for the nurse, who has long ago left the church for her work of mercy.

The story thrills one and is full of wholesome sayings and live philosophizing and dramatic scenes. It nas but one vulnerable point and that is in its conclusion. It may well be debated whether Dan would have failed or not. A few decades ago he might have failed but today he ought to have won. He appealed powerfully to the best instincts of his community and while the antagonism of the legalists in the church would have brought battle it is more than probable that such a man, with such a program, and under just such circumstances, would have won. The final word of the book is even more open to a difference of opinion. That Dan should desert the church is a criticisable conclusion of the matter. Of course he does not desert religion. He goes to find the more wholesome things of religion. But is the desertion of the battle field for the pursuits of industrial life justifiable to one enlists in the task of the world's service? Are we to conclude that the author thinks the church hopeless or that he is simply using the dramatic privilege to create his tale? The latter seems the more probable and from the standpoint of art may be justified. From the standpoint of militant Christianity it could be wished that the even more dramatic sequence of victory in Corinth had been the hero's part, or at least that he had found a place to pit his soul against the enemy with that host that are devoting their lives to the task of uplifting men.

The book is significant as a religious sign of the times. Its merits as a story will create a demand for it, but its interest as a problem novel in the things of present day Christianity make its wide sale significant. The press receives it with loud praise. It expresses a feeling that is broadcast in the minds of multitudes regarding the traditions that hang about the neck of the church like a millstone. Whether true or false the feeling that it is true is there and Dan Mathews' experiences confirm the feeling and speaks the mind of a multitude. Again, it is, after all, a wholesome sign of the times that so wide and powerful a demand is made on the church to "make good" at the human task of "doing good." The religion of Jesus has plowed much soil and in it the Church of Christ must plant the fruitful seed.

The Turkish Revolution of 1909 as Observed By a Resident of Jerusalem

By Edward A. Henry

It is hardly worth our while in this study to review the history of the events in the Turkish Empire from April 13 to April 27, 1909, as it is well known to all readers of this paper how on April 13 the First Army Corps in Constantinople, at the instigation of the Sultan, Abdul Hamid, revolted from its "Young Turk" officers and became the defender of a reactionary ministry and how after only two short weeks the conquering Third Army Corps under the "Young Turks," by the decree of the old Sheik-ul-Islam, deposed Abdul Hamid, the craftiest monarch who ever wielded a sceptre, and seated upon his throne his really simple minded brother, Mohammed V.

When the Trouble Was Brewing.

Jerusalem has no papers, except one in Arabic, so it is chiefly by rumor and secondarily by Reuter telegrams which come by irregular mail from Port Said that news reaches the residents. For some weeks a spirit of unrest had been felt by everyone. Reports of changes in the cabinet, of the dismissal of the old palace guard, etc., had warned all that something in the way of trouble was brewing. Yet it was considerable of a shock that news reached our ears on the evening of Tuesday, April 13, that the 'Young Turks' had been deposed from power and the old regime seemed to have been restored. Other sensations followed rapidly during the next few days. Damascus was in a state of military rule. The great clerical party of the Omayyad Mosque threatened to stir the Moslem natives to an uprising. The attitude of the great garrison of 12,000 men toward its 'Young Turk' officers was unknown. Its revolt at any moment would not have been suprising. Nablous, that town which in times of peace is always dangerously fanatical, was in a ferment. Hebron, the most fanatical town in all Palestine was in a very ugly mood. So dangerous did travel become that the American Consul at Jerusalem joined the other diplomatic officers in sending out notice to all tourists that they must not go near Damascus or Hebron and they were advised not to travel through the country at all without military escort. A responsible native, fearing fanaticism, positively refused to venture out with me on a short ride to the southwest of the city.

A Nerve Racking Situation.

The situation at Jerusalem was most nerve racking. One day news arrived that the Nablous natives were marching on Jerusalem. The next day it was Hebron which was to begin the assault. Then came word that the Bedouins east of the Jordan were gathering for an attack on Jerusalem. So one wild rumor followed another in rapid succession. Many people left the city to stay in Egypt until the trouble should be over. Some of Jerusalem's oldest foreign residents assured the writer that the situation looked the darkest they had ever seen it. The one bright spot in the outlook was that the large Jerusalem garrison remained true to its leaders. Each evening they paraded the streets heavily armed in order to assure the residents that they were numerous, well-armed, and faithful. Even moderately heavy field pieces were paraded about the city.

On Friday night a secret meeting of the 'Young Turk' leaders was held and on Saturday noon a big mass meeting was gathered in the public park. Several thousand people came to hear the 'Young Turk addresses. One young Moslem climbed a tree at one edge of the crowd and began to harangue the crowd to the effect that it ought to arise and massacre all the Jews and Christians. This youngster was speedily dragged from his perch by a 'Young Turk' officer and sent home with a warning that he should utter no more words of that sort. The result of the mass meeting was that a telegram was sent to the Sultan warning him that if he, in any way, set aside any of the provisions of the new constitution, Palestine would at once secede from the empire and set up its own government.

"Isolate Foreign Residents."

Another disquieting factor was the news that Governor-general of Jerusalem had received a telegram reading, "Isolate the foreign residents and use what power you have to protect them." To the Occidental mind that message may not appear disquieting, but every one of us knew that it really meant, "Extend no protection to native Christians and so encourage their massacre and when blood begins to flow your own soldiers will take care of the foreigners in the same way." The news of the horrible masacres at Adana and Mersina helped to increase the fear arising from this telegram, for no one doubted that those massacres were due to similar telegrams. Fortunately Jerusalem's garrison was so loyal to the 'Young Turks' that the governor dared not attempt to carry out the order.

News of the progress of the 'Young Turk' army toward Constantinople reached us daily and at last on the 27th, late in the afternoon, came word that Abdul Hamid had been dethroned and his brother Mohammed V. enthroned. The formal announcement was made by the Governor to a crowd before his house. Great was the rejoicing and the feeling of relief. The garrison band played jubilantly as it marched about town. Every one was shouting and yelling with joy. Revolvers were fired from all parts of town, as in the Orient this is a favorite method of expressing great joy. The pandemonium lasted until about eleven o'clock.

Wednesday, the 28th of April, was a great holiday. The banks and most of the bazaars were closed all day. In accordance with an old custom huge piles of bread were placed in the city gates and all the poor were fed. Most of the buildings in the city were hung with green vines, lanterns, and flags. As night came the park became a blaze of light, since every tree was hung with lanterns. A brilliant light was placed on top of the Tower of David. Red and green fires were burning everywhere. The streets were simply packed until it was like a "Carnival Night" during some big street fair. Clearly the people did not mourn the passing of Abdul Hamid and all cheered long and loudly for Mohammed V. whose picture hung in the Jaffa Gate and before the Citadel of Zion.

The Coming of Peace.

Rumors of peace now began coming in from all parts of the empire and soon the massacres were over and the consular bars against free travel removed. Some two weeks later I sat on the floor of the Dome of the Rock chatting with the Sheik who has charge of the building. He has never learned any foreign tongue and so has access only to the one local paper which is distinctly 'Young Turk' in sympathy. We were almost alone. In a low voice as if he were afraid some one else across the mosque might hear, he asked, "Do you think Abdul Hamid was altogether bad, as the papers say?" "How does England feel?" "Do the foreigners all think he was bad?" "Who is this new sultan?" "Will he be like Abdul Hamid?" and many other such questions, all of which I answered as diplomatically as possible. For I knew that to a champion of a lost cause I was breaking the news of the total defeat of its leaders and the world's satisfaction at that defeat. Such is the feeling of the clerical party and the fanatical element of the Moslem world. Abdul Hamid was the champion of the prophet and the faith. He could not have been so bad as he is pictured. They mourn his passing and fear for the future of their religion under the new sultan. But the great mass of the people, in Palestine at least, have lived in constant fear of treachery and they now rejoice in the promise of a really civilized, western form of government under the new Sultan and his 'Young Turk' advisers.

Our Church Men

An Appeal to the Man of Hard Sense

By John Ray Ewers

There are among us a lot of men who only skim the surface of things, who are satisfied with the appearance and who cannot distinguish between a bluff and the goods. I am not talking to such this morning for they will not appreciate my point.

You have heard of a man called Pinchot? He has given us a big, word, viz. Conservation. He saw the men of this country ripping and burning up our forests, and, being an honest man, he objected. Suddenly we awakened to the fact that we have been like destructive boys, who, having no thought of the morrow, spoil, break, ruin. We see now that we are old enough to have attained the age of responsibilty and that we must save and protect rather than waste and neglect.

Not only the forests are being wasted but coal and oil lands, birds and animal life, and human life as well. Now comes Prof. Irving Fisher of Yale, head of The National Health Commission, and sounds a clarion note for the conservation of human life, and his call is none too early. Wise men, then, in every field see the word Conservation written large in letters of gold.

Conservation in the Church.

The people of the world have always been wiser than the children of light and I suppose it will be some decades yet before some Pinchot of the spirit will arise and make himself heard concerning conservation in the church of our Holy Saviour.

Hear me, ye men of wisdom and of strength, while I lift the trumpet to my lips and herald the new day of conservation in the church of God. We have wasted spiritual life as the greedy timber fiend has wasted the forests.

The Desire for Bigness

It is the same motive in both. The desire for mere bigness, for sudden wealth, for show. Three-fourths of the people are unwise and cannot analyse the situation. Most people are deceived by the audacious bluff. The big Sunday-school, although it is only a mob, the church, that might better form several branches, the big meeting, oh, how we do love it, the big congregation, no matter what the results on actual life are concerned. Mere size! Yes, it is all the same—the passion to get rich quick and to make a swell appearance. But do not forget that there are those who think, and that the thinker laughs to scorn your inflated greatness. So we have the anomaly of great churches that cannot support a missionary, a mob attending a meeting but a city going to the devil, a big Sunday-school and colossal ignorance of the word of God, big lists of additions and enormous losses. What nonsense! What foolishness! What waste! We have had some good laughs at the expense of the "get-rich-quick" fiend and were it not so serious, we might indulge a good laugh here. But really it is no laughing matter. Thus to waste the precious life of boys and girls, thus to tamper with holy things, thus to puff up self at the expense of eternal life. Oh, man of wisdom consider the motive that underlies all this! Is it the spirit of John the Baptist saying, "He must increase, but I must decrease"? Or is it rather "I must increase at any cost." How highly illuminating would it be if we might have reports to our papers of the subtractions instead of the additions. How often have we heard the true story of big evangelistic meetings, loudly reported in our papers, reflecting supposed glory upon the evangelist, and then, some months after perhaps only twenty-five out of two hundred and twenty-five can be found. Come now, do you call that sense? I say it is a "get-rich-quick" game and that is all there is to it. The time element has been left out. The people were not prepared and therefore they could not endure. Really they have been tampered with, many of them have been ruined, brought to see the emptiness of all such proceedure. I believe in constant, sane evangelism that leads men to intelligently accept Jesus' way, but I do not believe in much of our modern foolishness. I like to see people stay in the church, and not to behold the present day exodus from the rear door as fast as the entrance is made at the front. Let us have some telegraphic reports of subtractions. There are several churches whose last estate is worse than the first.

Tell us what you are doing for missions.

Advise as to the stand of your men upon civic righteousness, please. Inform as to what you are doing for the foreigners. Tell us about the knowledge of the Bible actually gained as shown by examinations. We do not care how many "joined." As men of sense we want to know what of it. The standards of measurement are honest and true personal life, happy home life, clean municipal life, social helpfulness and missionary activity. I ask you to study, please, the quiet, solid churches that slowly, truly constantly are bringing in the Kingdom of God.

Against Exploitation

I rise to protest against the waste. I rebel at the exploitation of good people. I insist that our Sunday-schools be schools of the Bible and of ethics. I insist that we count only those who are really converted and even then that the emphasis be not so much on the counting. Bigness is not an index of anything. The big missionary offering comes nearest the mark. I am not condeming evangelists. If I could I would double the evangelistic spirit and seek to save the thousands now untouched. I find no fault with big Sunday-schools where there are big brains and hearts to guide and teach. Let us close the "exit" in our churches. Let us culture and train those we already have. Again there is wild waste in the way many of our pastorates are closed. A minister should not leave his field until another capable man has been chosen as his successor. To him he should turn over, in love, and peace, the flock he has been caring for. Again pure unselfishness would lead us to seek to have those who have left our immediate field unite with some other church and go to work. Men of the Brotherhood of Disciples, the flower of our army, to you I appeal for support in this idea of Conservation. The vineyard of our King needs wise care.

The Book World

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY AND THE SOCIAL ORDER, is a book of unusual merit for the preacher of today, either in city or country parish. It consists of a series of twelve addresses, which were delivered last year before the students of Yale University Divinity School. The lecturers were prominent pastors who have in their own work demonstrated their fitness to speak of the special themes upon which they address the students. The lectures are therefore not a statement of theories that have never been tested by experience, but of principles that have been found to work. The subjects of the various addresses show at a glance the practical nature of the lectures. They are: "The Part and Place of the Church and the Ministry in the Realization of Democracy"; "Trade Unions: The Causes for their Existence"; "The Work and Methods of Trade Unions"; "An Exposition and Interpretation of The Trade Union Movement"; "The Opportunity of the Minister in Relation to Industrial Organization"; The Church and The Wage-earner"; "The Opportunity and Mission of the Church Among Non-English Speaking People," by Ozora S. Davis, president of Chicago Theological Seminary; "The Ministry and the Rural Community" by A. P. Stokes, pastor Congregational Church, Amherst, Mass., "The Essentials of a Ministry to Men"; "The Minister in Association with International Movements." But these lecturers do not treat simply of practical methods of work, but gives one a vision of the relationship which the church and ministry sustain, or should sustain, to these great world movements, which are today absorbing so much of the attention of men, and which the church has done so little to direct.

The first of these lectures: "The Part and Place of the Church and the Ministry in the Realization of Democracy," is by Charles S. MacFarland, pastor of the Congregational church in the manufacturing and cosmopolitan city of South Norfolk, Conn. This lecture alone makes the book one worth buying, and reading. Mr. MacFarland conceives his task to be to open up to his hearers, and readers, "some ways in which the minister may become a vital factor in his city, a man to be reckoned with in every great movement, a man to be consulted upon all important questions affecting the life of the people, a dominant force in making and moulding the democratic order." He does not advise the minister to place less emphasis upon work with his church, for the church must be the firm solid platform from which he speaks to the community; but he does urge a larger view of the ministry than that which sees of the church as an end in itself. He sees in this view of the ministers task an opportunity for him to regain authority and influence, not upon the old superstitious basis, of divine right but upon the basis of his immediate value of the community, and his personal influence with men. The minister is to be a specialist in community building. No preacher can read this or the other chapters of the book without feeling his pulse beat quick to the enlarging vision of the great and important task to which he is called—great if seen in its social significance, as here presented.—(Yale University Press.)

THE YOUNG MAN'S AFFAIRS, by Charles Reynolds Brown, author of "The Social Message of the Modern Pulpit." This practical book is full of interest for every earnest young man. Mr. Brown's tone is not "preachy" or that of the lecturer, but that of the companion, and friend. Good common-sense and a grasp of the essentials in life are manifest in every page. In the opening chapter, "His Main Purpose," the author says: "You will agree with me at the outset that no man is apt to arrive, unless he has a fairly distinct idea of where he is going. You can steer a ship that is moving, every part of it brought under the power of some impelling force—even if it is headed wrong it can be turned around. You can not do anything with a ship that is drifting—it simply lies in the trough of the seat, beaten and tossed. You can do almost anything with a young man who is possessed with a purpose. But it is hard to do anything with those human derelicts who are just drifting along waiting to see what will happen to them." This chapter is followed by six other talks upon "His Intimates," "His Books," "His Money," "His Recreations," "His Wife" and "His Church," each discussed with genial wit, intimate knowledge of the young man's affairs, and with a wealth of illustration that compels the attention. The questions here discussed are the great questions in every young man's life—questions which he must decide whether he will or no. Upon their decision depends his success in making a life, whatever we may say of their relation to his success in making a living. They are the great questions. Mr. Brown sees and treats them in their relation to the successful life, and speaks out of wide and rich experience. (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York; $1.00 net. 166 pages.)

ENGLISH LITERATURE, by William J. Long, is a very attractive book. The print, the paper, the binding, the illustrations appeal pleasantly to the eye—a most important element in creating a proper affection for his text in the heart of the student.

There is nothing uncertain in Mr. Long's treatment of his subject. He speaks as one having authority and from full knowledge, not only of literature, but of history. The historical summaries make much easier for the teacher the necessary connection between the life of the people and their literature. Full bibliographies for each period and a general bibliography for the entire work afford abundant material for teacher and student. The author has wisely gathered the dates into separate chronologies, easy for reference.

Mr. Long's words in his preface are true of his own book: "A text-book is not a catechism but a storehouse, in which one finds what he wants and some good things besides." The "good things besides" in this case are many; one comes upon them so often that he forgets he is reading a text-book. All in all, the work is most acceptable, and will appeal to many teachers who have not felt quite satisfied with hitherto available texts. (Ginn & Co., Chicago. $1.50.)

CHRISTMAS BUILDERS, by Charles Edward Jefferson. In a beautiful parable Dr. Jefferson here presents a protest against the present day spirit which seeks to burden the Christmas holiday with a constantly increasing mass of care and commercialism; and makes a plea for a return to the old time ideals and spirit. Who can question the timeliness of this protest and plea? Christmas giving and observance has been cumbered with convention and over-preparation, until for many people the day has become one of dread. The author's thought here is refreshing. He does not simply decry the present conventional observance of Christmas; but urges that one day is too brief a time for the expression of all the Christmas spirit there is in the world, and that increasingly, this spirit must, and is finding expression in all the days of the year. His own words are: "One day is quite too short. To entertain beautiful thoughts, to kindle kind and forgiving feelings, to set the heart singing, and the spirit adoring, for all this a single day is hardly long enough. If we should think such thoughts every day for a week and a month, our minds would get accustomed to these high altitudes, and would not sink back so readily to lower and unworthy levels." It is a wholesome book, and good to read some months before Christmas. (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York; fifty cents net.)

WE FOUR AND TWO MORE, by Imogen Clark; a story for young people. "We Four" are a lively group of youngsters, who are out for a summer's vacation; and two cousins, who form a worthy addition to the circle. These six spend the summer with their grandmother and maiden aunt at a fine old country place, where there are horses and dogs and other things of interest to children. These inventive youngsters organize the S. P. O. D., which being interpreted means a Society for the Prevention of Dullness. The society is a success, and realizes its aim which is "a prank a day." The reader comes to like the children as he follows them through the summer. They are loyal, truthful, courageous, and are not afraid of deserved punishment. They learn many lessons of living and loving as the summer wears on, and when the merry party breaks up for the fall term of schooling, the reader bids them good-bye with regret. The author has succeeded in individualizing each boy and girl, so that the reader feels that he knows each one personally. (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York; $1.25 net.)

"THE MIND OF CHRIST" is the first book of T. Calvin McClelland the writer has seen. I notice, however, that he has written two others. He is the minister of the Memorial Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. He is aware of his time. He knows what is doing in the intellectual world; yet he conserves all that is vital and mighty in the Christian faith. While he clearly sees that Christianity has not up to the present won the world and that there is some room for pessimism; yet he contends that it is the absolute religion. Absolute as opposed to provisional, absolute as opposed to provincial, and absolute as opposed to partial. To become thus absolute it must reflect the real mind of Christ. The author makes a four-fold test. True Christianity must have a God of Power and Pity to whom all can pray; must stress the infinite value of the individual; must be consistent with reality ("criticism is normal and is as inevitable as the sea"); and it must have "an inspiring ethical ideal."

In the light of these the book splendidly unfolds the main teachings of Jesus. The chapters on "Jesus' idea of Religion"; "Jesus' Idea of Sin"; "The Proof of Jesus' Idea of God," and "How a Man May Know the God and Father of Jesus," are especially clear and helpful. Crowell is the publisher.

"THE GATE BEAUTIFUL" is the latest of the long list of practical and devotional booklets by J. R. Miller. We have come to know the author as safe, sane and suggestive. He is safe in that his advice is good. He is sane in that he is not a faddist. He is suggestive in that he is happy in illustration and in his choice of practical and scriptural quotations. The present volume of brief essays or abbreviated sermons will be found helpful to most Christians. It is not heavy or deep, and yet the author does not avoid the big problems that come to the common mortal. He answers by hints. In one chapter he raises the question, How can we know? He answers by two illustrations. In a picture of Augustine and his mother, he tells us that "One is saying, 'If God would only speak to us,' and the other replies 'Perhaps he is speaking to us now and we do not hear him.'" His second answer is found in the story of Lady Aberdeen's Conversion. After much doubt as to whether Christ was real, she heard a mystic voice say, "Act as if I were, and you will find that I am." Among other subjects of interest considered are: "Called to be Saints," "What God Thinks of Us," "Misunderstood" and "No Miracle, But Power." Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. are the publishers. 65c net. 8c postage.

"PINNOCCHIO," the adventure of a little wooden boy came to the house of the reviewer one night just after the dinner hour. With physical appetite appeased a live boy in the home seized eagerly upon the story of the wooden boy. They had a great time together that night; for in the early twilight of the next morning while still dozing, the writer was told of all the adventures of the newly made acquaintance, Pinocchio. No father with a live boy can doubt its interest. That it effectively teaches the young readers the lessons of obedience, kindness and broad humanity one can well believe after hearing the story related by a youth. It is translated from the Italian. Crowell publishes the work at $1.00.

"WITH CHRIST IN PALESTINE," by A. T. Schofield, M. D., is a book of four chapters entitled as follows: "Bethlehem, or The Birth of Christ"; "Nazareth, or the Life of Christ"; "Capernaum, or The Work of Christ." Jerusalem, or The Death of Christ." As these titles might suggest, the book consists of history, description, exposition, exhortation and dogmatics liberally mixed. The author enjoys giving texts their local settings; and also in tracing the significance and value of local scenery to Christ in his meditative hours. The book is only one of a hundred pages. The writer would have done better if he had limited himself to a narrower scope. There are a dozen or so good illustrations. R. F. Fenno & Co. publishes the work at $1.25.

GO FORWARD, by J. R. Miller, D. D., is the Author's annual gift book, and is a plea for progress, an incentive to renewed effort, which the author believes to be at the bottom of all successful living. The lesson of the little book is taken from the wanderings of the Children of Israel. Near the close of their forty years in the desert they had been drifting here and there without any fixed purpose. Many times had they compassed Mount Seir. They were constantly moving, but never making any progress. They were coming no nearer the promised land. It was a fruitless kind of journey. Then came the message, "Turn you northward, you have compassed this mountain long enough." This, says the author, is the daily message that every life should hear. "Go Forward" is a beautiful little book, with a helpful message, artistically bound, and illustrated in full color. A gift that will supply the need of many at Christmas time. (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York; fifty cents.)

FIVE GIFT BOOKS; WHAT IS WORTHWHILE SERIES.

Five new volumes have been added this year to the popular line of ethical gift books, by the Thomas Y. Crowell Co. The five volumes added to the series this year are:

HOMESPUN RELIGION, by Elmer E. Higley. This consists of four five-minute talks, terse and practical, on right-living. It is the religion of every day and of the fireside. It is a booklet packed with meat.

THE MASTER'S FRIENDSHIP, by J. R. Miller. The author discusses here this interesting and human phase of the Master's life, as He lived as Friend to every man. The book is full of suggestion and inspiration.

UNTIL THE EVENING, by Arthur C. Benson. This booklet contains brief essays on the following subjects, "Prayer"; "The Mystery of Suffering"; The Faith of Christ"; "The Mystery of Evil"; "Renewal"; "After Death"; "The Eternal Will"; "Until the Evening." The essays are filled with well chosen illustrations, making them more of quiet heart to heart talks, than of formal statements, yet they are not without seriousness of purpose.

WHAT THEY DID WITH THEMSELVES, by Ernest H. Abbott, a very suggestive study of the characters of the men who rejected Jesus, and encompassed his crucifixion—the sleeping disciples, Judas (the moral dullard) Peter, and Pilate. The interpretation of these characters, and the suggestions as to where these characteristics are found in present day society, is very suggestive—even striking.

WHY GROW OLD? by O. S. Marden. This is a book that every man and woman who has reached the age of thirty-five should read. The following words give the position taken by the writer: "Thought leads. If it is an old-thought, old age must follow. If it is a youthful thought, a perennial young life thought, a thought of usefulness and helpfulness, the body must correspond. Old age begins in the mind. The expression of old age in the body is the expression of old age ideas which have been planted in the mind. Mr. Marden does not ignore the laws of the physical, but he does here as in his other works make them subordinate to the laws of the mind." These five booklets are bound in white or leatherette. (Thomas Y. Crowell Co., New York. 35 cents net (each). Postage 5 cents.)

THE FINDING OF CAMILLA

By Lucie E. Jackson, author of "Feadora's Failure," "For Muriel's Sake." Copyright, Ward Lock & Co., London.

"What Is Thy Secret?"

"Only that you need not trouble about where the money is to come from to pay for all we've had. There is plenty, grandfather, plenty. See here," and running to the box she unlocked it with trembling fingers, and taking out the purse—the sides of which bulged out in a most unseemly fashion—she emptied it of its contents on to the bed. The money rolled with a comfortable jingling sound into a heap within reach of the sick man's hand.

Pierre raised himself with an effort, and looked with startled eyes at the little pile before him. Several gold pieces were amongst it, and shillings and sixpences were more plentiful than pennies.

"Tiens, mon enfant, how camest thou by all this?" he questioned, with something very like fear in his eyes.

"Jacques and Chicot and Taras and Bebe and Jules and I all earned it, grandfather. We earned it for you."

"Mais, cherie, tell me more. Earned it? You frighten me! Earned it! Then thou must have gone out amongst people—amongst crowds to have got that much money! Ah! cherie, I tremble."

"But you needn't, grandfather, you needn't. I was quite, quite safe, for I was not all alone—although dear Jacques would have flown at anybody who had dared to touch me. Mrs. Jones has a lodger living in the room downstairs, and oh! grandfather, he has been so good and kind to me. Next to you and your sister, I think I like him best in the world. When he first knew I was going to give a performance without you, he seemed as if he didn't like it, and then he said he would go with me. Chicot drew me, and this kind lodger carried your violin, and the dogs and Taras went with me."

Pierre still looked at her with mute fear in his eyes. Suppose—oh! terrible thought—suppose her father's enemy had come across her in that crowd! Or else the Italian of whom Pierre had had such haunting dreams! He shuddered, and covered his eyes with his hand, and remained in that position so long that Camilla lost all pleasure in her earnings, in the fear of having made him angry.

"Pierre—grandfather," she whispered, taking his hand and drawing it away from his eyes, "are you angry with me? I did it only for you. If you had known," with a quiver in her voice, "how frightened I was when you fell ill directly we got here; then the landlady was cross, and the doctor came, and I looked into the purse and there was scarcely any money in it. And oh! Pierre," bursting into tears, "I didn't know what to do till it came into my mind to go out with the dogs and Taras and Chicot, and try to earn something to put into the purse. And I thought you wouldn't mind when you were sick and couldn't do it yourself, and the lodger came with me." Her tears dropped on to his hand.

"Ah! cherie, do not think I am angry with you. How could I ever be that, ma petite ange! But it's the fear—the fear of what Monsieur your father said that overcame me. Mon enfant, dry your tears. They're the first I ever made you shed, n'est-ce pas, cherie?" And Pierre looked tenderly into her face. "For your sake only, and for the sake of the promise I made to Monsieur your father, was I silent and miserable when you told me of what you had done. But not angry, cherie, never angry. I did but tremble for you."

"But now that you know the lodger was with me and took care of me?" Camilla pleaded, with the tears still shining on her long lashes.

"Not now—not now," answered Pierre, merely for the sake of soothing her.

"And such a nice man," continued Camilla, wiping her eyes when she found she was forgiven; "so good and kind to me."

"The bon Dieu be thanked for that!" was Pierre's reply. "But, cherie, now that thou hast earned so much—ever so much more than thy Pierre did in so short a time—thou must rest content. No going again, cherie, comprenez vous?"

Camilla's face fell. "Not if the lodger goes with me?" she faltered.

"Not if a dozen lodgers went with you," said Pierre energetically. "What thou did'st thou did'st when I was ill—when I knew nothing; the bon Dieu knows that. But now that my brain is clear, I cannot give my consent. Were I to do so, cherie, how could I ever face Monsieur your father in the Land Above, and tell him that I broke my promise to him, and that I let you wander where you would'st, with no other protection than that given you by a stray lodger at a wayside inn."

The rapid energy with which he spoke scared Camilla anew. She looked tremblingly at him, and then hiding her face on the counterpane burst into fresh tears.

Her grief quieted Pierre as nothing else would have done. Laying his hand on the brown wig, he stroked it softly.

"Doucement, cherie, doucement. I have frightened you. We will talk no more about it. Tell me, then, has old Pierre taken away thy pleasure in having got all this money? That must not be. Thou hast taken a big weight off me, cherie. I had terrible dreams when I was ill about that purse. Mon Dieu, when I think of those dreams now——" the sweat broke out upon his brow at the recollection. "You were always starving, cherie—you and the troupe were famished—and I—I could only look on and let my heart bleed for you, but naught else—naught else. My hands seemed tied. And my promise to Monsieur votre pere always stared me in the face.'"

"But there is no need to worry now, grandfather, is there? Here are heaps and heaps of money, and it will last a long, long time, won't it?" Camilla asked wistfully.

"A long time, cherie, until Pierre is himself again, and can become the breadwinner. Ma foi, cherie," he continued cheerfully, to rouse the spirits he had been obliged so unwillingly to damp, "what would thy old Pierre have done had it not been for thee? Thou wert a brave child, and a good child to have done what thou hast."

"And the dogs, grandfather, and Taras, and Chicot," urged Camilla, the smiles now chasing each other on her face. "We all worked together."

"Then they were good, too. Did that rascal Taras behave himself?"

"Jacques made him," said Camilla with a gleeful laugh. "I don't know what I should have done without Jacques. He took so much care of me."

The poodle hearing his name crept closer to the pillow, and licked his master's cheek, as if he meant to say, "Could you not trust her with me?"

"Thou wert faithful then, mon chien?" murmured Pierre, stroking the curly head fondly; whereat Taras, with a snarl of jealousy, leaped on to the other side of the pillow and jabbered shrilly into his ear.

Pierre laughed feebly, and on hearing the laugh Camilla's reviving spirits gave another spurt up.

"And the lodger, cherie, what is he like?"

"Very nice, and oh! so kind, Pierre. One day he came and helped me to give you your medicine. He would have helped me to nurse you quite, but the doctor wouldn't have it."

"Know you his name?"

"No. Mrs. Jones only calls him 'Sir.'"

Pierre lay quiet for awhile. Fortunately for him, no disturbing thought connected with this lodger troubled him. Then Camilla, seeing him close his eyes, gathered up the money, and locked it carefully away.

As she ran downstairs and into the garden toward Chicot's stable, she met Mr. Densham standing by the gate with an open telegram in his hand. He came towards her with a perplexed expression, and then quietly helped her to give Chicot his evening meal.

That over, he said abruptly—

"I am obliged to leave this place early tomorrow morning on business, and I probably shall not return for a day or two. Will you promise me to give up having any performances until I come back?"

Camilla looked up with a drooping face. "I have just been promising grandfather that I'll never give another until he is able to come with me."

Mr. Densham's face cleared, and his voice sounded relieved, as he said—

"That is well. I feel now that I can go with an easy mind."

"I ought to feel very safe with so many protectors," said Camilla, with a demure little smile. And at that instant Jacques put his head in at the stable door, and, sidling up to her, cast his usual questioning glance at Roger Densham.

"And here is another to swell the number," said Mr. Densham lightly. "Well, two days at furthest I shall be here again."

The next morning he started, and Camilla went to the gate to see him off and wave him a last good-bye.

CHAPTER XXV.

Mr. Bartoletti at "The Robin's Nest."

It was the morning after Mr. Densham's departure. Mrs. Jones was smiling her hardest, and Mr. Jones, as he dusted the pint bottles of beer and replaced them on the shelf in the bar, stole quiet glances at the new customer, who was complimenting the landlady of "The Robin's Nest" on her excellent ale.

"No such ale have I tasted before in England," he was saying in a musical voice, while his dark face lighted up with a smile meant to be insinuating.

Mrs. Jones was pleased. No one, not even her gentleman lodger, had so praised the quality of the bar-room tap. She began to think the customer had not nearly so unpleasing a countenance as she had first thought.

"And what an abode of bliss," he continued looking through the window at what seemed indeed to be a peaceful country scene. "Just the sort of place I should delight to luxuriate in for a time. I suppose you do sometimes take a lodger?"

"Indeed," returned Mrs. Jones much elated, "we have three at present."

"More, if you count the animals," put in Mr. Jones with a sly laugh.

"What! has this quiet spot been found out already?"

"I have a gentleman lodger on the first floor," said the landlady proudly; "and higher up there is an old——" Here she stammered and paused, then went on, with rather a heightened colour—"There is a man with his little grandchild."

"You astonish me! And where have they all come from?"

"I don't know. The old—man is a strolling showman." And Mrs. Jones turned abruptly away to wipe some beer stains off the table, an uncomfortable feeling telling her that the less she talked about the strolling showman the better, for the memory of that false beard and wig had suddenly occurred to her.

"Then, of course, these animals that you speak of belong to the old man," said the customer, turning his head to address the landlord, of whom he had taken but scant notice before.

"Yes, and a fine trained lot they be," answered Mr. Jones, with emphasis. "As handsome a goat as you will see in a day's march, the finest-bred poodle on this side the water, two other dogs and a monk——" Here he stopped abruptly, catching sight for the first time of some pantomimic gestures from his wife, who stood behind the stranger.

Just then a bottle of medicine was handed in through the window by a small boy.

"For your lodger upstairs," he said, and was off in a trice.

"Rather trying to have a sick inmate," said the stranger in his blandest tone.

But Mrs. Jones did not reply. She was staring at the address on the sealed bottle in her hand.

"How vexing!" she exclaimed. "Here's that lad left the wrong mixture. This is not for here at all. It's written, 'H. Cleveland, Esq., Manor House.' Now what's to be done?"

At that moment a voice along the passage called, "Mrs. Jones, has my grandfather's medicine come yet?" And Camilla came into the bar.

"It's come and it's not come," was Mrs. Jones' reply, given in a vexed tone. "The boy brings a bottle, and is off like a streak of lightning, and then I find it's for the wrong house."

"Oh! what shall we do?" asked Camilla in dismay.

"If it weren't that Jones was bound to go in the other direction in less than five minutes from now, I'd have said he could go to Dr. Morgan's but he can't and that's plain. And if only Mr. Densham had been at home now ——" she whisked a beer bottle off the table, and placed it on a shelf with the others.

The stranger, who was no other than Mr. Bartoletti, came forward. "Can I be of any assistance?" he asked softly. "My time is of no account. I heard you mention Mr. Densham's name. I know him—slightly;" he paused, and looked at the three faces before him, his eye resting on the child's face last, and lingering there.

"Indeed, sir," said Mrs. Jones, with a new warmth in her tones, "any friend of Mr. Densham's is welcome at 'The Robin's Nest.' He is that good to this child. But he went to London yesterday, worse luck, and won't come back till tomorrow. Had he been here, he'd have walked off this very minute to fetch the proper medicine."

Mr. Bartoletti's mouth grew dry; his lips twitched. "And why should not Mr. Densham's friend do it instead?" The words were forced out somehow, and the Italian felt a strange quiver go through him as he spoke.

Some intuition told him that this grey-eyed child with the delicate face was no other than Camilla Falconer, and but for her his niece Anita would in time come in for the grand heritage of Rosslyn Towers and the thousands that went with it.

"Indeed, and you are kind! What do you say to that?" exclaimed Mrs. Jones, turning to Camilla, with nothing in her face to show that she had been hinting at such a proposal. "You are a lucky little gel to have such kind gentlemen willing to help you out of your troubles."

"But"—the dryness of Mr. Bartoletti's mouth was increasing, and he had to moisten his lips from the glass of ale before him, as he went on—"but as I don't know my way to the doctor's, and this little girl probably does, I should like her to come with me. I have a gig at the gate."

Yes, Camilla knew where Dr. Morgan lived, his house having been pointed out to her by Mr. Densham on their way to Charnford, but she shrank from accompanying this stranger. There was something about him that made the child fear him. The landlady saw her evident reluctance, and knew it must be overcome if the right medicine was to be brought.

"Just the thing," she said briskly. "You've been a bit mopey since Mr. Densham left. A drive in a nice carriage will do you a sight of good. Thank you, sir, she'll go with you with pleasure."

"I must first ask grandfather's permission," burst in Camilla; and breaking away from the group, she rushed upstairs with a great hope that Pierre would be awake and veto such a proposal with vehemence.

But no, the Frenchman was fast asleep, and nothing on earth would have persuaded Camilla to awaken him. So, with a reluctant step, she returned to the bar, and stood gazing with a pair of half-frightened eyes at Mr. Bartoletti.

"Grandfather's asleep," she said mechanically.

"Then I hope you didn't wake him," said Mrs. Jones tartly. It angered her to see the child's indifference to a pleasant drive with this kind-hearted gentleman. "Come now, away and get your hat. You can't keep the gentleman waiting, seein' as he's so kind as to offer his services to you. Many a little gel would jump at such a chance. And remember, your grandfather can't have his medicine until it's brought him. I dessay it'll make him ill not to have it, and it'll be time in another hour."

That decided it. Camilla was willing to go through fire and water for Pierre, if need be, and surely a short drive with this rather unpleasant-looking stranger was not nearly so bad as all that.

Soberly she went and fetched her hat, and as she reached the last stair a cold wet nose was thrust into her down-dropped hand. It was Jacques. His loving eyes looked into hers. "Where you go, my little friend, I go also," he all but said. "My master has put you into my care, and I will not fail him."

So together they went into the garden, where at the gate Mr. and Mrs. Jones stood, and the Italian was seated in the gig with the reins in his hand.

"That's right, said the landlady, "never refuse a good offer. She'll enjoy it somethin' amazin', sir, when once your started."

With this, the reluctant Camilla was hoisted up alongside Mr. Bartoletti, with the bottle of medicine held tight in her hand. The next minute Jacques had sprung up beside her.

With an impatient movement Mr. Bartoletti checked the starting horse.

"Remove the dog," he said harshly. "I won't take the dog."

"He'll not leave me," said Camilla, some impulse prompting her to throw her arms round Jacques and cling desperately to him.

"Lor, sir," put in Mr. Jones, who had gone round to hold the horses head, "at dog'll taste blood afore he'll let little missie go without him."

There was a decidedly ugly frown on Mr. Bartoletti's face. He was feeling almost beside himself with vague wonderings, evil thoughts, criminal ideas. The blood was coursing wildly through his veins; the hand that held the reins shook visibly.

What he was going to do, he did not know as yet. He was certainly not going to drive merely to Dr. Morgan's to fetch a bottle of medicine for a strolling old showman, as these poor innocent rustics thought, and the dog was an unlooked-for quantity. He did not want him, but no more did he want the dog to taste blood, for it would undoubtedly be Mr. Bartoletti's blood, if he made any attempt to eject this savage creature from his gig.

He hated dogs at all times. He—— But at that moment Mr. Jones let go the horse, and away he started. Camilla gave a hasty look back at "The Robin's Nest," and then they whirled round the corner.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The gig sped rapidly along, and Mr. Bartoletti's brain was in a whirl of thought. He never glanced once at the child by his side, who sat as motionless as a statue, with one arm clasped tightly round Jacques. Only as they came within a stone's throw of Dr. Morgan's house did Camilla's lips unclose.

"We have come to the doctor's," she said, in a distinct tone of relief. "It is this big white house."

But for answer Mr. Bartoletti gave the horse a slight touch with the whip, and the gig swept by the house like a flash of lightning.

Camilla turned a pale scared face towards him. "Why have you passed it?" she questioned in a trembling voice.

The Italian made no answer. It was very probable he did not hear her, for he was wondering what on earth he was going to do with her. Without any previously arranged plan, he found that he had possessed himself of this child and what if, after all, she turned out to be other than the one he sought.

His thoughts flew back to the description Guy Falconer had given of his little cousin, as seen on board The Fair Nancy. What had the lad said then of the child? Fragile-looking and renned, with pensive gray eyes, and curly golden hair. This child's hair was brown—nothing of the gold sparkled there. But the rest of the description tallied well.

Yet stay. What if the Frenchman had disguised the child?

With a jerk that pulled the horse violently back, he stopped the gig, and demanded of the child her name.

Too terrified to refuse, Camilla gave it.

"Take off your hat," was the next demand, the sharp tones sounding strangely jubilant.

With trembling fingers the child loosened the elastic, and, removing the hat, disclosed the wealth of brown hair beneath.

With an unceremonious hand, the Italian swept the brown locks aside, and, before Camilla could realize what he was doing, the wig was off her head and in his hand. With a mocking laugh of triumph he held it at arm's length, and Camilla gave a cry of terror and despair as she jumped up to seize it from him.

The Young to the Old

You who are old,
And have fought the fight,
And have won or lost or left the field,
Weigh us not down
With fears of the world, as we run!
With the wisdom that is too right,
The warning to which we cannot yield—
The shadow that follows the sun
Follows forever—
And with all that desire must leave undone,
Though as a god it endeavor,
Weigh, weigh us not down!

But gird our hope to believe
That all that is done
Is done by dream and daring—
Bid us dream on!
The earth was not born
Or Heaven built of bewaring—
Yield us the dawn!
You dreamt your hour—and dared, but we Would dream till all you despaired of be.
Would dare, till the world,
Won to a new wayfaring,

Not one holy day, but seven;
Worshipping, not at the call of a bell, but at the call of my soul;
Singing, not at the baton's sway, but to the rhythm in my heart;
Loving because I must;
Giving because I cannot keep;
Doing for the joy of it.

What Grandma Threw

There was a game of ball in progress in the back yard. Grandma, busy with her basket of darning, smiled as she watched the three town boys from the window. She was not the only one who watched them, however. Ont in the road were three or four poorly dressed boys who, attracted by the shouting and laughing in the yard usually so quiet, were looking through the fence. "Town kids," muttered one to another, beginning to dislike the ball players at once, though they could not have told why except that the newcomers were better dressed and seemed to be having a good time, in which those outside the fence were not sharing. Presently one of them called his comment aloud: "Dudes!"

"Ragbag!" promptly responded Guy.

"Such playing!" sneered the boys outside.

"If you don't like it, you needn't watch it. Clear out!" shouted the boys inside.

Back and forth over the fence the sharp words flew, and of course it was only a few minutes before an occasional stick or stone was flying, also. Then, by an unlucky toss, the ball went over, and that ended the game, for the boys refused to give it up.

"Oh, no, we won't throw it back, sonny! You don't know how to play with it anyhow, so 'tain't no use to you," they answered mockingly to all demands for its return. "You didn't have to throw it over, and we don't have to throw it back."

Angry, and fearful of losing their ball altogether, the young visitors hurried into the house with the story of their wrongs. "They're spoiling all our fun, and we can't drive them away; and now they've got the ball."

"And you can't make them go away and let you alone?" asked grandma.

"No'm. We talked to 'em and threw things at 'em, and everything."

"Well, well! Maybe you didn't throw anything that hit them in the right place," said grandma severely. "I won't have them tormenting you in any such way. I'll throw something that will send them off in a hurry."

She marched into the pantry, and the boys looked at each other with much surprise mingling with satisfaction. They wanted the intruders driven off, but the idea of sweet-faced grandma throwing stones. Or had she gone for bricks or hot water? She hurried out of the door, and they followed her, but they could not distinctly see what missile she sent over the fence. "Don't say anything to them. Wait and see what they'll do," she said to the wondering boys on the step.

But after a few minutes of silence they could not resist the temptation to tiptoe over the grass and peep through into the road. There sat the enemy around a torn paper sack, eating some of grandma's delicious doughnuts!

"Hump!" said Charlie.

"Here's your ball," said a rather subdued voice outside, and the treasure dropped at Charlie's feet. "We didn't mean to keep it anyway. We was only foolin'. We're goin' fishin.."

"They've gone, haven't they?" inquired grandma as the three boys came back to the house. "You can nearly always make people peaceable by throwing at them, if only you throw the right things."

The boys laughed, though they looked a little ashamed; for often afterwards, when there was danger of getting into a quarrel, one of the others would say warningly: "Better throw a doughnut."—Round Table.

The Pink China Plate

Mrs. Herrick had been cleaning her silver. Her little daughter Nell was skipping around the table, occasionally stopping to make faces that looked very funny in the polished sides of the sugar-bowl.

"I'm so glad they're cleaned," Mrs. Herrick said, as she put the spoons in the spoon-holder, and set them upon the sideboard.

But, alas! as she turned away her sleeve caught on a spoon, over went the spoonholder with a crash, and there was a big nick in the side of a delicate pink china plate that had been in range of the falling spoons.

"I'm very sorry, but I suppose you will be glad to have another dish for your playhouse, Nell?" she said, as she picked up the pieces.

"That is just beautiful," Nell said, enthusiastically, forgetting to be sorry for her mamma's loss; and after admiring it for a few minutes she ran into the front room to give the signal to Bell Hastings to come over. Bell lived just across the street, and when anything unusual happened at Nell's house, Nell put a paper in the front window in the parlor, which meant that she wanted Bell to come over as soon as possible. When anything unusual happened at Bell's house, Bell put a paper in the window for Nell to come over. Bell came right over, for she happened to be looking over at Nell's house when Nell put the paper in the window.

Nell's playhouse was in the shed. In one corner was the play table, which was made of a board propped up on two big sticks of wood. On this table were a good many odds and ends of broken dishes, and the pink plate was placed in the center of the table.

After Nell and Bell had admired the plate enthusiastically, Nell said, "Let's give a high tea. Mamma will let me have some of those crisp little ginger snaps and some little crackers, and we can have water for coffee, and we can have a tea almost like real ladies. You know they don't have much to eat, but the ladies are all dressed up and eat with their gloves on, and are very stylish and polite. I've got some old kid gloves of mamma's that she gave me to play with, and we can be very polite, and it will be almost like a real tea."

"Did you ever go to a real high tea yourself? asked Bell.

"No, but I've heard about them, so I know what we ought to do pretty well," Nell replied.

Then Nell and Bell had a lovely time decorating the table with flowers and paper napkins, and arranging the crackers and ginger snaps on the pink plate.

"Now we must put the chairs round the table," Bell said, when the table was in readiness.

"Oh, no! that would spoil it all; you have to stand up to eat at a high tea, or you won't be in style," Nell said in a superior way.

Then they put on their hats and the kid gloves and tied some ribbons around their necks, and went to the table. They were nibbling their ginger snaps in a very dainty way, when one end of the table slipped off the stick on which it was rested, and down went the flowers, ginger snaps, crackers, dishes and all.

"I do believe that lovely pink plate is broken in a thousand pieces," Nell said, ruefully.

"How did you happen to tip it over?" Bell asked, sympathizingly.

"Me tip it over? I didn't. I wasn't so near to it as you were."

"Well, I didn't do it," Bell replied.

Nell must have forgotten that she was at a high tea, and therefore should be very polite, for she said, "Why, Bell Hastings, you must have, for I'm sure I didn't."

"Well, I know I didn't do it, and I don't think you're very polite to your company to tell them they tipped the table over. I'll go home this minute, and I'll stay there, too."

"Well, I should think you'd better, if you can't go anywhere without breaking all the dishes anybody has got in the house," was the spirited reply.

Mamma heard loud voices and looking out of the window saw Bell walking out of the yard, holding her head very high. In a few minutes Nell came in with some very red cheeks.

"Bell didn't stay very long, did she?" mamma inquired, gently.

"Long enough," was the uncompromising reply.

"I hope you didn't have any trouble with her?" queried mamma.

"She broke that pink plate you gave me this morning, and then tried to make out I did it. I should think that was enough to make any one have trouble," said Nell.

"How did it happen?" asked mamm a.

"Why, we were having a high tea, and were standing at the table eating, and she pushed the table over."

"Are you sure you didn't help do it."

"I'm very sure Bell did it."

"Of course, Bell didn't intend to do it, and I hope you didn't treat her impolitely."

"Well, she tried to make out I did it, and I didn't think much of that."

"Are you sure you didn't help push the table over?" mamma asked again. "It would be more generous for you to be willing to bear a part of the blame, at least."

"I wasn't much to blame, anyway," Nell replied, with less assurance.

"Of course, you can't go over to Bell's to play until you have asked her pardon for treating her as you did this morning. I should be very sorry to treat a guest impolitely because they happened to break a broken plate," mamma said, impressively.

"That plate was pretty, and I don't want to go over there very soon," Nell said, shutting her lips closely.

But that very afternoon Nell did want to go over to see Bell very much when she saw her out in the yard under the trees playing with her dolls. After watching Bell for about half an hour, she said, hesitatingly, to mamma:

"I suppose I might go over and ask Bell to excuse me for not being polite this morning?"

"I would," mamma said, encouraginly.

When Nell came home she looked very happy. "Wasn't it funny, mamma," she asked, "when I asked Bell to excuse me, and told her I guessed I was some to blame for breaking the plate, she said she thought she was to blame, too? So we concluded one was to blame as much as the other."—Ex.

An Employer's Standard

The following nine rules, says Herbert Kaufman in the Chicago Record-Herald, were printed on a card and given to each one of his employes by a very successful employer of labor. Practically they embody the standards of all honorable employers:

"Don't lie—it wastes my time and yours. I'm sure to catch you in the end, and that's the wrong end.

"Watch your work, not the clock. A long day's work makes a long day short, and a day's short work makes my face long.

"Give me more than I expect and I'll pay you more than you expect. I can afford to increase your pay if you increase my profits.

"You owe so much to yourself that you can't afford to owe anybody else. Keep out of debt or keep out of my shops.

"Dishonesty is never an accident. Good men, like good women, can't see temptation when they meet it.

"Don't do anything here which hurts your self-respect. The employee who is willing to steal for me is capable of stealing from me.

"It's none of my business what you do at night, but if dissipation affects what you do next day and you do half as much as I demand, you'll last half as long as you hoped.

"Don't tell me what I'd like to hear, but what I ought to hear. I don't want a valet for my vanity, but I need one for my dollars.

"Don't kick if I kick—if you're worth while correcting, you're worth while keeping. I don't waste time cutting specks out of rotten apples."

—David E. Thompson, United States ambassador to Mexico, has secured control of the Pan-American railway, a line extending 244 miles from San Geronimo on the Tehauntepec National railway to Mariscal, on the Mexican-Guatemalian frontier. He secured $9,600,000 worth of stock.

—Former Vice President Charles W. Fairbanks, accompanied by Mrs. Fairbanks, has left Shanghai for Manila. The Shanghai Times refers to Mr. Fairbanks's visit to China at the present time as especially helpful to American interests.

—Charles Fallen McKim, one of the world's greatest architects, died at St. James, Long Island, last week from over work. Mr. McKim, who was sixty-two years old, was for many years president of the American Institute of Architects. He was the founder of the firm of McKim, Mead & White, which designed the recent addition to the White House, the Boston public library, the University Club of New York and many other famous buildings.

—A London correspondent says that the members of the British Cabinet would not like to dissolve Parliament, because they need their salaries. Premier Asquith is a barrister who has no practice now to fall back on; he got some money with his wife, but not enough to make him independent. Haldane is a practicing barrister who had to leave the law courts when he became minister for war and may not find them ready to take him back. Churchill has nothing but his salary except a few hundreds a year, and married a wife beautiful and charming but without a penny. Lloyd George is a man of such simple wants that he could easily go back to the small income he was earning as a solicitor when he was still a private member; but still it is a consideration to have 5,000 pounds a year out of which to make a saving of 2,000 to 3,000 pounds, and with his modest tastes and frugal and simple little Welsh wife this he can do now.

—President Taft has been of all American statesmen the greatest traveler. His traveling record for the last nine years, which will soon be boosted by some twelve thousand miles of western touring, would be astonishing in a professional globetrotter. His yearly average is more than fifteen thousand miles travelled to the music of car wheel and propeller. If he had started for the moon when he left Cincinnati for the Philippines in 1900 and kept on traveling in that direction instead of keeping to official business on terra firma he would pretty nearly have arrived at the earth's satellite. At least he would have covered 136,000 out of the 221,000 mile trip.

Of Virtue

The flower of Virtue is the heart's content;
And fame is Virtue's fruit that she doth bear;
And Virtue's vase is fair without and fair
Within; and Virtue's mirror brooks no taint;
And Virtue by her names is sage and saint;
And Virtue hath a steadfast front and clear;
And Love is Virtue's constant minister;
And Virtue's gift of gifts is pure descent.
And Virtue dwells with Knowledge, and therein
Her cherished home of rest is real love;
And Virtue's strength is in a suffering will;
And Virtue's work is life exempt from sin,
With arms that aid; and in the sum hereof,
All Virtue is to render good for ill.

The Man Who Wins

The man who wins is the man who works—
The man who toils while the next man shirks;
The man who stands in his deep distress
With his head held high in the deadly press—
Yes, he is the man who wins.

The man who wins is the man who knows
The value of pain and the worth of woes—
Who a lesson learns from the man who fails
And a moral finds in his mournful wails;
Yes, he is the man who wins.
The man who wins is the man who stays
In the unsought paths and the rocky ways,
And, perhaps, who lingers, now and then,
To help some failure to rise again,
Ah, he is the man who wins!

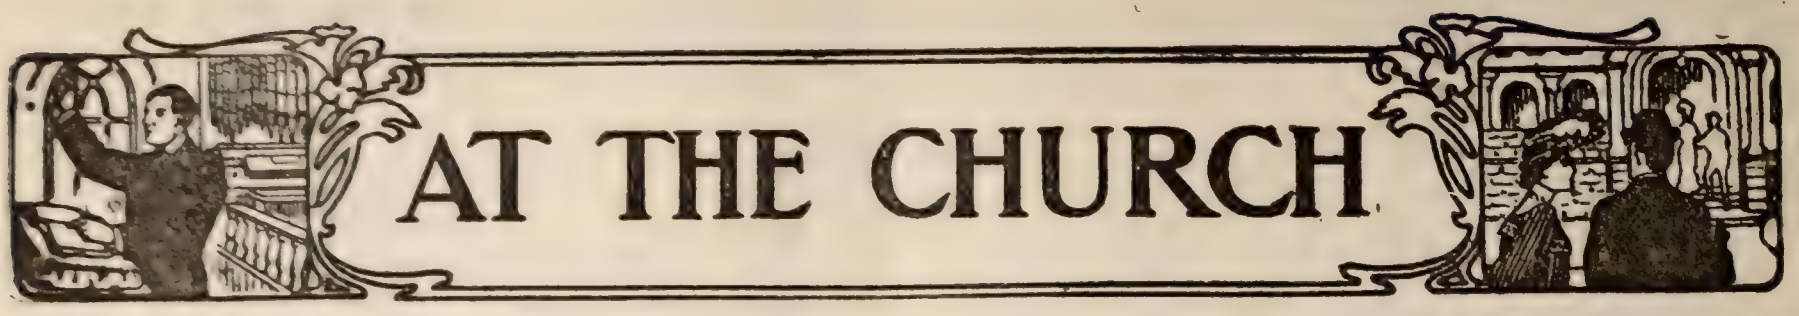
Woman's Sphere

—The late Mrs. Marian McBride of Boston was one of the best known American woman journalists. She was employed on the staff of the New York World, the Boston Post and was a frequent contributor to the leading journals, east and west. She was founder of women's press clubs in Ohio, Washington and Boston, and actively interested in many lines of charitable work.



—Mrs. Emmaline Pankhurst, the suffragette who has been prominent in the London campaign, is a native of Australia. She lived for many years in Sydney. Women have full suffrage there, but Mrs. Pankhurst's methods were never employed or approved by the women voters of the state of New South Wales.

—A movement has been set on foot by the General Federation of Woman's Clubs to send to England a number of young women to be educated in the colleges affiliated with Oxford and Cambridge. A fund of $1,500 has already been raised for the needs of the first candidate, who will go this year. Applicants will have to pass a stiff examination and will be expected to give a good account of themselves while abroad. Miss Laura Drake Gill, formerly dean of Barnard College, New York, was active in originating the plan.

—Mrs. John A. Johnson, the widow of the late Governor Johnson of Minnesota, was her husband's confidant and adviser in many important political crises. She was educated in a convent and after graduation taught painting in a private school. She has little liking for society, entertaining but little, interesting herself in her husband's affairs, and caring for her family. Her chief diversion is painting, and some of her canvasses have been shown in local exhibitions.

—Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., of New York, and her husband, have signed a separation agreement. Mrs. Vanderbilt is a Roman Catholic and conscientiously opposed to divorce. She was Miss Virginia Fair of San Francisco, one of the wealthiest heiresses in the United States. She was a close friend of the Duchess of Marlborough, who was Consuelo Vanderbilt prior to her marriage.

—Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont has given the New York State Woman's Suffrage Association a magnificent building on Fifth avenue as headquarters. This, with the entertainments at her Newport villa, "Marble House," and an elaborate luncheon at the Plaza, to say nothing of large money contributions, would indicate the sincerity with which she has taken up the cause. It is now asked of her, at the suggestion of Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, daughter of the late Elizabeth Cady Stanton, that Mrs. Belmont enter a Tammany polling both on election day and insist upon being allowed to cast her ballot—a privilege which a woman paying thousands of dollars in taxes thinks she should not have to ask.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Among the Barbarians*

In our study of last week's lesson we saw something of the disastrous results of that voyage on which Paul and his fellow prisoners started from Caesarea under the direction of Julius, the centurion. Their transfer had been successfully made at Myra from the ship on which they had started to one bound for Italy. Soon after leaving the coast of Asia they encountered stormy weather which drove thm somewhat out of their course and forced them into the harbor of Fair Havens on the southern coast of Crete. From this place they departed to seek a better haven, if it were possible. But their departure was against the advice of Paul, whose experience had led him to doubt the safety of any journey on the Mediterranean so late in the year. But the anxiety of the captain to find a better port in which to winter, and probably the hope of the centurion that they might be able to complete the entire journey, and thus relieve him of his responsibility, prevailed and the voyage was resumed. Soon, however, they were in the throes of a tempest that beat down upon them from the cliffs of Crete and drove them far out of their course. Their present danger was very great, and before them were all the uncertainties of shipwreck by either the vicissitudes of the storm or some rocky or treacherous coast which was even more probable and might mean wreck to them all.

Nearing the Coast.

Two weeks of this dreadful uncertainty they passed, in which the 276 people on board the ship were in almost hourly expectation of death. They lightened the ship first of its tackling and then of its cargo, especially when, at last, they felt themselves approaching a coast, whose terrors they could only fear but could not see in the darkness. The attempt of the soldiers to save themselves by cutting away the small boat was frustrated by Paul, who was the only courageous spirit of them all. He assured them that if they followed his directions, they could all reach safety.

Meantime the ship had been beached at a point where two currents met and so stood in imminent danger of breaking up. The desire of the soldiers to kill their prisoners and thus relieve themselves of responsibility was prevented by the centurion through consideration for Paul; and, at last, all on board, by various devices and by the assistance of the floating parts of the ship, came safely to land. It was the island of Melita, or Malta, about fifty miles south of Sicily. Probably the point on which the ship struck was a bay on the northeast part of the island. Malta was a province of Rome, but its people were deemed barbarians because they were not a Greek-speaking race, being of Phoenician origin, probably immigrants from Carthage.

The Viper.

But they were kindly people and received the unfortunates from the ship with such hospitality as they could command. It was the raw weather of autumn, both stormy and cold, and their first effort was to warm the almost exhausted refugees. Fires were built along the shore, and natives and voyagers shared the task of gathering fuel.

This led to an interesting experience on Paul's part. When he came with a bundle of fagots to throw on the fire, he discovered a viper on his hand. These creatures were usually poisonous. No deadly viper is now found on the island of Malta, but this does not disapprove the statement of Luke. Paul seems not to have thought much of the incident. The dangers of the immediate past had been too great to permit him any special concern for what may have seemed to him a trivial incident. He shook off the beast which perhaps by reason of the cold, was harmless. At any rate Paul suffered no evil from it. But the natives of the island who saw the thing clinging to his hand were sure that it was a providential visitation. Their idea of the wrath of the gods would make such an explanation reasonable. He was a prisoner they knew and they imagined that some great crime had brought him to his present condition. First the storm had threatened and now, that he had escaped, the divine wrath pursued him to this kind of death. But when he shook off the serpent and seemed to suffer no harm, they suddenly reversed their opinion and believed that no one less than a god could have come safely through such an experience. It was the common belief of antiquity that the viper's sting was fatal. The people thought that Paul had worked a miracle in escaping from the danger.

The Healing of the Sick.

As is was necessary to remain on the island until another ship could be secured, hospitality was extended to the travellers by the people of the place. Paul seems to have been selected as one of those worthy of the special kindness of the head officer of the island, who was perhaps himself a subordinate of the proconsul of Sicily. Whether the entertainment and hospitality extended by this man to the shipwrecked members of Paul's company included all, or only himself and a few others we do not know. But the occasion offered Paul an opportunity for further testimony to the gospel.

The father of Publius, the magistrate, was sick of a dangerous disease. Paul was taken, probably at his own request, to see the invalid, and there talked and prayed with him. He also laid his hand upon him and restored him to health. In this manner something of that power which Jesus had manifested so freely was displayed by his great apostle. The news soon spread, and many others afflicted with diseases came and were cured by Paul. Perhaps also Luke was a helper of his in this good work of healing, for Luke was a physician, and when he mentions the fact of the cures wrought among the people, he adds "who also honored us with many honors." Does he mean to imply by this that the honors paid to himself and Paul were in recognition of the work of healing wrought? Apparently so, and this would imply that Luke's medical skill was actively employed in caring for the sick of the island even as Paul's healing power. The honors bestowed upon them must have included articles necessary for the voyage, such as they would need after their hard experience of the previous journey. In this way the time of their stay on the island was employed to the advantage of that faith which Paul and his followers were interested to preach throughout the world.

Paul's Real Purpose.

When one reads in II. Corinthians 11 the catalogue of Paul's sufferings for the sake of the gospel, it is natural to ask whether this shipwreck experience was mentioned as a part of that pathetic list of experiences. Was this the night and the day that he had been in the deep? That hardly seems possible. No doubt it was one of the three shipwrecks he had to suffer, and yet so casually are these afflictions of the apostle passed over that only by the taunts of his enemies at Corinth was he induced to open his lips regarding the severity of those afflictions which he had endured for the Master he loved. Truly he counted not his life dear unto him only so that he might finish his course with joy and the testimony which he had received of Jesus Christ.

It is probable that Paul thought less of his shipwreck experience or of the danger from the viper's bite than he did of the opportunity he had received to preach his message in a place he had not expected to visit. Three months were permitted him for this good work, and though no missionary activity is mentioned, it cannot be doubted that this was the way in which the interval was employed. And no doubt disciples were won there on the spot. There in later generations the Knights of St. John took refuge on their retreat from Palestine, and where the traveler stops today to study the massive fortifications of the English sea station and to meditate on the experiences of the apostle of Jesus Christ so strangely cast upon this land twenty centuries ago.

The Soul's Insistence

BY FRED CLARE BALDWIN, D. D.

When they that know me here have said,
"He's gone,"
And harsher lips proclaim me dead,
I shall be living on;
When o'er my head
Some kindly shaft perchance will tell
Where first was seen,
And then where sank, this outworn shell
(Let silence have the stretch between!)
I shall be sailing on:
Or else, to Life's wide wave
Were there no harbor but the grave—
No harboring hope to feed upon;
And Love were launched to chase a myth,
A thing for storm to wrestle with
And glut oblivion!

THE MINISTRY OF SACRED MUSIC

Topic, October 27. 1 Sam. 16:14-23; Acts 16:25; Col. 3:6; James 5:13.

Religion is more than dogma. It is an emotional attitude which the intellect is incompetent to analyze and explain fully. It is the business of the theologian to interpret religious feeling in the light of all the knowledge he can command, and as long as he does not claim finality for his conclusions men look with favor upon his work. But they become rebellious if they suspect that he is attempting to fix the limits of their experience. They demand room for the play of imagination and exalted feeling. The relation of the soul to God cannot be defined exactly. Music does not define; it soothes, it arouses, it unifies, and it purifies. It assuages grief and it increases courage. It idealizes common tasks and relations and confirms the fondest hopes of religion.

A Healing Ministry.

The music of David's harp refreshed the spirit of Saul and drove away the evil spirit. All the wise men in the kingdom of Israel could not with their arguments have done what David did with his harp. The distracted king would not have appreciated a sermon on forgiving love and sacrificial patriotism. Exhortations would have enraged him. David did not reason, he did not exhort; he aroused the nobler qualities of Saul and then Saul had no need that some one should discourse on the folly of jealousy and revenge. If, when ugly moods take possession of our souls, we could have some David play to us, the evil spirits of doubt and fear and anger would depart before they had a chance to lead us into disgraceful actions.

A Ministry of Hope.

Paul and Silas, we may believe, felt as they sang praises to God that the things hoped for belonged to the world of realities. The scars on their backs and the stocks that held their feet became less real than the love of God in Christ Jesus. Sacred song relieves the gloom of the darkest hour. It strengthens the hearts of the servants of God in the fight against the tyranny of ancient evil. The supporters of bad institutions and customs fear the attacks of men who sing as they fight. Of course, singing is not a substitute for wise planning. The new era is brought in by the agony of its prophets. We may sing and forget disagreeable duty, as the drunkard drinks in order to forget it. The disciple of the Lord remembers the situation in which he finds himself. He sings that he may arouse all the powers of the soul for the work which he has planned with care.

A Unifying Mystery.

It is the habit of many public speakers to begin their addresses with a story or a number of stories. The skilled speaker has a very definite purpose in introducing his stories. He seeks to bring the people before him to a common way of thinking and feeling. If he can accomplish this purpose he knows that he can drive home the truth he wishes to impart. In the worship of the church music should be the unifying power. When the minister rises to speak the people ought to be ready for his message. The music of the house of God does not take them away from their daily toil and care: it enables them to find for common experience a place in the providence of God. It makes them feel that they share the common lot and brings the human and the divine together. The debates and divisions which have their origin in extreme individualism lose their bitterness and finally disappear from congregations in which the great hymns of faith are sung with the spirit and with the understanding. Debate divides; music unites.

A Teaching Ministry.

It is an old question whether morality and religion can be taught. Whatever may be a man's opinion on this question, he cannot doubt, if he is intelligent, that devotion to the larger interests of life is increased by the ministry of music. The relations of the home are idealized in song. Without music patriotism would be sordid and calculating selfishness. No church can live on sermons, however great. Appreciation of persons and institutions is incomplete unless men can sing of friendship and love and of the institutions in which these are fostered and protected.

HEROES OF MISSIONS IN THE ISLANDS

Topic, October 31. Isa. 32:1-4, 16-20.

It is good for us to give our attention to the islands. We are apt to forget them because they are small. But they present to our minds the full round of human experience. The comedies and tragedies are there with every variation. In these islands are 1,700,000 people said to be a dying race, partly because of their own vices but mostly because of the travesties wrought upon them by the civilized people, chiefly from Christian countries. The whites have given them destructive diseases, provoked them to actions of vengeance and war, seized and sold them as slaves, and transported the white criminals into the natives' midst. Sensual vice, cannibalism, human sacrifice and infanticide are habits of life common to all primitive people. With such a state of affairs is it any wonder that any white man was viewed with grave suspicion and his life sought wherever possible?

Something more than 100 years ago, holy men of God took their lives in their hands and set out to win these isolated and defenseless people for the kingdom of God. Today there are 300,000 native evangelical Christians. A considerable number of the islands have been wholly Christianized by the labors of the missionaries. Old vices have so completely given way that even travelers who are hostile to the missionary cause and who because of their vicious curiosity seek the nude and demoralizing sights say that "peace and order have visited these erstwhile savages and made them happier." Mr. Buchner says, "Yet I am convinced [although, as he says, there is no class of Europeans with which he has less sympathy than the hypocritical reverends—meaning the missionaries] that the missionaries have won for themselves great credit for what they have done for the welfare of the natives Formerly despotism and cannibalism, mutual fear, insecurity of life and property, a state of war, all against all, lay heavily upon the population. Now in the time of Christianity peace and order have come among them . . . and Christianity has brought about a highly satisfactory advance." The missionaries opened work in Hawaii in 1820 and fifty years later their work was so completely done that the American board turned the work all over to the natives. This has been described as "the miracle of the nineteenth century." The name of Geddie is always linked with the Southern Islands. He began his work in 1848. He won the Island. The inscription over his tomb in Ameityum is: "When he came to the island in 1848 there was not a single Christian; when he left it in 1872 there was not a single heathen"

But we must remember that this achievement was not made without the shedding of blood. John Williams, the most renowned of all South Sea missionaries, made Raiatea the basis of his operations. He christianized the island. From it he made his voyages like Paul to preach the gospel. He planted the work in the archipelago, where now there are 90,000 Christians He also reached the Samoan group, which now has 32,000 Christians and is completely transformed. When he applied for appointment he wrote: "If this does not meet with your approbation, I hope, pray, and trust that you will on no account, for the sake of my soul, offer me the least bit of encouragement." He was accepted and this is his ordination charge: "Go, dear young brother, and if thy tongue cleave to the roof of thy mouth let it be with the teaching poor sinners of the love of Jesus Christ; and if thy arm drop from they shoulder let to be by knocking at men's hearts to gain admission for him there" To this charge he remained true until death. One day he left on a mission tour to be gone several days. He had planned to visit some strange islands. He came to Eromanga. He and two companions left their vessel and went to land in a small boat After they had been on land a few minutes and were separated from one another the natives sounded a war-cry, and in five minutes Mr. Williams was a dead man. The two Gordons in quick succession suffered a similar fate on the same island. But it is now Christianized.

J. C. Patterson, the most eminent personality and second bishop of the Santa Cruz group, was also murdered in Nukapu in 1872. "His was a sacrifice to the vengeance of the islanders for their shameful treatment at the hands of the whites." Space forbids to do more than mention J. G. Patton of the New Hebrides who for more than fifty years has "died daily" for that people. The Aniwa he has seen turn from paganism to Christ.

We should know these heroes of the islands. We cannot do better than to read their lives. To do so will be to add cubits to our moral statutes. Here are the names of their biographies: Younge: Life of J. C. Patterson; Prout: Memoirs of the Life of John Williams; and J. C. Patton's Autobiograph. Write any publishing company and they can furnish them for you.

Victory in Defeat

When earth's recruited ranks one day
The heights have scaled,
Then I who shared the glorious fray,
And did my best,
Shall not have fought and failed;
But from the crest
Of mountain ranges far ahead—
With myriads of the listed dead,
Sceptered and crowned,
I shall be looking down;
Else Faith were breathed the soul within
To fight for life with blows of steel,
To clinch with Doubt, to conquer sin,
And then to fall—
And falling kiss Death's crushing heel—
And that were all!—Christian Advocate.

The Lenox Ave. Church, New York city, which has just moved into its new property, is repairing the bowling alleys, and will have them in perfect condition by the middle of October. This shows a spirit on the part of the church to meet the problems that face it in the large city. W. B. Craig has accepted a call to the pastorate of this church.

F. H. Groom, pastor of the Central Church, Tacoma, Washington, is arranging for a meeting to be held in his church some time during the winter. The emphasis in the meeting will not be placed upon the number of people who can be secured as members of the church, but upon deepening the spirit of devotion in the church.

W. R. Fullerton, Oakland City, Atlanta, Ga., in a personal letter calls attention to the recent statement made in a late number of the Christian Century, that Atlanta had been more prosperous since the prohibition of the sale of intoxicants. Mr. Fullerton verifies this statement and speaks words of greatest commendation of Mayor Maddox, who is a Christian man, but recently convinced of the efficiency of prohibitory laws.

The church at Sterling, Ill., sent its pastor, Ira L. Parvin, to the Centennial convention, providing him with a purse to defray all expenses. This church is moving steadily forward. There have been twenty-seven additions to the membership during the last year. All financial obligations of the church have been met promptly. A meeting will be held in December, when they will have the assistance of Allen Wilson, evangelist.

The Oak Park Church, Chicago, voted on a recent Sunday to turn over their membership roll to the Maywood Church and disband. Some of the members will unite with the Maywood Church and others will unite with various West Side churches, some having already returned to Austin. The church failed because of a lack of the spirit of coöperation in the membership and because of the loss of members through removals from the city.

At its annual meeting, October 6, the First Church at Milwaukee, Wis., for the first time in thirteen years heard its treasurer report all bills paid and a balance in the treasury. Claire L. Waite is the pastor. It is believed that the "annual deficit" is a thing of the past. The church also voted to pay its pastor's railroad fare, round trip, to the Centennial at Pittsburg. Eight of its members are attending the Centennial.

The first meeting of the Men's Club of the Central Church, Warren, Ohio, will be held October 20. The address of the evening will be by Rev. A. W. Every man is asked to bring with him to the banquet of the Men's Club, a boy from 12 to 18 years of age.

The First Church, Bloomington, Ill., Edgar D. Jones, pastor, has just closed a great year's work. At the annual meeting held October 8, splendid reports were read from all departments. For all purposes the church raised $12,689.04 last year, of which sum $1,452.53 was for missions. No deficits in any department and $425.03 on hand. At the annual meeting an increase in the pastor's salary from $2,500 to $3,000 was unanimously given. This church also paid the expenses of its pastor to Pittsburg.

Richard Martin, of the "Martin Family," opened a meeting October 8 at McAlester, Oklahoma, and will go for November to Alva, Oklahoma, in both of which cities large meetings are looked for. His new book, "The Children of the Clergy," will be on sale in December. His home address is 3433 Pierce avenue, Chicago, Illinois, where mail will always reach him.

J. M. Rudy, Greencastle, Ind., says: "I notice that W. L. Hayden of Indianapolis has just issued in pamphlet form his Centennial Addresses. I am glad he has given these fine messages to our brotherhood in printed form. Bro. Hayden is one of our ablest men. He is young at 70. We had him deliver these addresses to our Men's Brotherhood in Greencastle. He made a deep impression upon all hearts. I wish he could be called to all parts of the country to deliver his great message. Buy these fine addresses and then read them carefully and prayerfully.

The Kirkwood Ave. Christian Church of Bloomington, Indiana, closes the Centennial year with some advance along several lines. The offerings for local work have been increased 100 per cent and the church closes with money in the treasury. The total missionary offerings have been increased 300 per cent. A permanent gain in membership has been made by additions from week to week. On a recent Wednesday night fifteen members were received into the church. Six of these were grown men, who made the confession, were baptized and received the same evening. The church sent the pastor, Joseph C. Todd, to Pittsburg.

W. J. Lhamon and Byron L. Burditt on October 4 closed a meeting in Lathrop, Mo., which in the number of additions to the church passed far beyond all former records of the town and community. There were seventy-three additions, above 66 per cent of them men and women and heads of families. The pastor, B. F. Creason, and the members of the church had made excellent preparation for the work. The great tent was filled to the very last. Many came from neighboring churches and joined in the joy of the services. An unusual feature of the meeting was the afternoon lectures on the characteristics that make the character Christ, and on Comparative Religion. The class grew to an audience, and the work was an educational one for many in the community.

The church at Table Grove, Ill., recently entertained the Fulton County Bible-school Convention, and followed it with a rally for their own school with an attendance of 182, which was very gratifying to the workers. This church and school is flourishing in all departments. The members show disposition "to make the church a workshop for the Master." Nine delegates are enrolled for Pittsburg. At the close of the service Sunday, October 3, the congregation raised money enough to send their efficient pastor, F. S. Nichols, to the convention. This church led in the union evening services of the three Protestant churches of Table Grove during the summer months.

The last Sunday in September W. A. Fite read his resignation before the church at Fulton, Mo. Mr. Fite has been pastor of this church for three years, and will close his work there the last of December. In these three years the work of the church at Fulton has progressed well, and it was the earnest purpose of the pastor to lead the church into the task of erecting a new building. The church, however, was not disposed to undertake this at once, and their unwillingness to move forward in this respect was one of the things which made it seem best to Mr. Fite to close his work with the church. Mr. Fite leaves the church with perfect good will toward all, and the church for which he has labored so earnestly will always have a large place in his interests.

From the annual report of the First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, where H. H. Harmon is the pastor, we take the following interesting items: Total receipts for current expenses, $4,488.23; disbursements on current and incidental expenses, $4,408.58; to Foreign Missions (Living-link), $600.00; to Nebraska State Missions, $76.00; to the Home Missionary board, $87.09; to church extension, $56.65; to ministerial relief, $17.60; national and local benevolence, $26.11; to education at Cotner University, $54.58; total given to missions (at home), $923.73. The C. W. B. M. auxiliary reported 160 members, 60 of these being gained during the year. The cash receipts for the year were $400.00. The Young People's Missionary Society, with a membership of thirty-three, raised during the year $56.10. The Y. P. S. C. E., with forty members, raised $73.83. The average attendance of the Sunday-school was 349, with an average collection of $11.43. In addition to the above the church raised during the year $21,344.70 on building fund, making a total of $30,264.82 raised.

On Sunday, September 5, at a special meeting of the Church of Christ, Belding, Ohio, called by the official board, the church by a very large majority of votes, decided to ask the present pastor, O. W. Winter, to remain with them. Many hearty words of commendation of the work done by him along different lines were spoken; especial mention being made of his work with the choir, the young men's class in the bible school, the financial work of the church and of the earnest Christian spirit shining forth in his treatment of all, whether rich or poor. After the vote was taken, Mr. Winter was sent for. The enthusiastic reception given him could not be misunderstood, and in a few appropriate words Mr. Winter accepted their hearty call. It was voted to leave all matters of detail as to period of service, salary, etc., with the board, and by a unanimous vote, the church agreed to stand by the board in whatever action they should take. After the meeting was dismissed, the many hearty handshakes and words of approval must have testified to the pastor in no uncertain way, the general satisfaction and approval of his people.

George C. Aydelotte has become pastor of the Soniat Church, New Orleans, and is highly pleased with the prospects for a successful pastorate.

The Kentucky brethren in their Centennial Convention sent greetings to the Northern Methodist Conference in session at Maysville, and to the Southern Conference at Paris.

Of Peter Ainslie's address at the Virginia State convention, on "The Growth of Our Plea in Virginia," it is said, "It was full of beauty, power and inspiration."

During the last two or three months P. A. Cave has been in Virginia holding meetings with the churches there. It is earnestly hoped by the people of the state that he may be induced to accept a Virginia pulpit.

T. A. Minyard, of Jonesboro, Ark., has accepted a call to the Mamplewood Church, St. Louis, Mo. F. A. Mayhall has just closed his work with the Maplewood Church and will give his time to business interests.

The Fourth Church, St. Louis, Mo., has urged E. T. McFarland to reconsider his resignation, but he feels that the work at Rock Island. Ill.. offers a wider field than he could have at the Fourth Church with its present equipment.

W. B. Clemmer is in a good meeting at Franklin, Ill., where L. W. Spayd is the successful pastor. After January 1 Mr. Clemmer would consider a call to a pastorate, but would want to be assured that the field promised a permanent and growing work.

The Sunday-school of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., had an exhibit of manual work at the recent state convention. Mr. MacLachlan, pastor of this church, is doing some very aggressive work with the Sunday-school. He will, we hope, make some contributions to our department, "Religious Education."

Mrs. Ida L. Forster, pastor of the church at Fairmont, Minn., has been granted a four months' vacation during which she will attend the Centennial and visit her parents in England. The church will continue her salary during her absence, and will themselves keep up the regular services of the church, being helped by Dr. Bedwell, one of the elders of the church at Mankato.

Under the auspices of the State and City Sunday-school unions a great Sunday-school rally was held in the Coliseum, St. Louis, Sunday afternoon, October 3. One hundred and eighty of the principal Protestant Sunday-schools of St. Louis were represented. On the platform were ministers and teachers of every denomination. The meeting was addressed by the mayor of the city and Governor Folk.

D. S. Henkel, pastor of the church at Fairmont, Va., recently held a meeting with the church at Corinth, Powhatan Co. The church had been suffering from some internal trouble, but all seemed to have been healed during the meeting. There were ten additions to the church, nine of these by baptism. The pastor, W. Perry, has done faithful work, and the church will increase his salary.

Ellis Purlee, who has been pastor of the church at Coffeyville, Kansas, resigned the last Sunday in September, and asked the church to release him as early as possible, that he might take up the work with the church at Trinidad, Colo., to which he had been called. They refused to accept his resignation and are attempting to get the Trinidad church to release Mr. Burlee, who has accomplished a great work in Coffeyville and is recognized as one of the most valuable citizens of the city.

W. F. Richardson began his sixteenth year with the First Church, Kansas City, Mo., the first Sunday in October. In a message to the members of the church Mr. Richardson urged that they stand by the "mother church," which is now a down-town church, and must face the problem of such a situation. This good pastor is anxious that the church remain where it is and minister successfully to the people in whose midst it stands, rather than retreat to the places where the conditions of living are easier, but where the work of the church is not so much needed.

From the report of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., we take the following announcement, which speaks of the great work that is being accomplished there under the leadership of H. D. MacLachlan: "The property next door to the church has been purchased, at a cost of $27,500. Possession, however, cannot be given until a year from now, on account of a lease that was running when the purchase was made. Our Sunday-school has outgrown its quarters, and this property will furnish space for new classrooms, as well as provide needed rooms for other parts of the church work. We expect to do better work in the year ahead of us, because of the fact that we can look forward to larger opportunites for doing good when we have the added equipment.

The annual convention of the Virginia Christian Missionary Society was held with the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, September 21 to 23. There are now 27,000 Disciples in the state; they have a college property worth $125,000, with 200 students. The churches gave $18,000 to organized missionary work last year. The church property of the state is worth $550,000. The state board has during the last year organized churches at Arritts, Barbour's Creek, Bethel, Honaker, Richlands, Enon, and Perryville. Each of these churches now have regular pastoral care. The secretary reports the need of many more preachers in the state. There are at present fifty vacant pulpits. Effort is being made to group churches and get them to co-operate in the support of a minister. Dr. C. W. Kent, of Charlottesville, was elected president of the convention for the next year. The convention appointed H. D. C. MacLachlan to become one of a corps of union Sunday-school workers, to make a tour of the state in the interests of the Sunday-school work. His expenses will be met by the Sunday-school association.

A BANKER'S NERVE
Broken by Coffee and Restored by Postum.

A banker needs perfect control of the nerves and a clear, quick, accurate brain. A prominent banker of Chattanooga tells how he keeps himself in condition.

"Up to 17 years of age I was not allowed to drink coffee, but as soon as I got out into the world I began to use it and grew very fond of it. For some years I noticed no bad effects from its use, but in time it began to affect me unfavorably. My hands trembled, the muscles of my face twitched, my mental processes seemed slow, and in other ways my system got out of order. These conditions grew so bad at last that I had to give up coffee altogether.

"My attention having been drawn to Postum, I began its use on leaving off coffee, and it gives me pleasure to testify to its value. I find it a delicious beverage; like it just as well as I did coffee, and during the years that I have used Postum I have been free from the distressing symptoms that accompanied the use of coffee. The nervousness has entirely disappeared, and I am as steady of hand as a boy of 25, though I am more than 92 years old. I owe all this to Postum." "There's a Reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. Grocers sell.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

University Enid last week. For the time. Christian University is biggest thing in brotherhood. President Zollars raised same day I was here nearly eleven thousand for endowment fund. Is in easy reach of fifty thousand; an enthusiastic and large body of students and splendid faculty. On to Centennial next, and then with C. M. Chilton at St. Joe then with E. L. Powell, Louisville.—James Small.

At the sound of her voice Jacques' bristles rose, and, with his fangs laid horribly bare, he sprang upon the Italian with a fierce growl of hatred.

"Call the beast off!" shrieked Mr. Bartoletti in terror, nearly dropping the reins in his fright.

"Jacques, dear Jacques, oh! Jacques, don't, don't," screamed little Camilla, in terrified accents.

Too well trained not to obey, the poodle drew back, breathing heavily, his eyes glaring red, and his upper lip drawn back, showing a whole row of fierce teeth.

Never had Camilla seen him look like this, and his attitude frightened her. She sat back again, and with a trembling arm drew him close to her, putting her other hand fondly over his burning eyes, as if to shut out from his view the stranger that so incensed him.

"Ay, blindfold the brute! He ought to be thrashed till he's dead!" exclaimed the Italian viciously, his face still ashy-colored from his terror. "What made him come with us?"

"What made you pass the doctor's hause?" returned Camilla, the presence of the infuriated poodle making her brave.

"Because all that rot about the medicine was a blind, Miss Camilla Falconer, only a blind," returned Mr. Bartoletti, with a cruel maliciousness born of terror and spite. "It was you yourself that I wanted, not the medicine for your doting old grandfather, who must be another fraud, by the way, and not the old creature he makes himself out to be. As much a fraud as this false wig of yours is. See!" and, holding it aloft, Mr. Bartoletti opened his fingers, and the light breeze caught the brown hair, and, wafting it gently upwards, bore it swiftly along, landing it on the bosom of the river.

For a minute Camilla held her breath, and then the remembrance of the Frenchman, and the anxiety he had always displayed towards the keeping of that same wig, made her burst into tears.

"Come, come," said Mr. Bartoletti, laying his hand upon her arm.

But he drew it hastily back the next minute, as Jacques' head was suddenly lowered, and his row of fangs were again shown, while his breathing came hard and fast.

"Curse the brute! I wish he were in the river instead of the wig," muttered the Italian.

For now that he had done the deed, he repented of it. Now, as she was, with the golden curls displayed to view, she might easily be recognized as the child that was being searched for. Fool that he was! He had flung away with his own hand the very disguise that he most needed now for her.

In a morose and gloomy mood he drove sullenly on, resolved to take Camilla, without loss of time, to a house kept by an old Italian of his acquaintance.

"We can reach Hamborough, and Beppo will keep her for me until I can think what to do with her. If only I could ship her off to Italy, I would be satisfied. But the risk—ah! the risk would be too great. And yet I would do much to insure for Anita her inheritance."

He turned a vindictive look at the frightened child by his side. If only she could be as easily disposed of as that wig! But at this notion he turned his head uneasily away, for Jacques seemed to read his very thoughts, and those fierce eyes of Jacques' had never for one moment left the Italian's face.

"I little knew what cargo I was shipping when that cursed brute boarded this gig," he muttered. "I'd dearly love to poison him, only that I believe he'd know it, and grip my throat before I'd brought about his death."

CHAPTER XXVII.

Mr. Densham Returns.

Mrs. Jones was growing impatient. For the twentieth time she had hurried out to the gate, and shading her eyes with her hand, had looked vainly up the road for a sign of the returning gig.

"It's on the stroke of twelve now," she muttered, as she came back to her kitchen. "What can have kept them? Two hours gone! Why, with that fine steppin' horse they'd ought to have done it in ten minutes easy, there and back."

She had gone up and given Pierre his beef tea, making so very light of Camilla's absence in quest of his medicine, that the Frenchman believed the child to have gone with the good-natured lodger from below; and the landlady did not think it worth while to undeceive him, for as yet she felt no particular uneasiness at the child's continued absence.

But when another hour went by and Pierre's questions were growing rather more difficult to evade, she sent her husband straight off to Dr. Morgan's.

"Just you find out when they left his house with the medicine. It's not like that child to be away so long. The store she sets by that fiddler and his dogs beats me."

So Mr. Jones, tired out though he was, and longing for his dinner, set off at a brisk trot.

In half-an-hour he returned, and the consternation on his face was reflected on his wife's as he deposited the right medicine on the table, with the words—

"Doctor's very sorry for the mistake. Can't tell how it happened. But the little gel hasn't been near his place today."

"Not near it!"

"No, nor the gentleman in the gig neither."

"Bless and save us! Then what has become of them?" cried the astonished landlady.

"That's what's been puzzling my head all the way," returned Mr. Jones, scratching his thick mop of hair. "There's somethin' wrong somewheres, and who's to tell the fiddler?"

That was just what Mrs. Jones was thinking. If the little girl set store by the fiddler, the fiddler set greater store by the little girl.

A faint tapping on the floor of the room above told her that Pierre required some one.

"It's not like him to do that," she muttered. "He's growing oneasy about the child."

With a shrinking distast for the task before her, she went upstairs with the bottle of mixture in her hand.

Pierre was lying on the bed, a look of eagerness on his face. It died away as he saw the landlady enter alone.

"Has she not come back yet?" he asked faintly.

"Not yet. But lor! isn't it like the child to want to see a bit of the country when she's got a fine steppin' horse to carry her around to see it?"

"Not like my child," returned the Frenchman.

"She'll be back in less than half-an-hour, you take my word for it. And see here, you must drink the medicine that Jones has been and got for you, tired though he was, too, poor chap."

But for once Pierre forgot his manners, and never even thought to thank for the kindness done. His heart was filled with a sickening sense of foreboding. Camilla to be absent from him all this time, especially after what he had said to her yesterday! His face looked white and drawn as he lay back after taking the mixture.

As for Mrs. Jones, she had no wish to prolong her presence there. The Frenchman's hollow searching eyes filled her with dismay.

"Don't you worry," she said, as she prepared to take her departure. "As sure as half-an-hour's gone your little gel'll be here."

With that, she nodded and went away, and Pierre lay with a troubled sense of danger at his heart that would not be quieted.

Half-an-hour passed, and another after that, and then Pierre was out of bed and on his feet, fumbling with trembling hands for his clothes. At the same instant, there came the roll of wheels at the gate of the inn. Pierre heard it, and rested faintly against the bed, his heart beating rapidly.

The landlady also heard it, and ran breathlessly out, to be met on the threshold by Mr. Densham.

"Here I am, nearly twenty-four hours earlier than I expected to be. I have come in a carriage, Mrs. Jones, and I thought my little friend upstairs would like a drive with me."

"Lor, sir," exclaimed Mrs. Jones, "I'm that scared about the child that I've got the trembles all over me. She's been gone now gettin' on for four hours, and the old man is in a terrible takin' upstairs."

"Gone! Gone where?"

"That's more nor I can tell, sir."

And then she proceeded to relate that morning's doings, ending with—

"And me and Jones is afraid that the gentleman's run away with her."

Mr. Densham's face was a study. "What kind of a gentleman was he?" he asked.

Here Jones appeared from the bar. "An onpleasant-lookin' dark gentleman; more like a foreigner than one of our own country," he struck in.

STRENGTH

Without Overloading the Stomach.

The business man, especially, needs food in the morning that will not overload the stomach, but give mental vigor for the day.

Much depends on the start a man gets each day, as to how he may expect to accomplish the work on hand.

He can't be alert, with a heavy, fried-meat-and-potatoes breakfast, requiring a lot of vital energy in digesting it.

A California business man tried to find some food combination that would not overload the stomach in the morning, but that would produce energy.

He writes:

"For years I was unable to find a breakfast food that had nutrition enough to sustain a business man without overloading his stomach, causing indigestion and kindred ailments.

"Being a very busy and also a very nervous man, I decided to give up breakfast altogether. But luckily I was induced to try Grape-Nuts.

"Since that morning I have been a new man; can work without tiring, my head is clear and my nerves strong and quiet.

"I find four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with one of sugar and a small quantity of cold milk, make a delicious morning meal, which invigorates me for the day's business." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Forecast of Pastoral Work

Every faithful and wise pastor now begins to forecast his year's work and to answer the question, "What is the best thing I can do for my church and my community?"

If you will consider a week with John's great gospel and greater Revelation, let me hear from you. Jasper S. Hughes.

Church Extension Report

GIST OF TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF CHURCH EXTENSION.

National Secretary, G. W. Muckley, of Kansas City, Mo., made the report for the Board of Church Extension. The total receipts from all sources for the year are $197,252.24; this includes the new receipts through the Corresponding Secretary, $71,656.19, and the money received from returned loans and interest, which amounted to $125,596.05. There was a gain in new receipts of $20,162.84, and a gain of 121 contributing churches. 1261 churches have been erected in 43 states.

During the year 65 churches were helped in the erection of their buildings by loans aggregating $125,500.00. 108 churches were promised loans aggregating $187,050.00, and these buildings are now in process of construction.

The Church Extension plan, with the Disciples of Christ, is to loan the money at four per cent, to be returned in five equal annual installments, and in this way we assist churches to erect their buildings that cannot borrow elsewhere. The Department of Returned Loans and Interest shows that the Church Extension plan of having the money returned to go out again works admirably, since, during the last 21 years 708 churches, of the 1,261 assisted, have returned their loans in full and $922,324.19 has been returned on loans. The annuity fund now amounts to $245,424.00, and with this fund alone 144 churches have been built. There have been 249 gifts to the annuity fund. The annuity money is loaned out at six per cent to help build churches.

Twenty-one years ago the Church Extension work was placed in the hands of the present Board by the Church Extension Committee of the American Christian Missionary Society, as directed by the Society at its annual convention at Springfield, Ill. Kansas City was made the headquarters and on November 21, 1888, $10,662.80 was turned over to the Board by the Committee at Cincinnati, in mortgages on twelve church buildings and $2.762.21 in cash. During these twenty-one years of service your Board has paid all expenses connected with the propagation of the Church Extension idea among our churches; has secured a permanent fund of $757.621.39; has aided in the erection of 1,261 church buildings in forty-three states, in Canada and Hawaii by loans aggregating $1,314.361.69, with a cash balance on hand September 30 of $79,842.42. All this with a loss of only $565. Your Board acknowledges the hand of God and the help of our brethren in all these years of growth.

The Foreign Society Grows

1. The gains in receipts in five years have been $129.367, or an annual average increase of $25.800. The gains in ten years have been $197.900, or an annual average increase of $19.700.

2. The churches as churches have increased their gifts $56.500 in the past five years, or an average annual increase of $11,500. The increase in ten years has been $89,300, or an average of $8.900.

3. The Sunday-schools have about doubled their gifts in ten years.

4. Last year the amount raised on the mission fields was $53.360. There has been an increase in the amount on the mission fields of $18,645, in five years.

5. The medical fees last year amounted to $12,175, or an increase in five years of $8,094.

6. The school fees last year amounted to $8,482, an increase in five years of $6,054.

7. The number enrolled in our Sunday-schools on the mission fields is now 9,657, an increase of 3,315 in five years.

8. The church membership is now 11,053, an increase of 4,700 in five years.

9. Last year 131,770 patients were treated, or an increase of 92.900 in five years, or an average annual increase of 18,587.

10. The number of native evangelists and helpers now number 634, which is more than double the number five years ago, and the number has been multiplied by five in ten years. The whole number of workers is now 804, an increase of 366 in five years.

Those who have not had a drouth this year will hardly be able to appreciate the adverse conditions under which we have worked in this section. The weather has been the hottest in the white man's history of the state; for three months we have not had a good rain. The streams are dried up and the earth is literally parched.

In the midst of this dry weather in August I held a meeting of three weeks for one of our country churches; we had twenty-four additions and nearly all confessions. I remember of preaching one evening, and at noon of the same day the mercury rose 110 degrees in the shade. Our pulpit was by the side of the road, in the shade, and the people were so hungry for the message that they came notwithstanding the heat and the dust. Hundreds came on Sunday, brought their dinners and spent the day. Money was raised for the expenses of the meeting and also for seating the house. This church has been organized only a year, and they have eighty-four members and a fine graded Sunday-school with an enrollment of about one hundred. They suffered the loss of their nice new house of worship just last week and that has hurt them some, but they are going on to rebuild in a short time. There has been an old anti-church in that neighborhood for more than twenty years—killing the sects and berating the progressives. A few years more and their fight will be over. This shows what can be done in a short time in this great mission field. The Baxters and Robert Graham did a great work for our cause here long before the war, but since then the anti-preachers have had, only too nearly, the right of way. Now that we have a missionary here under the home and state boards—a live and wide-awake man—we shall be able to reclaim this territory for more aggressive work. The churches in the cities are well up on every line of activity but the country churches need help. We are proud that the Fayetteville Church can come up to the Centennial with three Living Links to its credit. Our missionary under the home board has just begun work in this district. He is now at the historic spot of Prairie Grove—where one of the first battles of the Civil War was fought—in a meeting—four nights and nine additions.

The work at the First Church starts off in nice shape this autumn. The attendance at the state university has been cut short by leaving off a part of the preparatory department, but everything is alive on the university hill.

We have had additions the last three Sundays—two, three, three. We were made happy by a visit from the amiable Macfarlane four weeks ago, and several new members were added to our men's club, and much of enthusiasm administered, by reason of his visit. He doeth all things well. Mrs. Lockhart has about 100 young ladies in her Sunday-school class. They are all hustlers. We are looking forward to a meeting with Dr. Breeden in charge in the spring. Many of our folks are going to Pittsburg. Our Sunday-school is the largest in the history of the church.

Prison Sunday and the Church

By Chaplain A. G. Gates.

"Prison Sunday" occurs this year October 31. It is a day when pastors and churches should especially consider the crime and criminal problems of our land. Some do so every year; why not all? The mute appeal from the 100,000 men behind the bars—still our neighbors and brothers—suggest, at least, some slight missionary claim upon our hearts and thought. And, with many of the great problems concerning crime and criminals still to be solved, is there not a true and a great call to every pastor and to every church in the land to be more than lightly concerned?

For some strange reason, society has been branding men more for paying the penalty for crime—serving a term in prison—than for their guilt in crime. To be stigmatized, "jailbird," or "ex-convict," produces more of a handicap in both the business and the social world, and digs more treacherous pit-falls in their path, than does almost any form of crime which goes unpunished. Punishment, therefore, not crime, leaves the stain of deepest hue. This is wrong, and no voice in the land should be more pronounced in its remedy than should the voice of the church. Again, we are too much inclined to catalogue a "branded" criminal according to his very worst record of life, yet none of us are willing to have the same test applied to himself. And since we ask the world to be charitable, let us be willing to extend charity, for without this, all else "profiteth nothing." When the man comes from prison, therefore, whether as a paroled or discharged prisoner, what better and more consistent treatment could be accorded than to meet him at the "cross roads," and in the spirit of the "Golden Rule," provide him a "job," and what is even more necessary, convince him that he shall again be trusted as a man, so long as he conducts himself in a manner worthy of that trust.

The Central Howard Association has been applying these principles for more than ten years, and the thousands of men who have been redeemed from a life of crime, and assisted to positions of trust and honor, and who have proven faithful as law abiding citizens, cannot fail to indicate the merits of such work. The crying need is for more of the same kind of work. The response to such an appeal will come from men and women more fortunate in life and more highly blest, who have come to know the joy and the good of rendering help to the neighbor who is down. Pastors who desire special literature this year from the Central Howard Association will receive the same by notifying the superintendent, F. Emory Lyon, 415 Rand McNally Building, Chicago.

An Appreciation

ANTICIPATION HAS YIELDED. WE NOW HAVE IN MIND AND HEART THE ACTUAL TREASURES OF OUR GREAT CONVENTION. AND WE ARE THE BETTER AND THE GREATER FOR THEM—THE NEARER GOD!

WHILE CONSCIOUS OF DISADVANTAGES—PARTICULARLY THE PITIFUL INADEQUACY OF HALLS FOR VAST ASSEMBLIES—JOYS HAVE THE RIGHT OF WAY IN MEMORY, AND REGRETS GIVE WAY TO WORDS OF THANKSGIVING.

TO W. R. WARREN, SPECIALLY, WE MUST VOICE OUR GRATITUDE. HIS SERVICE AS CENTENNIAL SECRETARY HAS BEEN A TIRELESS, LIFE-CONSUMING SERVICE. HE WITHHELD NOTHING. THE UNSELFISH SUGGESTION OF BRO. THARP—HIMSELF A MOST EFFICIENT MEMBER OF THE COMMITTEE ON ARRANGEMENTS—THAT BRO. WARREN BE SENT ABROAD ON A TOUR OF REST AND RECUPERATION, SHOULD BE SECONDED, AS IT WILL BE, BY THE GLAD GIFTS OF OUR PEOPLE EVERYWHERE.

BUT NOT TO BRO. WARREN ALONE, DO WE TURN, GRATEFULLY. WE THANK EVERY MEMBER OF OUR COMMITTEE WHOSE THOUGHT WAS OUR COMFORT AND PLEASURE. WE RECOGNIZE THAT MANY BURDENS WERE CHEERFULLY BORNE FOR US, AND THE MAN WE MOST ABUSED YESTERDAY FOR WHAT HE DID NOT DO, NOW STANDS HIGH IN FAVOR IN THE REMEMBRANCE OF WHAT HE DID DO!

THE CONVENTION FELLOWSHIP WAS THE HOLIEST EARTH CAN GIVE. IT SPOKE IN TONGUES OF ALL THE EARTH THE GRACIOUS THINGS OF THE ONE SPIRIT OF OUR LORD. AGE WAS THERE—REVERED, AND YOUTH APPRECIATED. THE RICH WERE THERE IN ALL HUMILITY, AND THE POOR IN THE JOY OF THEIR RICHES IN CHRIST. THE WIDELY KNOWN WERE THERE, SHRINKING FROM THE VERY LOVE THAT THOUSANDS WISHED TO VOICE, AND TRYING TO DIRECT AFFECTION ARIGHT, TO THE UNHERALDED RANK AND FILE OF OUR PEOPLE'S LOYALTY. IT WAS THE SACRED COMRADESHIP OF A GREAT FAMILY OF FAITH IN WHICH ONLY CHRIST WAS COUNTED MASTER AND ALL OTHERS SIMPLY "BRETHREN!"

AND THE CONVENTION'S CRY TO THE WORLD WAS THE CRY OF A LIVING FAITH! THE WORD OF GOD FOUND CONSTANT HONOR—THE CHRIST WAS THE CENTRAL THEME! MEN CALLED FOR THE UNITY OF THE PEOPLE OF GOD THAT THE SAVIOR'S PRAYER MIGHT FIND ANSWER, AND WAGED WORLD EVANGELISM THAT HE MIGHT FIND HONOR EVERYWHERE! THE SENSE OF AMBASSADORSHIP DOMINATED ALL HEARTS! MEN SPOKE AS THOUGH "SENT OF GOD" AND WE WILL RETURN TO OUR HOMES THINKING LESS OF THE MANY THINGS THAT TEND TO DIVISION AND WEAKNESS AND MORE OF THE "THIS ONE THING" OF POSITIVE AND EXALTED EVANGELISM THAT TENDS TO UNITY AND STRENGTH.

SO DO I FEEL WITH THE SPLENDID SPELL OF THE GREAT CONVENTION STILL UPON ME. SUCH IS MY GRATITUDE FOR DAYS AGONE, MY CONFIDENCE AS TO DAYS TO COME.

The G. & C. Merriam Company of Springfield, Mass., have just issued Webster's New International Dictionary, based on the International of 1890 and 1900. The revision has been in active preparation for many years, by a large staff of experts, assisted by eminent specialists, under the general supervision of Dr. W. T. Harris, recent U. S. Commissioner of Education. The number of words and phrases defined has been greatly increased, mainly from the fresh coinage of recent years both in popular speech and in the various arts and sciences. The revival of early English studies is recognized by such an inclusion of obsolete as to give a key to English literature from its earliest period. The title-words in the vocabulary are more than doubled in comparison with the old International, now exceeding 400,000. The number of illustrations is increased to over 6,000. The book contains more than 2,700 pages. But the publishers desire to emphasize the quality rather than the quantity of the work, calling attention especially to the thorough scholarship in all departments and the fullness of information under important titles. By ingenious methods of typography and arrangement, the increased amount of matter is contained within a single volume, not perceptibly larger than its predecessor, and no less convenient for the hand and eye.

The Ideal Convention and the Actual

The Pittsburgh Convention a Fulfillment of Hopes and a Pledge of New Achievements

Some time since the Christian Century outlined two sets of ideals which we cherished for the Centennial celebration at Pittsburgh.

One set we called minor ideals, and we expressed our hopes for three of the outstanding features of the approaching convocation: the music, the communion service and the Sunday preaching.

The other set we called paramount ideals, and we likewise named three: that the convention would give clear evidence that we, the Disciples of Christ, were dead in earnest in all our century of talk about Christian Union; that we were willing to practice union among ourselves upon the basis we propose for the unification of others; and that we as a people, are earnestly seeking, if we do not already possess, a type of spiritual life more nearly Christlike than the conventional piety of modern church life.

The convention has now passed into history. How well has it measured up to our ideals and hopes?

We are not far enough away from it yet to give it final and adequate assessment. The inspirations of personal fellowship with the great souls of the brotherhood are so fresh in our mind that a gracious bias is bound to enter into any description or analysis we may undertake. Nevertheless, having formulated our ideals we cannot repress a statement of our heartiest gratification in the way the convention embodied these ideals in its actual working.

First as to the Minor Ideals.

The Lord's Supper.

Elsewhere an especial mention is made of the great communion service. Its order, its dignity, its exaltation of the church's Lord, its real spirituality—these qualities grow upon our heart as in memory we contemplate the great occasion which many approached with much misgiving and dread.

The Convention Music.

The hymns chosen for the convention and incorporated in the beautiful program book had the effect of pitching the services on a high level from the start. Too often our great representative gatherings are cheapened and weakened by the use of cheap and unspiritual songs which actually misrepresent the good taste and virile emotion of the brotherhood.

At the Centennial we fortunately were saved this humiliation. Note the noble songs our committee adopted: "Sound, Sound the Truth Abroad," "Hail to the Brightness of Zion's Glad Morning," "Cast Thy Burden on the Lord," "Onward Christian Soldiers," "The Son of God Goes Forth to War," "Come Thou Almighty King," "Here, O My Lord, I See Thee Face to Face," "O Golden Day," "Jesus Shall Reign Where e'er the Sun," "Abide With Me," "O, Jesus Thou Art Standing," "The Homeland, O the Homeland," "The Lord is My Shepherd" (Portuguese Hymn), "In Heavenly Love Abiding," "Holy, Holy, Holy" (Heber).

These are but illustrations of the rich treasury of song the committee provided for our use in the worship. Certain concessions were made to the taste developed by popular revivalistic singing in admitting a few such pieces as "The Glory Song", the presence of which in the compilation encouraged an occasional leader to utilize his crude devices for manipulating the congregations. This, however, was rare, and for the most part the people were allowed to sing God's praises with discernment, undistracted by the smart antics of the leader.

The Sunday Preaching.

Over four hundred sermons were preached by Disciple ministers in Pittsburgh and vicinity on the Sunday of the convention. It was a most gracious and Christian hospitality evinced by the ministry of the city. And the preachers to whom this courtesy was extended were no less gracious and Christian in their manner of accepting it.

We have yet to hear of one minister whose message was ill-conceived or unacceptably delivered. And yet almost unanimously our men preached our plea!

There in the very city where Thomas Campbell suffered humiliation in his application for admittance to the regular Presbyterian church after withdrawal from the Seceder branch, his descendants on this Sunday in October, 1909, were given the ear of virtually every congregation in the community! What progress has the century witnessed!

No words spoken during the convention were more potent for good than the words of pleading by our ministers in those Pittsburgh churches that they all might be one, "that there be no divisions among you." Everywhere ministers and congregations were made to think solemnly of the sin of denominationalism and to consider whether Christ's spirit could unite his scattered flock. Only God can measure the effects of those sermons.

And what of our Paramount Ideals for the Centennial?

Our earnestness in talking Union.

Surely no stranger could happen in to this convocation and fail to discern that the hearts of these Disciples were aflame with passionate desire for the union of God's people.

This was the theme of every address. It recurred again and again amid manifold variations like the motif in a symphony.

Again and again the speakers warned us against an easy decline into a denomination and deplored what signs of such relapse already appear.

That the passion which possessed the soul of Thomas Campbell and which was in peril of fading out in a subsequent stage of our history is being revived with increasing ardor in our time was abundantly demonstrated at the Pittsburgh meeting.

The Disciples mean what they say. To them union is not a mere watchword. With their Master they are praying that all his followers may indeed be one. The tendencies of the new age in which they live are reacting into and enriching their original motive for pleading for union. They will not harden into a separate denomination. More freely than ever before they will fellowship all Christ's people.

Our Practice of Christian Union.

The Pittsburgh convention was an interesting disclosure of the fundamental unity that prevails among the Disciples themselves.

The past year has been a period of exceptional stress and strain in our brotherhood. The cleavage that runs through all denominations dividing them into so-called conservative and liberal sections has been especially marked in our own body.

Not a few have wondered whereunto this strife would lead and whether our foundation of unity could stand the strain. Some openly expressed the belief that we could not continue half-conservative and half progressive, and that division was inevitable.

No more serious prediction than this could be entertained. Division is scandalous enough anywhere among Christ's people, but that it should occur among a people pleading for the union of all sects upon its own absolutely catholic platform would be a piece of irony at which demons would laugh.

The best argument for our plea is our own practice of it. If it fails with our own brotherhood we render ourselves ridiculous in offering it to others.

The Christian world is watching to see whether our principle of union is capable of uniting Christian people separated not only by the old-time differences but by the new-time differences. Is our platform simply the common denominator underneath the divisions existing in Alexander Campbell's day or is it also the common denominator underneath the differences emerging in our own day through science and criticism and new social adjustments?

This is the test we Disciples of Christ have to submit to. And the centennial celebration heartened every trembling soul with new confidence that we were big enough and our platform broad enough to meet the new problems without schism.

The Christlike Life.

What shall we say of this ideal? A convention of Disciples always discloses some of the choicest of God's children. No Christian body excels us in the accepted virtues of the Christian life.

But seeking to restore the Christianity of Christ we will surely find in him certain unaccepted virtues which remain for his true people to realize. To carry our restoration principle from doctrines and ordinances into the realm of the inner life is, we may hope, the task that awaits us in our new century.

The Trend of Events

HOW MANY CONGREGATIONALISTS?

The latest statistics report that there are 1,447,193 Congregationalists in the world and that practically all of them are in English speaking lands. About half are in the United States and 156,000 are members of mission churches the main exception to the rule of residence in Anglo-Saxon countries. The Congregationalists are mightily honored by the large percentage in their mission churches. Excepting only the Moravians no church has done more for the missionary cause.

A FITTING CONSUMMATION IN A RICH LIFE

Dr. W. A. P. Martin is spending his last days preaching in the street chapels of Peking. He is now eighty-two. He has written the most learned expositions of Chinese literature and of the Chinese mind and custom extant. He has been the councilor of emperors and one of the makers of the new China. He has presided over the great Peking University. The government would gladly honor him with a pension and some honorable position, but he prefers to keep his commission to preach the Glad Tidings to the common people, feeling that, after all, this work is the greatest that man can do. He wrote his books, taught his pupils, counseled the great, all that the common people might have the blessings of Christianity and a Christian civilization. Like Guido Verbeck, he is honoring himself and crowning his great career most grandly when he returns to that greatest of tasks and in imitation of his Master goes about doing good. Verbeck refused all preferment and emolument in his latter years and became again an evangelist to the masses. Jno. G. Paton preferred to go back to the New Hebrides to preach until the end, and so did, and so all these die gloriously.

THE GENEROSITY OF MISSION CHRISTIANS

The Korean Christians support their own pastors and teachers, aside from the white missionary, and build their own chapels. Their wages are pitifully small and they can ill spare from their pittance—and all the less so after their lives come to demand more comforts with the coming of the new vision of living that Christianity brings. The Ceylonese Christians give an average of $4.44 per member each year. That is a sum equal to the wage for 36 days' work. The Congregationalists are among the most liberal givers at home and they average only $16.47, about one-fourth of which goes to missions and benevolence. This is equal to but nine days' wages here at home. This is the only adequate comparison. The Christians of Ceylon give four times as much as the Christians at home. The Korean Christians give their tenth and then much more voluntarily. They equal the Ceylonese, if, indeed they do not surpass them, and [illegible] for the cause.

SOME MISSIONARY PENTECOSTS

[illegible] the United Presbyterian mission in India received 1,000 converts, two years ago they received 1,655 and last year 2,443. In Hyderabad the Wesleyans baptized 1,500 last year, and the M. E. Conference in Northern India received 4,415, representing twenty-five different castes. The mission to the aboriginal tribes in West China has lost but three of the 1,200 baptized three years ago, and Mr. Adam recntly baptized 738 in one day. In Luzon the Methodists converted 1,000 in one province. Some of these missions have had a long waiting time of toil, but the harvest comes in due time. Like Judson of old, they saw the prospects as bright as the promises of God.

CHINESE STUDENTS FOR CHINESE CHURCH

In the University of Peking, a secular institution, there are 186 students who have volunteered for Christian service. It is significant that so large a number should volunteer for particular Christian service at this time when all that makes for progress is so eminently appealing to high minded young Chinamen as a patriotic service and when the chances for young men of ambition are so great. The Chinese classes of the Second Presbyterian Church in Pittsburg recently gave $1,000 for the building of a chapel in Canton and will support a mission in it. Wu Ting Fang, in a recent address before the Civic Forum of New York city, said that the chief factor in the leavening of the new China had been the missionary schools. These schools are uniting and in every way tending to co-operate for the strengthening of their courses and the extension of their power for the good of the youth of the land. Lord Wm. Cecil, one of the sons of the late Marquis of Salisbury, is establishing a Christian University in Peking for the teaching of the highest branches of science and all western learning. Sir Robt. Hart is heading an appeal by the Chinese Emergency Committee to raise $500,000 for education in the four quarters of the empire. $200,000 will be used to found medical schools, a like sum for the training of native teachers and pastors, and $100,000 for the translation of Christian literature and the dissemination of the same by means of tracts and books. Missionaries will be associated with the committee in dispensing the fund. "I have seen Western civilization," says the Prince Regent. "China cannot go back now." There is now 4,000 miles of railroad in the empire and it will lead the world in railroad building in the next generation. Education is being systematized and in Chili alone 100,000 are pursuing education by western methods.

SOME NOTABLE MISSIONARY HAPPENINGS

The Laymen's Missionary Movement has begun a series of sixty meetings in as many large cities of the middle west. They are carefully planned and executed with all the power that the cumulative interest and activity of the local and national leaders can create. They will culminate about the first of next May with a great convention in Chicago for which arrangements are already being made. This will mean the raising of tens of thousands of dollars for the cause. The Church Missionary Society has been holding a great pageant in London, representing its work in many lands. Boston will give one of these spectacles soon. The scenes of the field, the interesting presentation of the facts of the work, the dramatic enactment of the progress of the cause, all educate and interest wonderfully. The world's Ecumenical Conference on Missions will hold its next sessions in Edinburg, Scotland, next June. The last was held in New York city in 1900, and those privileged to attend testify that it was the mightiest uplift of their lives. The whole missionary cause is gathering great momentum and in another generation marvels will be done such as the most sanguine have never dreamed of.

SWEDES AND FINNS CATCH THE MISSIONARY PASSION

Aside from the work done by the English and American societies, the famous old Rhenish Society of Germany has been the only noteworthy missionary propagandist. The Scandinavians are catching the passion for missionary propaganda and last year the Finns raised $68,000 for the cause. They have 2,000 mission Christians in South-east Africa and Hunan, China. Sweden gave $187,000 last year and has 326 workers in the field. Forty years ago it gave but $18,000, and supported but six missioners. All the Christian world is learning that it cannot hold its faith except it carry its gospel to the ends of the earth.

THE HYPOCRISY OF RUSSIAN REFORM

The last Russian Duma passed a religious toleration bill. It provided that all men might worship according to their good conscience and was bitterly opposed by the ecclesiastics and the Greek Church reactionaries. How far it is operative is instanced by the arrest some time ago of a large audience of Stundist worshipers near Odessa. Another group of 100 were arrested while baptizing some converts. They were thrown into prison for periods of from one week to two months. The plea, of course, is that such gatherings are conspiracies against the peace. The universal law of the empire is nullified by the arbitrary actions of local officers. A land that has been used to rule from above since time began finds it difficult to establish a rule of the people. The people themselves have been accustomed to obeying under compulsion and many of them will not obey otherwise. The law officers are accustomed to acting arbitrarily, and in so vast an empire it is difficult to prevent them from acting arbitrarily in local matters. They will do tyrannical things under some fiction of the existing laws, such as is illustrated in the above case of arresting peaceful worshipers under the plea that their meeting is a menace to the peace. The new Duma meeting will find strong pressure brought to bear upon it to annul or at least modify the religious toleration act, and the church is determined the number of religious holidays shall not be made fewer.

MAKING TWO BLADES OF GRASS GROW WHERE ONE GREW BEFORE

Booker T. Washington said, when speaking of the value of industrial work as an uplifting factor, that if he had to choose between evangelizing the people of Africa and teaching them how to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before, he would, for their sakes, teach them the latter. Few who have closely studied the matter will deny the wisdom of the remark, but we must not forget that no such dilemma ever confronts a man who labors for Africa's good. Tuskegee Institute is sometimes criticised, and with some justice, for not making more of the religious sanctions that fortify the newly educated negro in a moral career without which all his hand training will profit him little. It may be contended that the atmosphere everywhere about the educated negro is so largely religious that he cannot miss its claims or benefits, but the men who are to be the future leaders of the race need what every progressive race needs, viz.: a stalwart life of righteousness, and that can be assured only by religious sanctions.

A group of Tuskegee students are on the West Coast of Africa, and they have taught the pastoral people there how to raise better sheep and live in better houses, but it was their religious love that took them out there to use Tuskegee methods, and they have made the people Christian while making them civilized. Bishop Colsenso went to the Zulus years ago with the theory that they could be taught things religious better after some schooling and industrial training had fitted them for an appreciation of the refined things of religion. He had means for his task, but labored in vain. The people cared little for better houses and tools for work. About the same time a couple of humble Dutch missionaries established a mission a day's ride from Colsenso's industrial center, and with little equipment but with a religious love for all that would help the natives. They inspired them with the story of the Christ and put a new desire in their hearts and cultivated it with lessons in industry and the arts of better physical living. They were enabled to do more for the betterment of living because they went to the heart of the matter and created a desire for better things by planting Christianity in the hearts of the people. One day Colenso rode over to the Dutch mission and, throwing fifty golden sovereigns on the table, said, "You have won." It was a trying out of the two methods, viz.: educating in order to teach religion, and converting by religious evangelism and the accompanying methods of industrial and medical help.

The Canadian government built cedar houses for the Chippewas of the Northwest and found them keeping their dogs in them while they lived in their skin wigwams. The missionary taught these same Indians Christianity and thus put a new desire in their hearts and they not only lived in the cedar houses but gladly built them for themselves. Christianity teaches through a new desire for all things good, the method of self help, and thus makes a new people.

Here is the deep and unanswerable argument against all imperialism. It does some things for a people but does it create a new desire in the hearts of the masses of men and lead them to do things independently and with self reliance for themselves?

RAISING THE STANDARD OF LIVING

An indictment was framed in these columns some time ago against the Diaz government in Mexico. It has been much adulated in the United States, but the query was raised as to whether we were not praising Diaz because of what we had reaped of benefits through the capital we have invested in Mexico under the great Dictator's encouragement and protection. We have looked upon the peon in his multitudinous numbers and his fearful poverty and it has not occurred to us to ask why three decades of powerful rule has not done something more for him. Diaz has developed Mexico capitalistically, but has he done so much humanely? He has put great impulse into capital and property development, but has he put impulse into the peon and created within him a desire for anything better? Sad to say, the answer must be, No. If he is offered twice as much wages he but labors half as long. He desires nothing better, consequently more wages is not the solution. His Standard of Living must be raised. That is the determining factor in a civilizing process. Our consul in Ecuador recently reported that the natives adopted the new only when they found it shortened the hours and gave them more time for idleness. They did not adopt it as a means of living better, but by getting more idleness went backward, rather.

Money makes fabulous profit in Mexico because it reaps all the profit. The peon does the work, but takes none of the profit. His Standard of Living is not raised, so he absorbs none of the increase and capital takes it all. Intelligence puts his labor where it will be most profitable and then the intelligence back of the capital makes no division of the great profits with the labor that it directs in their creation. If the peon had a desire for better living he would demand increasing wages and build better houses, go into small business for himself, wear better clothes, read books and demand more in order that he might live. But he has no impulse to live better and that government is not a success according to the fundamental maxims that government exists for the help of humanity, if it fails to put that impulse for better things into the hearts of the masses as conspicuously as Diaz has failed to do it.

The Chinese coolie comes to America and underbids the American workingman and grows prosperous on his lesser wages, while the American worker but makes a bare living because the Chinaman has a low Standard of Living and the American has a high Standard. In the competition the Chinaman pulls the American Standard of Living down because capital will employ, by natural economic law, the laborer who will do a stated task for the least wage. Again, it is a question of the desire for better things. When the Chinaman is lifted up by larger impulses and desires to live as well as his American brother, he will no longer be a menace to the welfare of the American workingman.

The same is true of the Slavs and their lower European fellows in our great industries like those of the Pittsburg steel and the Chicago packing industries. They have completely driven out all but the skilled labor of native workingmen in both places because their lower Standard of Living enables them to undo the American in the competition for a low wage. They form, in such places, the real problem of immigration. Will we permit a lower Standard of Living to be imported and so used as to pull down the Standard of the American laborer? It will so operate so long as the foreigner lives in masses in our midst and thus gets no contact with our way of life but goes on in his own old country custom and low standards

THE Biblical World, in its October issue, contains an editorial on "The New Ethics and the Historical Interpretation of the Bible." After considering the interest which the study of ethics has awakened in recent years, it reviews briefly the new method in ethics, which is so different from the so-called "moral philosophy" studies of a generation ago. "In the place of the old appeals to the sanctity of the moral law or to the authority of a priori intuitions has come the method of studying human history in order to find out why human behavior is valued as it is." New ideas and obligations develop out of new social conditions. "In the primitive life of the clan, for example, the rights of the individual in the modern sense receive almost no recognition. The sin of Achan involved innocent persons in the punishment of that sin, but our modern social conscience affirms the injustice of that ideal. It is to be expected that the moral perception of mankind will change with the changing circumstances of life." The question then arises, is the Bible a compendium of ethics? The older ethical teachers so regarded it. But such an ideal leads inevitably to difficulties. The ethics of the Old Testament are not those of our generation. The women and children of vanquished foes were exterminated in that older history and this act was justified as a divine injunction. The ethics of the Old Testament did not forbid polygamy nor slavery nor wars which the modern sense of righteousness would totally condemn. Such facts raise problems for the student of ethics who attempts to use the Bible as a single manual of conduct. Relief is found for the Bible student in the historical method of biblical study. It is seen that the Bible is not a level book but a history of religious education among the specially gifted people of ancient times. It was a slow task to develop the ethics of a nation like the Hebrew, but it was a task of which the prophet did not despair and the results of which are among the most notable of the triumphs of religion. Jesus himself taught not by the rules of the authorities of his day but directly from life. He did not quote the Scribes and Pharisees but he applied those principles which issued in the welfare of humanity. "Thus it appears that the historical method of studying the Bible not only brings one into sympathy with modern methods of investigation but also brings one closer to the spirit of Jesus himself than did the older method which was parallel to that of the scribes."

The press of Chicago, in commenting upon the above editorial, was interested, of course, to make of it as sensational a matter as possible. Without regard to the purpose of the journal and with little attention to the actual statements of the editorial, flaming head lines proclaimed that the Biblical World had denied the value of the Bible in ethical instruction and had insisted upon the unreliable character of biblical history and the fictitious nature of the miracle stories. To make as sensational as possible this simple and timely utterance various members of the Biblical World staff were called up over the phone to reaffirm or disclaim the statements of the editorial. These phone statements were then used in the same absolutely unscrupulous manner.

One of the editors, for example, was asked what he thought of the article. He responded that he had not even read it. A paragraph was then read to him over the phone in which the historical method of Bible study was commended as of value in arriving at just conclusions concerning those portions of the Bible which ought to be applied in the modern family and school as ethically valid. He responded that that seemed a very natural and wise statement. The next morning he was quoted as denying the miracles which had not been mentioned either in the editorial or the conversation, as attacking the historical trustworthiness of the Bible and as affirming that the book should not be used in teaching children.

The effect of such licentious and unjustifiable utterances on the part of the public press is disquieting to the public mind. It is very strange that educational institutions and those connected with them retain any of the confidence of which they are worthy when their utterances are so persistently and deliberately perverted. It is a high compliment to the intelligence of the community and to fair-mindedness that such newspaper statements pass with almost no consideration, for most people have learned that when the statements of public men are in question, especially upon matters connected with theology or biblical literature, very little dependence can be placed on newspaper reports. It is not often that men who have been misquoted attempts to follow the misleading reports with a correction. To do so is almost useless. The correction appears days afterward and in some obscure corner of the journal which had blazoned its original report in scare head lines. An example of this may be seen in the treatment accorded to the editor of the Biblical World by the Chicago Record-Herald. Professor Burton responded on the day following the publication of the false account of that editorial and the largely fictitious interviews with a correction as follows:

October 5, 1909.

To the Managing Editor of the Record-Herald.

My Dear Sir: May I be permitted to offer a word of protest against the treatment accorded in this morning's issue of the Record-Herald to the editorial in the current Biblical World on "The New Ethics and the Historical Interpretation of the Bible." The purpose of our editorial was, as the extracts in the body of your article proves, to show that the Bible should be studied historically in order to enable one to use it most effectively in dealing with modern ethical problems. Your headlines would make it appear that we advise against the use of the Scriptures for such a purpose. The fact is we believe that the Bible may and should be used in the teaching of ethics, and that the highest moral ideals in all the world are to be found in it: It is only because we believe this that we are editing and publishing the Biblical World. ,

Yours very truly,

ERNEST D. BURTON.
Editor-in-Chief of the Biblical World.

This episode, one of many in the past two or three years, illustrates the lack of ethical ideals in our modern journalism. In many regards the daily papers are examples of accuracy and careful work. But where sensationalism is achievable through perversion of the words of public men, especially such public men as are not likely to have recourse to the courts for correction and justice, the limits to which the press goes are absolutely unwarranted. Nor is this the fault of obscure reporters on whom it is frequently charged. In many instances their reports are fairly accurate, only to be totally falsified and rendered alarmingly sensational by the head lines which ambitious and unscrupulous official editors and head writers place over them.

Until the public conscience is educated to the point where people will cease to be alarmed by the sensational utterances of the daily papers or to put them aside as manifestly false and ludicrous and shall demand that the ethics of journalism be lifted to a higher level, our press will continue to be actuated by perverted ideals of its duty and will be regarded with that suspicion, not to say contempt, which so freely expresses itself in the criticisms of European travelers who visit our shores. Our friends from across the sea admire our journalism in many regards, but its unscrupulous and unwarranted license they deprecate and condemn.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

Are there any distinct historical proofs, outside of the Bible and later works based on it, in reference to the life of Jesus and his place in history? Reader.

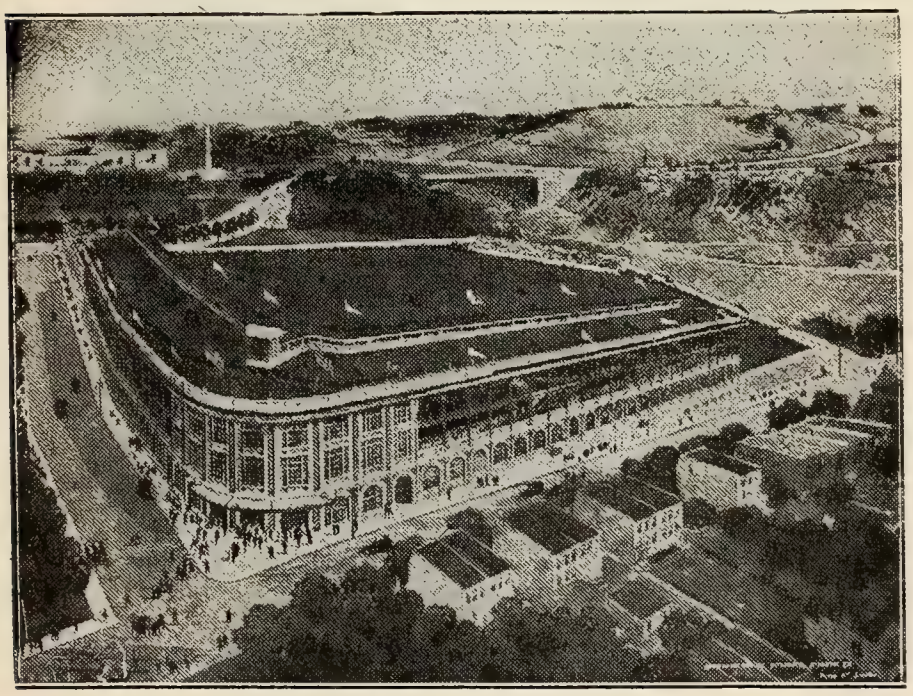
There are no historical works of non-Christian origin that are concerned with the narrative of Jesus' life and the foundings of the Christian Church. These facts, which seem so impressive in the light of their historical influence, must have passed almost without notice in those crowded and stressful days of Roman history. Yet there are certain passing references to these events in historical works of that age. One of these is a reference in the "Annals" of Tacitus, who was born perhaps about 54 A. D. He relates that when Rome was burned, A. D. 64, Nero charged the crime upon the Christians and then says: (XV.44) "The author of that name, Christ, was executed in the reign of Tiberius by the governor, Pontius Pilate, and though checked for the moment, the deadly superstition kept breaking out afresh not only in Judea, the fountain of the evil, but in Rome also, whither everything in the world that is atrocious and shameful streams and becomes popular." Again the proconsul in Bithynia, Pliny the younger, wrote a letter to the emperor Trojan about 104 A. D. regarding the Christians in his province. He found many people in that region who claimed the Christian name and did not sacrifice to the images of the emperor or the gods, nor curse Christ as they were commanded to do. "This was the head of their fault or error that they were wont, on a stated day, to meet before dawn and chant a song responsively to Christ as God." (Epistles X.101.) It is hardly worth while to quote the passage from Josephus, which is almost certainly spurious and was probably introduced by some Christian hand in an early copy of the work. (Antiquities XVIII.15.) We must bear in mind the fact that the early Christians were not writers of history. Jesus himself wrote nothing, and for many years after the close of his ministry no one of his friends friends thought it necessary to set down the events of his life or more fragmentary memoranda of his words. The writing of gospel history began only when the witnesses desired to reach wider regions with their message. But the few references found in heathen writers soon were supplemented by such a host of literary documents gathering themselves about the person of Jesus and the early Church that by the close of the second century, an impressive literature was in the possession of the church.

What are some of the best books on Biblical Introduction? Reader.

The best single volume covering the whole subject from a popular standpoint, but scholarly in character, is the book of Bennett and Adeney, "A Biblical Introduction" (Whittaker, New York. $2.00). For the Old Testament a desirable popular book is J. E. McFedyen's "Introduction to the Old Testament" (Armstrong, New York, $1.50). For the New Testament there are two handbooks by Prof. E. D. Burton, "A Short Introduction to the Gospels," and "A Handbook to the Life of Paul" (University of Chicago Press).

What books would you name as among the best for use in the study of the Psalms? C. W. L.

I think perhaps the most concise and valuable little work on this subject is "The Messages of the Psalmists" by J. E. McFadyen (New York, Charles Scribner's Sons, $1.25). The three volumes by Kirkpatrick in the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges are also good, though a little out of date now. They come at about 80 cents each. There is a volume called "Studies in the Book of Psalms" by Lincoln Hulley (Revell, $1.00) which is very good. Of the older commentaries, that by Perowne (2 vols. $5) is perhaps the best. But the recently published two-volume commentary by Professor C. A. Briggs in the International Critical Series (Scribner's Sons, $2.25 per vol.) is the most exhaustive and competent work now accessible. It is perhaps too exhaustive for ordinary use. Dr. Alexander Maclaren's two volumes in the Expositor's Bible are excellent for homiletic purposes but hardly up to date in their historical introduction.



The Centennial Communion Service

The climax of our Centennial celebration was reached in the communion service in the amphitheatre on Forbes Field. It was held on Sunday afternoon, October 17. The preceding days of the convention had been more or less inclement and cold. But on this day it was as if Providence had interposed. The plans so precisely laid by man needed the coöperation of nature, else unspeakable confusion and discomfiture would have resulted.

The amphitheatre is a great structure of cement and steel built for observing athletic games. It has a roof, but is open in front and on the sides. The program of the afternoon called for a great choir and leader, elders, deacons and eight cornetists to be stationed on the ground of the arena to lead the throng of worshippers in the seats above. Rain would have rendered the carrying out of the program impossible.

But it did not rain. And the chill winds of previous days were held back on the Lord's day as if the Master of the winds himself had checked them. And the sun shone fairly and warmed the ground and the benches so that the people suffered no discomfort. Men betokened their reverence by removing their hats during the prayers and while the emblems were being passed. This was probably the only day of the convention in which this divine politeness could have been manifested without exposure and risk.

The fears of many that the big throng could not be organized into a reverent body of worshippers were dispelled as soon as one entered the amphitheatre. There was no conversation. Against all the secular and trifling suggestions of the building and its outlook upon an athletic field the well-bred instinct of worship asserted itself. The thousands had come to honor Christ, and no one could doubt that they truly discerned the Lord's body and blood.

The occasion was splendidly prepared for. The service was a communion service throughout. There was no address. A ritual consisting of the scripture words of the institution of the supper, the prayers and the vow of consecration, together with the hymn numbers and an announcement of the object of the offering, had been printed in a four-page leaflet and put into the hands of every attendant.

With remarkable evenness of rhythm the multitude, separated from end to end by a distance of nearly two city blocks, kept together in the reading. And no congregation of one hundred in a conventional meeting house could have sung with greater precision than did they. Mr. W. E. M. Hackleman led the host in its praises. It was done with unassuming grace and taste.

Rev. Wallace Tharp, of the North Side Church, Pittsburg, had charge of the preparations and officiated at the service. Five hundred deacons assisted him and nearly one hundred elders. These men were in their places promptly. From the tables placed in the front of the various sections of the amphitheatre and on the arena below the elders united in voicing the prayer of thanksgiving for the loaf. Upon signal from Mr. Tharp the deacons, having received the plates from the elders, dispensed the bread to the people. Afterward in like manner the cup was passed.

No well ordered congregation could have observed the feast more decently. It required only about twenty-five minutes for the dispensation of both emblems. The whole service lacked five minutes of an hour in length.

It was characteristically simple and unaffected. Among Disciples the communion is the Lord's Supper, simply. No touch of the Mass has ever been felt upon it. It has never been used to awe the soul, save as the soul is awed by the great love that burst through the bleeding heart of Christ. Among us its simplicity is its beauty and its primitiveness, too. For was it not instituted as a token of spiritual friendship between the Master and his disciples, lest they forget that he gave his life for them?

Yet the element of simplicity both as an objective ceremony and as a conception of the communicants on this great Lord's day in 1909 marks almost its only point of resemblance to that original feast. In other respects the original and this were in striking contrast.

The first supper was eaten by a few—those eleven faithful, wondering, trembling friends of the Master. This great Centennial communion was partaken of by thirty thousand. The first supper was prepared in a hidden upper room. This latest supper was prepared and celebrated out in the open, facing the blue horizon and a landscape whose picturesque details of valley and bridge and beauteous building both God's hand and man's had coöperated to produce.

The music of the first supper was pitched in a minor key. The cross was in sight. Its full meaning even the Savior did not himself yet discern. The Friends were hesitant and tremulous betwixt faith in their Master and knowledge of the brute fact that he was already being delivered into the hands of his enemies. Night's blackness brooded o'er their souls. But the music of this new Communion was in a major key. The light had broken. These thousands had come to glory in the cross, not to dread it. They gathered in Pittsburg to recount the marvelous victories that had been wrought by the Master's failure. The Miserere had given place to the Jubilate Deo and the Te Deum. Triumphant rang the song from the thirty thousand throats and echoed over the distant hills,

"Bring forth the royal diadem and crown him Lord of all!"

Next to being in it and of it one could wish to have stood on the distant hill and beheld the sight and caught the praises of the thousands of voices melted into one. In the observers who thus placed themselves, distant and above, one easily felt the suggestion of the great company of witnesses which must on that day have filled the invisible hills with their heavenly presence. The "fathers" of the reformation must have been there, and those pioneers who had borne upon their stout hearts the burden of the plea when it was unpopular. And with them must have been all those great souls who have cut new paths for men's feet and suffered for their faith.

Chief among them, our hearts must believe, was he whose face is more marred than any man's, who for us men and our redemption, that he might open a fair pathway to God, shed his blood upon the bitter cross.

Convention Notes

The meetings of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions occupied the whole of the opening day of the Convention. Three auditoriums were required to accommodate the ladies who gathered to consider the missionary work under the auspices of this great organization. The president, Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, was assisted by her executive officers in the conduct of the different sessions, which were inspiring and informing. The reports indicated that 545 new auxiliaries had been organized during the year. The present membership of societies and circles is 73,608 scattered through thirty-five states. Fifty-eight schools of various kinds, including the Bible Chairs, are supported by the Board. 423 orphans were cared for in India and Puerto Rico. 12075 patients were treated in the India hospitals and dispensaries during the year. The total receipts for the year reached the very imposing sum of $381,854.23. The special Centennial receipts for the past four years amounted to $230,640.21. During the four years of Centennial preparation the total receipts for all purposes reached $1,165,655. A large number of the societies have been doubled, thus realizing one of the Centennial aims. During the last month of the Centennial period $119,496.30 was received, $14,614 of which came in by telegraphic messages at the last moment. Much of the credit for the splendid work of the organization during the Centennial period has been due to the efforts of the Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. M. E. Harlan, and the Centennial Secretary, Mrs. Ida W. Harrison.

A large number of the veterans of our brotherhood were present, and the session which was devoted to their "camp fire" was one of especial interest. Among those entitled to a place in this list were C. L. Loos, J. W. McGarvey, E. J. Lampton, W. T. Moore, J. H. McCollough, L. L. Carpenter, J. B. Briney and W. L. Hayden.

An interesting contest developed over the question of the place for the next convention. Topeka, Des Moines and Boston were all applicants for the honor, and the committee reported in favor of Des Moines. But, on the floor of the convention, after spirited discussion, it was voted to accept the invitation of Topeka, which thus becomes our next convention city.

The officers of the National Bible School Association elected for the coming year were president, Dr. J. M. Gill, Wichita, Kans; vice president, J. Walter Carpenter, Des Moines, Iowa; secretary, J. A. Scott, Washington, D. C.; and treasurer, W. H. McClain, St. Louis, Missouri.

One of the spectacular features of the convention was the parade of the Men's Brotherhood, which, to the number of more than one thousand, marched through the streets of the East End headed by the Third Infantry Band of Kansas City, bearing banners and mottoes and singing the hymns of the faith. Had not the weather been unpropitious the number of marchers would have been many times as great.

One of the interesting episodes of the Brotherhood meeting at Luna Park on Tuesday evening was the introduction by Ex-Congressman Pence of Oregon of a resolution requesting the federal government to enact such constitutional amendments as would substitute a tax upon the incomes of individuals and corporations for the revenue now secured from whisky, beer and wine, thus leaving the states free and untrammeled in their control of the liquor traffic. This resolution was passed by an overwhelming vote, and a special committee consisting of United States Senator George T. Oliver of Pennsylvania, Congressman W. H. Graham of Pennsylvania, and Congressman Clark of Missouri was appointed to present the resolution to Congress.

Secretary W. J. Wright, of the American Christian Missionary Society, reported that during the past year 700 missionaries have been employed and are doing successful work. The amount raised for this purpose was $240,868, and the total amount raised in the home field for all purposes was $2,222,057. 205 new churches have been organized.

Since the Church Extension Board was organized 1,261 churches have been aided, and during the year ending Sept. 30, 1909, sixty-five churches received loans from the society. Secretary G. W. Muckley reports that the Board has 107 loans now promised and that seventy-four loans were returned last year. 708 loans have been made since the founding of the fund and there are 553 loans now outstanding. During the past year the Board received $197,252,24 and the total amount in the fund is $757,621.39. A marked feature of the presentation of church extension to the convention was the introduction of T. R. Bryan, who for twenty-one years has been the treasurer of the society and who now presents his resignation, feeling that he should be relieved of the work. Enthusiastic appreciation of Mr. Bryan's labor through this long period was manifested by the convention.

The sessions of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society were presided over by President McLean and Secretaries Rains and Corey. The receipts during the past year have reached the magnificent sum of $350,685.21, an increase over last year of $76,360.82. There are 4,270 people under instruction in the various mission stations. 131,770 patients were treated in the hospitals of the society during the year and 1,697 additions were reported by baptism.

The Memorial Home for Missionary Children has been completed at Hiram, Ohio, with Mrs. F. E. Meigs of China in charge. F. W. Norton has devoted two years to securing the fund for this excellent work.

During the convention the missionary steamer, The Oregon, was launched and will be shipped soon to the Congo where it will serve the purposes of the mission stations along that river. $6,000 was raised at the time of the launching.

$50,000 have been received for two new colleges, one in the Philippines and one in Africa.

A number of foreign delegates were present at the convention. Professor Ishikawa of Tokyo, Japan, the head of the Bible College in that city, several delegates from Australia, Frank Coop and wife of Southport, England, Leslie W. Morgan and John Brearly, of London and many of the missionaries of the Foreign Board and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions were in attendance.

A. L. Orcutt, President of the Board of Ministerial Relief, reported that during the past year forty aged preachers and thirty-three preachers' widows had been cared for. He stated that of this number four preachers and two widows died recently. During 1908 $6,000 was paid out to these persons and $6,221 the past year. Through the kindness of one of the generous givers in the brotherhood, eleven of these beneficiaries of the fund were able to enjoy the Centennial Convention.,

Under the direction of the American Temperance Board of the Church of Christ several inspiring addresses were made, notably one by Oliver W. Stewart who, though called on unexpectedly, aroused the convention to a high pitch of enthusiasm in the presentation of the question of sobriety and good government.

The work of the Benevolent Association was presented by J. H. Mohorter of St. Louis, the secretary . The association was organized in St. Louis in 1886 and incorporated in 1887. The first home was opened in St. Louis the following year in a rented cottage. In 1889 the Mothers' and Babies' Home and Christian Hospital was opened in St. Louis. In June, 1900 a home for the care of the aged brethren was opened in St. Louis and later removed to Jacksonville, Ill. The Haven's Home for the Aged, located at East Aurora, New York, was opened in 1902 and the Cleveland Orphanage in the same year. In 1894 the Colorado Christian Home at Loveland, Colorado, now at Denver, was opened. In the same year the Juliette Fowler Home in Texas was opened. These homes are dedicated to the care of children. In 1905 the Valparaiso Christian Hospital in Indiana and the Southeastern Christian Orphanage at Baldwin, Georgia, were added to the work of the Board. In 1909 a beautiful Home for the Aged at Eugene, Oregon, was completed, and during the past year the Centennial Orphans Home at Walla Walla, Wash., was completed. The Board has now twelve beautiful institutions in ten states, their value aggregating $261,887.32.

Centennial Secretary Warren and his assistants upon the local committee were untiring in their efforts to promote the welfare of the convention and the comfort of its members. They recognize the inadequacy of many of the preparations made for the convention and their disappointment at the failure of several of their plans was manifest. Their work has covered a long period and in the meantime several changes in the personnel of the committee have occurred. Funds were raised to send Secretary Warren to the Holy Land as a mark of appreciation of his services in connection with the Centennial Convention.

Many of the delegates took advantage of opportunities for side trips to Bethany College where the Campbell homestead and cemetery are points of interest to every Disciple.

The singing of the convention was hearty and inspiring. Many of the song leaders were experienced in convention and evangelistic music. Occasionally, however, there were regretable incidents that greatly lowered the tone of the gatherings at which they occurred. It is very questionable whether the introduction of whistling and other sensational performances in connection with religious meetings can ever be condoned. A song leader who resorts to such methods in order to awaken enthusiasm has but an imperfect conception of the dignity of God's house and the spirit of worship. If such incidents occur in connection with evangelistic meetings, they go far to explain the low taste that prevails in some of our churches in the matter of public worship.

The music of the convention was greatly assisted by special vocal numbers by Mrs. Princess Long and the Netz sisters. These are all singers of rare effectiveness who have preached the gospel through their music in many sections of the country. W. E. M. Hackleman led the music at many of the sessions and the other leaders were effective in their work.

The Sunday-school sessions on Monday were enthusiastic and helpful. The addresses came out of experience in the work of teacher training and Sunday-school organization. Marion Stevenson, International Bible School superintendent W. C. Pierce, of Chicago, and Herbert Moninger were leaders in this work. Several demonstrations of class work were given in the different sessions which helped to give point and force to the presentation of Sunday-school themes. It is evident that a great advance may be expected in Sunday-school work through the activities of the leaders in this movement. Scarcely less important is the quiet and effective work that is being rendered by many ministers and superintendents in local schools where the best pedagogical methods are being applied to the teaching of the scriptures.

The sermon in Duquesne Garden Sunday morning by Dr. J. M. Philputt of St. Louis, was listened to by a very large audience. He declared that, "the central Sun of the spiritual universe is Jesus Christ ...if there is no authority in him there is no authority elsewhere ...Alexander Campbell, Barton W. Stone, and Walter Scott anticipated by fifty years the battle cry of modern religious thought, 'Back to Christ ...They anticipated the modern literary and historical method of Bible study ...It never occurred to them that it was wrong to do so or that there was danger of impairment of faith in the Bible by correcting prevalent erroneous interpretations and supersitions ...They reveled in new knowledge, in new points of view, in fresh and reasonable exegesis ...They loved ideas and did not back like a crawfish when one made its appearance. This was 'liberty in the truth'—liberty to think, liberty to err it may be, if only they were striving for the truth." "Holding the truth in love" was the keynote of a large part of his sermon.

The Chicago School of Civics and Philanthropy gives an open lecture course at the different assembly centers in various parts of the city through October and November. Such themes as "The Fight for the Cities," "English Social Movements," "Co-operation of School and Shop in promoting Industrial Efficiency," "Civic of Public Library Service," "Scope and Work of the National Conferences of Charities and Correction," "Nationality, Loyalty, and Self-defense," "Religion and the Welfare of the State," and "International Prison Problems" are to be discussed by such speakers as William Kent, Stanton Coit, Director Carmen, Superintendent Shoop, Librarian Legler, Miss Jane Addams, Dr. Hirsch, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, and Professor Henderson.

The active leadership of the American Society will devolve upon the two new secretaries appointed by the board, I. N. McCash and Grant K. Lewis. To California the board went for both these men. Dr. McCash attained note among the Disciples by his pastorate of nine years in the University Church, Des Moinse, Iowa, during which time he greatly built up the church at that place. Retiring from the pastorate, he spent several years as superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League for the state of Iowa. At present, he is pastor of the church at Berrkley, California. Dr. McCash brings wide experience and great devotion to his new task. Mr. Lewis has been for many years the evtngelist for Southern California and Arizona. He went to Long Beach from Denver, where he was pastor of the North Side Church. Mr. Lewis is greatly beloved on the coast. These western leaders will add fresh zest to the great business of American Missions and it is believed that they will quicken the churches to a worthy suport of this foundation enterprise of all our missionary work.

Notable Centennial Utterances

By Convention Speakers

Disciples and Biblical Research

Walter Scott Priest.

"From the beginning we have been students and critics of the Bible. One name, among others, we delight to wear—"Disciples of Christ"—means that we are learners of Jesus and as such are pledged to follow where the teachings of Jesus lead us. Our knowledge of the Bible, therefore, must be increasing all the time. We need not fear the most searching investigation of the truth; indeed, we should advocate and defend it."

Training Classes

S. E. Fisher.

"The training class presents for us a conserving force in evangelism. They who have so earnestly and efficiently presented the message in personal work, will be the readiest agency in the solving of the assimilation of the throng if new converts."

The Spirit of Union

David H. Shields.

"Dare we suggest that that greatest of all places of power, the pulpit, should be filled by experts in the World of God, skilled workmen in soul culture? Are not all preachers Bible-trained men? The facts are contrary to such a conclusion. A divided church with its confusion and its economic waste and its helplessness in the face of many of the problems of our modern life reveals a structural weakness. Classifying preachers as "progressives" or "conservatives" argues a failure to comprehend the spirit of the Bible, for the spirit of the Bible is a spirit of unity."

Our Day Must Answer

C. M. Chilton.

History will not assign Thomas Campbell his place upon any personal considerations, however favorable they might be to him. It will rather depend upon how the Disciples of Christ succeed in relating themselves to the religious life and progress of the world. If they win a position among the great constructive forces of the kingdom then will their founder take his place among the great reformers.

The Fathers

Hon. Champ Clark.

Our religious movement, the centennial of which we are met to celebrate under the most cheerful environment and under wondrously favorable auspices—sometimes denominated "The Reformation" and sometimes "The Restoration"—was, in all its essential features a revolution. It may be stated without exaggeration or bad taste that as reasoners, Bible expounders and pulpit orators, Alexander Campbell and the men who gathered about him have had no superiors in all the hoary registers of time. Verily, "there were giants of those days."

Memorial of the Missionaries

The missionaries at Pittsburg presented the following memorial at all the meetings of the centennial convention:

"Impelled by our personal knowledge of the needs of Christless lands we, the missionaries of the Disciples of Christ to foreign lands, now gathered at this centennial convention, appeal to everyone who bears the name of Christian to unite in a supreme effort to give Christ to the nations who know Him not. We plead for an offering of lives for this service, and for an adequate equipment worthy of a great brotherhood, whose one aim is to gather the world into a single fold.

A century of labor for the restoration of primitive Christianity has unquestionably demonstrated that God is in the movement for the reuniting of his Church. We urge that all, by word and practice, mark the coming century by taking advantage of the marvelous opportunities, both at home and abroad, to hasten the consummation of the Saviour's prayer, "That They All May Be One."

God calls now, Mexico, Central and South America, the West Indies and the Philippines, suffer for a full knowledge of the Christ. Awakened and awakening forces in China, Japan and India, degenerating influences in Africa, and the rapid spread of Mohammedanism, demand imperatively the immediate and thorough evangelization of those territories. We cannot do it with our present force. Come to our help. Know missions, give for missions, pray for missions, live for missions. We who have pledged our lives to winning these nations for Christ, urge that you unite with a love as deep as the love of our Father, a sympathy as powerful as the spirit of Christ, and a zeal worthy of those who bear His name, in the realization of this our watchword, "Christ preached to every soul in every land."

Men's Broherhood

R. A. Long.

The Brotherhood work is upon us. We believe we are now prepared to direct even a more extended organization. It is our opinion that we should employ at least two Field Secretaries as soon as the prayer men and assurances of the means for their support can be arranged. These additional forces, together with our present force, will probably require a total annual expense of some $17,000. The men, we are sure, can be had. Should we let a cause so important lag for want of money for their support?

Christ the Foundation

I. J. Spencer.

An authorized pleading for Christian union is for union, not on human creeds nor even on the Bible, but, for union upon Christ Himself. He is the only foundation of the Church and of Christ an unity as well. The ground of reconciliation to God is also the ground if reconciliatiin among believers, binding them the one to the other. "He is our peace" who hath broken down the middle wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles, makng of the twain one new man. As he himself, and not the Scriptures, was the basis or bond of union between Jews and Gentiles, so he must be the foundation of union among Christian people forever. As the Christian faith is not doctrinal but personal, so union must be personal and not doctrinal—founded upon the personal Lord and Saviir.

All creeds slogans, mottoes, and opinions, as well as faith, must be put under the authority of the Lord Jesus. Every thought and imagination should be brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. The Scriptures do not teach that if our faith be subject to Christ, our opinions may be free from Christ. The only liberty of opinion or faith is found in Christ. Any plea that contains less than Jesus' plea contains too little, and plea that contains more contains too much. Any plea that contains the same as His plea is His plea, and should be so confessed.

There is danger in human creeds, human names, and likewise in human mottoes, especially if they crystallize into shibboleths and slogans. The motto, "Where the Scriptures speak, we speak: and where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent," was a splendid one for the day in which it was born, when human creeds bound men's consciences more than the word of God did bind them. But it now requires careful and constant explanation to prevent its abuse. It would be better to declare that "all authority in heaven and on earth is given unto Jesus Christ."

The Present Christ

H. O. Breeden.

Who is Jesus Christ? Whose Son is He? We know what He is. He is a force in the world at this hour greater than any other. But where shall we go for information concerning Him? Where shall we ascertain His origin and history and character? We are directed to the New Testament—to four short records called the Gospels. We are asked now to believe nothing concerning the inspiration of these histories or the biographers—only that they were faithful historians writing down what they saw and heard and experienced and what they received from credible first-hand witnesses. They were faithful witnesses, sealing their testimony with their blood. They were honest historians with exceptional opportunities and facilities of knowing the truth of the things whereof they wrote.

Men's Railroads Are the King's Highways

I. J. Cahill.

"The secular also is sacred; it cannot evade or eliminate God. In the fullness of time God's hand is plainly seen in things as they are. The course of events does somehow achieve His will. There is a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we may.

"Secular doings are the rough hewings whereby man presumes to shape his own ends; the evangelization of the world in the unceasing purpose of the ages and to this end the Divine Sculptor of destiny is steadily shaping our rough-hewn achievements. Secular contributions to the evangelization of the world are as inevitable as they are unwitting.

"If his railroads thread the earth they become the King's highways. If his steamships defy the storms of the mighty deep they that go down to the sea in ships bear with every cargo the precious message of God's love. If by his cunning the telegraph has been set clicking around the world, it is the lightning accomplishing its Creator's purpose, tamed docile in his hands. If he dared the marvel of wireless communications it is but the whispering of God, of which the heavens have always been full for receiving hearts attuned to his. If his ambition reaches out and up to dizzy heights of self-aggrandizement it all ends somehow in God's disposing. If he let loose all the diabolism of his perverted nature and stir up the terrible turbulence of war, the shock of battle and the upheaval of revolution with their devastation and death become in the magic of the divine alchemy but the blasting of a channel through the rock of gross materialism through which is to flow unchecked and unpolluted the water of life."

Are We Reaching Christendom?

George H. Combs.

What, then, is our mission? It has been already oft repeated—the unification of the churches of our Lord. Now, if our mission is to unite Christians, our message must be to Christians. If we were sent into the world with a message to Christians in all the communions of earth, we must somehow deliver that message. But are we? Before Almighty God, yes or no? Are we reaching the ear and heart of Christendom? Are we going as flaming messengers to the churches around us, beseeching them in Christ's name to be one? Here in this great Centennial convention is the place for great confessions. We are not accomplishing, as we ought, our sacred mission. And here with these faces of our fathers looking down upon us, let us reconstruct ourselves to our proper work. For these sturdy pioneers delivered their message. They spoke to the churches. From every platform, whether city, church or woodland temple, they preached Christians of all communions, beseeching them to be one. We must follow them. Their mission is our mission. We must address the churches of our day just as Mr. Campbell addressed the churches of his day. Convincing them of our absolute disinterestedness, of our great concern, not for the building up of an other denomination, but for the union of all believers in Christ. We must find our way into their pulpits; into their prayer-meetings, their revivals, their conventions, with the one cry on our lips and in our hearts, "Brethren, we entreat you that there may be no divisions among you." We count "our plea" familiar. Familiar? Yes—to us, but strange as tongue of Araby to the Christian world at large. It is ours to make it known, to see to it that every man who holds in his heart the face of Christ from humblest sexton of dissenting chapel to highest dignitary in historic church, English, Greek and Roman, shall have heard our story.

This is a summons to a warfare and not a battle. Victory will not come on the morrow. The consummation may be yet afar, but this we can do: We can give ourselves in passionate abandon to this notable mission. We can do our very all and if the triumph come not in our day, we can surrender our task in confidence to those who come after, knowing that soon or late, the day will come, and singing even while we die,

> "Ring, bells, in unreared steeples,
> To joy of unborn peoples,
> Your triumphs are your own."

You say it is a stupendous task. Be it so. It is the big, splendid task that makes the sovereign appeal. It is the high mountain and not the hill that challenges the climber. If big things are to be done, let us attempt them in big ways. The day of small things is past. This is a great brotherhiod, and it can do great things if it will.

Let us face the humiliating truth that we are not living up to our opportunity. We are not reaching in any large and commanding way the religious world. We preach sermons, in the main, to "our people"; we publish papers for "our people"; we write books for "our people," but in no worthiness of effort are we making "our plea" known to the world at large. It is safe to say that the fantastic doctrines of Mrs. Baker G. Eddy have come to a greater publicity in two decades than has this noble plea cherished for a hundred years. That just used phrase, "our plea," takes on a tinge of irony. It seems that we want to keep it "ours," and not suffer it to get far from home.

We are lacking in a comprehensive, intelligently directed propaganda. We are not organized for the supreme work we are called to do. Societies we have everywhere, thick set as leaves of Vallom Crosa, but among them all, from the big Brotherhood to the little Busy Bees, there is not a hint of an organization for our real work.

It is well, indeed, that we have gathered here to freshly conceive our work. This is both the place and the hour for the launching of a great union propaganda that shall be worthy of the cause we celebrate.

George H. Combs.
Independence Boulevard, Kansas City.

We talk about the great "questions" of this convention. There is but one question: How to deliver our message; how to make it known in broad, compelling way to the ends of the earth. "Christian Union" to the front! If we have a message to the religious world, let the brain and heart of this great convention bring forward clean-cut, definite program of endeavor, so that it may be done. Let us go forward in that work and let us go in the might of faith. Ah, is it not why some are not going forward, that they no longer believe? Some have lost that faith in our union program. It is a high ideal, they say, but prejudices are strong and walls are high and the world will have none of our message. Disheartened by the long delay, some have almost ceased to believe that Christian union will ever be realized at all. It is a beautiful dream, they say, but only a dream! O, shame!

There has never been a time since worlds began when any people should have greater confidence in their message than we this hour. How much easier should this faith be to us than to the fathers! They spoke in the strength of hope; we in the might of accomplishment. To them Christian union was an untried program, to us it is a tried product; they were prophets of unity, we are its historians; they were dubbed dreamers, we have seen the dream pass into a deed. How dare we doubt our message?

The Church Support of the Colleges

By F. O. Norton.

We hear much now-a-days about the lack of young men for the ministry. Complaint is made that our young men are entering more readily all other fields of activity. The church has herself to blame for this condition of affairs. She has not seized her opportunity to establish powerful and well equipped colleges in the newer states, she has allowed colleges which leave Christ out of consideration to preempt the field. Many of the church colleges have been inadequately equipped, and their professors half starved. I frequently have letters from our colleges asking me to recommend to them a first class man, a specialist in some line at salaries of from $400 to $1,000 a year. Most of our colleges are pitiably weak when compared with the secular schools. It will not do to ask our young men to go to the church college if we cannot say that the instruction and the facilities are equal to any in our state. We often hear the complaint that our young men are going to the large universities. Harvard, Yale, Chicago, Columbia, instead of our own school and there imbibing strange and dangerous doctrines inimical to "the faith once for all delivered to the saints." But what can we expect when there is not an institution of learning among us adequately equipped for research. Some of our men must get intellectual education or we will not be able to compete with other religious bodies and with the secular professions. The absurdity of this complaint is easily seen from one indisputable fact. At the present time scarcely any young man can hope for an appointment to a professorship in our schools who has not taken a course in one of these great universities.

Our strong churches should have living link connection with their colleges by paying the salary of a professor or by sending one of their own godly young men who could not otherwise go. But the crying need now is for large individual gifts. In this respect "the children of this world are wiser than the children of light." You may say that our people have no men who can give millions. True, we have not many men who can give millions but we have tens who can give hundred thousands and that means millions; we have thousands who can give thousands—more millions; we have ten thousands who can give hundreds—more millions; we have hundred thousands who can give tens—more millions. If men who have money see this great need and shut up their bowels of compassion how dwelleth the love of God in them. We must lay this matter of adequate college endowment on the hearts of our people so that they will not rest day or night till our colleges are thoroughly equipped and furnished completely unto every good work.

Our Attitude Toward Union Evangelism

Address at the Centennial Convention

By Evangelist W. J. Lockhart

This convention has seemed to be throughout to be a period of self examination. Some warnings have been heard, some well-deserved rebukes have been given, but to my mind so long as a movement can bare its heart life as has been done here, so long as we can subject ourselves to the rigid self examination we have in this convention undergone, there need be no fear of stagnation or crystalization. If there be such a thing as a convention having a soul, then surely the soul of Thomas Campbell lives again i this great gathering. The lasting influence of this convention will not be the impression our movement makes upon the world, but it will be the subjective influence upon our own lives as we have been asking with real concern. how far have we advanced in the attainment of our original ideals and are we keeping faith with the purpose of the athers?

Reforms and the Reformers.

It is a commonly recognized historical fact that reforms do not keep pace with the reformers; that the followers of the great reformers lose the vision of the leader and crystalize into a party, using the leader's principles as a party cry. On the face of it, our first hundred onetaoinshrdlucmfwyvbgkq our first one hundred years of history might indicate that this movement is going the way of all previous reforms; for did not Thomas Campbell expressly deny his intentions of organizing another order when he so emphatically declares, "Should any affect to say that our coming forward as we have done in advancing and publishing such things has a manifest tendency to distract and divide the churches or to make a new party, we treat it as confident and groundless assertion." He further says, "To advocate the cause of unity while espousing the interests of a party, would appear as absurd as for this country to take part with either of the belligerents in the present awful struggle." The fathers never dreamed of such a gathering as this nor did they expect the defence of their principles would start a movement as distinct and separate in its life and work as any one of th then present denominations. They expected their association to be a movement within the ranks of christendom, calling for a closer union even as the Y. M. C. A. and C. E. are doing now. But a generation does not pass by until the advocates of the new order have been excommunicated and are engaged in deadly debate with the sects. War is declared and the clash of theological batter is heard on all sides. And after a century of strenuous fighting, out into modern life moves a mighty religious body, a million and a quarter strong, fully equipped and organized for any and all kinds of religious work. The fighting has now largely ceased; growth in numbers and prestige has now come. Organized missionary and philanthropic work has won the respect of all religious bodies. Recognition as a world force is freely extended. But who are we, and what are we here for?

The Party Spirit.

From the view point of the denominational world, here comes a great sister church, and to the world at large we are a denomination among denominations. Deny it as we will by mere words, the impression remains. That there has been much of the party spirit that has characterized our movement, even we ourselves cannot deny. But when God has had a great truth for the world and the world was not ready to receive it, has he not always preserved it in like number? That the truths of the Jewish religion might be preserved and the world made ready for the Blessed Savior, did not he cause the Jews to go apart and live unto themselves and allow a party spirit to be fostered? (

Our Divine Task.

Brethren, I believe as certainly as I stand here that our God has called us into the world and given us one hundred years of training for a great and divinely ordained work. The world was not ready to receive the Declaration and Address when it was given. But thank God it is ready now. What a transformation in a hundred years! Then the plea for a closer unity was ignored and its advocates branded as heretics; then the denominational fellowship and coöperation was unknown. Today the same bodies who forced our fathers from their membership are preaching and urging the need of a closer unity. The great visioned men in every one of these orders are leaders in all union and coöperative work. The door of opportunity is open to us. God is calling. The time for which we have been waiting and training is at hand. I hear the voice of our God saying, Move forward." Could Thomas Campbell today stand in one of the great interdenominational conferences with his message and spirit, how quickly would the mantle of leadership fall upon him. But if we let the soul of that wonderful message direct us as a people, our great movement shall become as a mighty tide wooing and winning all the troubled waters of denominationalism into one great stream of salvation, flowing out to the lost world.

Our Position Impels to Union Evangelism.

But what has this to do with union evangelism? It has everything to do with it. As we have seen, this is a day of union and coöperation among religious people. The great federation movement, the student volunteer movement, the Y. M. C. A. and Christian Endeavor are but forerunners of the fast increasing movement of the union of churches in evangelism. The denominations are discovering that alone and by themselves they cannot bring the unsaved to Christ and in every city and town and hamlet there is a growing demand for local union in the evangelism of the lost. Here is the natural place for union. Union will ever come upon the theological battleground but it will come as it is fast coming in a common passion to bring the lost to Christ. I can remember when but few of our churches would even give sympathy, to say nothing of coöperation in a union meeting. "The sects are uniting against us," was the common cry, and how my boyish soul was stirred when I dreamed of the time when we would finally be able to win against all sects and make the Christian church the big church in every community. But our prejudice and opposition to union meetings is likewise changing and now herever there is an open-minded, missionary, aggressive church of Christ, this body is ready and glad to coöperate in union evangelism. But the sad commentary is that seldom is a union meeting fathered by the church that stands preëminently for Christian union, and so seldom that for practical purposes we may say never is such a meeting led by an evangelist of that church whose chief message to Christendom is that of union. Too often in the past have our preachers and our churches gone into union efforts because forsooth they were compelled to go in or lose the respect of the community where their plea for Christian union had been preached.

Disciples Should Be Leaders.

I believe the hour has come when we should take our rightful place as leaders in all union and coöperative work and not merely give a sort of silent approval to such work. I believe in union evangelism because it is in part an answer to our Lord's prayer. I believe in its because it is the logical outcome of all the convictions that have shaped and moulded my ministry as a disciple of Christ. I believe in union evangelism because the composite life of the present day demands a greater leverage brought to bear upon it than can be exercised by any one body of Christian believers. I believe in it because our differences of conviction upon doctrinal points do not debar us from recognizing as Christians those of other religious affiliations. I believe in it because I love those who love Christ and crave their assistance in the salvation of men and the overthrow of sin. Yes, I believe in union evangelism and I believe the people who stand preëminently for Christian union can not be true to the principles they have urged for one hundred years and fail to take their place as leaders in this particular phase of Christian coöperation.

Whenever a true evangelist of our Lord goes into a community he has a right to expect and demand the sympathy and coöperation of all those who are loyal to Christ and stand opposed to sin. But what does the average evangelist of the Disciples of Christ get? He gets the sympathy and support of one church and cold indifference or open opposition of all the rest.

Have We the Men.

"Why," it has been asked, "have not our evangelists been chosen to lead in union evangelistic campaigns?" Has it not been because we have been so slow in asserting our leadership? How many of our churches have promoted a union evangelistic meeting and then insisted upon an evangelists of our own ranks leading in such a meeting? Another answer to our question as to why we are not leaders is revealed in the conversation I had recently with one of our prominent pastors. He said, "Believing in union evangelism, I promoted such a meeting and when all plans were made the other ministers said, 'f you have a man who can lead in the meeting, bring him on'; and now said my brother, 'Where was I to find my man?' I searched diligently for such a man among us but the best could finally do was to call a Baptist."

Our Right to Live

I believe our right of existence depends upon our ability to foster and promote Christian unity. Can this be done by remaining constantly in the field as a competitor for members and social standing with the denominations? Our mission is so far beyond that of a mere denomination that our growth in membership and organic strength must become a secondary consideration. We are a voice crying in the wilderness of denominationalism for a closer unity in Christ. But that voice must find concrete expression. The open door to us at the present time is union evangelism. In no other way can we so conclusively prove that our plea is more than a denominational tenet than by fostering and promoting a union of all Christians in the work of soul saving. There are hundreds of pastors here today whose churches are the dominating religious influence in their community. Who, better than these, could organize a union campaign of soul winning? And who better than an evangelist of the New Testament is fitted to lead in such a union campaign? Our message when devoid of the bitterness of party spirit, is the message of christendom today. Our methods are preëminently fitted for union work and our zeal for evangelism is the one factor needed to be introduced into union evangelism to make it a compelling force. And what an opportunity for preaching Christian union! One of our great visioned men whose faith has become so vital that doctrine has found its rightful place in his preaching, would be in a union meeting, like Paul on Mars Hill. Discovering the altar to the Unknown God, he declared, "Whom you ignorantly worshipped, him declare I unto you." Here is a great union meeting. The evangelist is one of our own great men whose life and thought has been molded by our wondrous plea. Five to ten thousand people are nightly crowding into a great tabernacle or coliseum. One hundred churches of varied belief are throwing their life into the effort. The gospel is being preached with power. Hundreds are forsaking sin and being led to confess the Blessed Christ. An entire city is stirred and every eye is upon the great work being wrought. The meeting is closing, thousands have been converted, denomination differences are forgotten and in the focal centre of this wondrous work of God, stands the evangelist who has cemented the ties of Christian effort and led the host to victory. Before every eye is the concrete evidence of the power of Christian union; every heart bears testimony to the joy of brotherly coöperation in soul winning. But hearken! The evangelist is telling the people that this is God's way, it is Christ's prayer that we may be one,—not for a brief period of a few weeks, but for all time. It is no party doctrine that is now being preached. The great multitude listens to this Christ-filled man as he bears the message of his Master that they all may be one. No need of argument,—the demonstration is complete and back to one hundred churches goes the multitude with but one prayer that God may hasten the day when all his people shall be one.

Such a sermon and such a demonstration as only one of our own great preachers could give, would be worth more to the cause of Christian union than a thousand sermons preached in our own churches to our own people.

Denominational Danger Past

The spirit of this convention has profoundly stirred me. I have never been so proud of being a disciple of Christ. I am glad the blood of the Fathers flows in my veins and that my name has been linked with this movement from the beginning. I was born free, and the thing that inspires me today is that I see the danger of our movement crystalizing into a denomination, has forever passed. The currents of our thinking lead far from this. What a plea we have! What a time for presenting it! What an honor in being its heralder! We need men today with the charity of a Stone and the breath of Thomas Campbell to interpret our plea to divided Christendom, and not men who shall secretly glory in the number of "sectarians he has saved."

Brethren, the battle is on. Fierce charges against the common enemy are being made. Men with as great faith as we, with as completely surrendered lives are dying for our Lord, great Christian bodies are pouring out their life and their treasures to advance the kingdom of our God. And the battle goes hard because of the lack of unity of purpose; and shall we fight alone or train our guns on those who unselfishly, though in some things misguided, are giving their lives for our common Lord; or shall we not with a faith as large and a vision as broad and a heroism as superb as that of our Father's, spring into the midst of the fight with the battle cry of "Christ our all and in all" and take our rightful place as leaders in this world-wide crusade against sin? God wil not hold us guiltless if in this crucial hour we do not prove our plea is something more than a shibboleth or a party cry. During these wonderful centennial days my soul has been quickened, my vision has been cleared and as I have looked toward the future, I have seen the people I love, excelling all others in charity, surpassing all in brotherliness, leading all in fraternity and by conduct so magnanimous as to compel the admiration of all christendom. I have seen them practicing their plea for Christian union and taking their God-ordained place as harmonizers of the divided church, as leaders in the world's conquest.

There are some in this world who are compelled to tarry at home. The great race of life goes on, and they are left behind; they are too weak to run. . . . They have nothing to do with the hand, with the sweat of the brow, with the toil of the brain; their work is all with the heart. But what a work that is! The toils of the hand and brain are nothing to it; these yield a solace by their very energy, but the sad heart has only to bear. It is harder to bear than to do. I may be rudely jostled in the race, but the race itself gives an excitement that makes me forget my pain; I am there, at least, in the company of my fellowmen. But to tarry at home, to wait passive under the shadow of God, to have nothing to do but bear the burden of one great cross—this is the trial of life. Yes, my soul, and this is thy communion with thy Lord.—George Matheson.

Mr. Densham Returns.

"With a peculiarly musical voice?" inquired Roger Densham.

"That's him, sir," exclaimed both husband and wife together, in amazement—that's him!"

"Then the sooner I go after them the better," said Mr. Densham, in a curiously hard tone.

At that moment a halting step was heard coming down the stairs. Slowly and tremblingly it came, and Mr. Jones and his wife looked at each other in growing amazement.

"The fiddler's comin' downstairs!" she murmured.

The last step was reached, and the passage gained. Jules and Bebe were to be seen frisking joyfully ahead, while their master followed painfully behind, with Taras mounted on his shoulder. Mr. Densham, himself in shadow, recognized Pierre at the first glance to be the Frenchman he remembered on board The Fair Nancy, in spite of his present wan appearance. But where, wondered he, was the disguise?

The Frenchman's voice sounded very feeble as he halted at the door of the kitchen—

"Please tell me who drove up to the inn just now."

The landlady hastened forward, moistening her dry lips with her tongue.

"My downstair lodger," she made reply.

"Then has my child come back with him?" inquired Pierre, leaning heavily against the wall.

"N—no. But the gentleman's goin' for her."

"The gentleman! Ah! ciel!" The last exclamation broke from him as Mr. Densham emerged from his shadowy corner. "Roger Densham! C'est vous! C'est l'enemi de Monsieur! Ah! mon Dieu!" His temporary strength failed. Lifting his hands above his head, and uttering a wild cry, he swayed forward and fell into Roger Densham's outstretched arms.

Taras sprang from his shoulder on to the balustrade and jabbered shrilly, while Bebe and Jules sat on their haunches with mute agony in their eyes. In the midst of the turmoil, Mr. Densham found himself wondering where on earth was the faithful Jacques.

"He has only fainted. Help me to carry him into my sitting-room," said Mr. Densham to the landlord. And together they laid Pierre on the sofa, and wet his brow and lips with brandy.

Seeing him returning to consciousness, Roger Densham, without ceremony, bundled both husband and wife out of the room.

"Have a look to my horses. Don't on any account let any one meddle with them," he said to the landlord. "And you, Mrs. Jones, hurry away and write out my bill, and all that this other lodger has cost you. I shall settle both before we go away."

And Mrs. Jones found herself out in the passage with the door between herself and her lodgers; with a strong conviction that the mystery was growing bigger and bigger, since the traveling showman had recognized her downstair lodger, and had called him by his name.

When Pierre opened his eyes, they fell directly on Roger Densham. The latter held up his hand.

"Look here, Monsieur Francais, don't say a word, but listen to me," he said quietly, the memory of Camilla making him speak more gently to this strolling showman than he would otherwise have done. "You and I must have an understanding, on one point at least, before we start in pursuit of this child. And we haven't a minute to spare, if we wish to recover her from the villain into whose hands she has fallen. You called me just now the enemy of her father?"

Pierre nodded. "And one," he said, breathing heavily, "that I have fought hard against."

"Wherefore?" demanded Densham. "There was no need. I am no enemy of the child's. Why should I be? I hated her father for reasons of my own, but that hatred is in no way descended to his child; on the contrary, I wish her well. But we have no time to waste in foolish argument. Listen to me. An enemy does exist for Camilla Falconer, but not in me. She has an enemy, and a very crafty one, who will scruple at very little, if I know him at all."

He paused, and the Frenchman's dark eyes looked up at him. "And that enemy, Monsieur?"

"Is the man in whose hands she now is."

Pierre drew in his breath hard. He looked white and wretched. His sickness had left him weak, and unable to grasp things quickly.

"I cannot understand," he faltered. "I thought she had gone for a drive with the downstair lodger, who I never thought was yourself. Who—who is this man she has gone with?"

"A villain—a black-hearted villain—who calls himself Bartoletti; an Italian, who hungers for her death, so that her fortune may fall to one of his own family. Hear me, man; we have no time to fool away—every minute is of value. Have you the strength to go with me and follow that scoundrelly foreigner? If not, I shall go alone."

"You are not playing with me?" entreated Pierre, his honest eyes gazing wistfully, fearfully into the sombre black ones bent upon him. What was he to believe? He was terrified at the turn events had taken, and his sickness had enfeebled him. "You have not the child in hiding yourself? You are not in league with this Italian? Ah! mon Dieu, tell me true!"

Roger Densham took an impatient turn up the room. Then he stood beside the sofa again.

"Monsieur Francais, I give you my word that I am not lying to you. I tell you that Camilla Falconer has a friend in me. The man that you must dread is not I, but the villain who is bearing her further and further off from us every minute that we fool here. He has reason to hate her. I have none. Great powers! my Frenchman, if I had the time, I'd turn the tables on you, and ask why I found you first masquerading here as an old man and carrying Camilla Falconer about with you, when her lawful guardians are raising the very devil's hue and cry throughout the country for her."

Pierre's jaw dropped; his eyes looked bewilderingly at his questioner. For a minute he felt stung by the implied doubt cast upon his own honest intentions. And then the old fear of the police being put upon his track took possession of him. He gazed earnestly at the man before him—the man who had been the reason for all their wearied wanderings—and his breath came hard and fast. Could he, dare he, confide in him?

He rose trembling to his feet, and put an unsteady hand out.

"I am an honest Frenchman, Monsieur, and my motives are honest also."

The wistfulness in eyes and voice were not without their effect upon Roger Densham.

"And I," he said, "am an honest Englishman, and what I have said to you is truth. There is my hand on it, Monsieur Francais."

Pierre grasped it feverishly. His mind was made up.

"Venez," he said, "let us start in pursuit, and on the way I shall tell you why the child is not already with her grandparents."

"Good! We have fooled away too much precious time already."

He made a dash towards the door, and met his landlady on the threshold with the two bills in her hand.

"See here," he said, turning to the Frenchman, "you have no time to settle your bill. I shall do it for you. You can't take your animals, of course. You must leave them in charge of Mrs. Jones."

"Will you—can you?" stammered Pierre, looking entreatingly at her. "I would ask your kindness for Bebe and Jules, and for Chicot in his stable. All but Taras, whom I must take with me, and Jacques."

"Jacques is not here," interposed Mrs. Jones thrusting in his head. "He went with little missie and showed his teeth at the foreign gentleman when he wanted to put him out."

"Good!" exclaimed Mr. Densham again, flinging a pile of silver and gold on to the table, and refilling his flask from a bottle of brandy.

"C'est bien!" echoed the Frenchman. "Jacques will die before he will see the child injured."

"Bartoletti wouldn't think twice before killing a dog that crossed his path," muttered Roger Densham between his shut teeth. "Mrs. Jones, I will come back this way and settle with you for the care you have taken of the animals. And now, if you have any warm rugs or shawls, I should like them for this invalid. He will need them, for the air will be cold as we go along. Ready, Monsieur Francais?"

Before another five minutes were over, the strangely-assorted pair, with Taras in the Frenchman's coat, were driving along the same road that the Italian had taken.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

In Hot Pursuit.

"My two horses against the Italian's one," said Roger Densham with a grim smile, as they drove swiftly through the quiet country roads. "Which do you thing has the better chance of winning, Monsieur Francais?"

"Le bon Dieu only knows," was the Frenchman's reply.

In a fragmentary fashion, as they went along, he had given Mr. Densham an account of all that had happened, from the stepping out of the lifeboat with Camilla on that chilly March morning to the present moment. Of Rexington Falconer's fear of this man beside him, he, with delicate French politeness, touched but lightly, but Roger Densham understood more than Pierre thought.

"A mare's nest," he made reply. "The sickly fancy of a dying man who knew I had some cause for hatred, and magnified his dread of me. It was the merest chance that found me on the same vessel as himself that day."

But when Pierre spoke of his alarm at losing the packet of papers committed to his care, Mr. Densham gave a short laugh.

"They fell at my feet," he said, "when you unbuttoned your coat to give that lad some brandy from your flask—the lad that carried your dog through the surf. I did not pay much heed to them then, for I was wet to the skin and numbed with cold; but as I was one of the last to leave the boat, my foot stumbled against them. I knew it was the packet entrusted to your care by Rexington Falconer, for I had seen him give it to you. I picked it up, intending to give it to you should I meet you on the beach. You were nowhere to be seen. So the next morning I wrapped them securely up and posted them to the address of his parents."

"Ah! quel bonheur!" cried Pierre, a feeling of intense relief seizing him, for the loss of those papers had added greatly to his difficulties. "Then they have been in the rightful hands all this time?"

Mr. Densham nodded, and at the same moment abruptly stopped the conveyance to inquire of a country lad whether he had seen a gig containing a dark gentleman, a little girl and a poodle dog.

"Ya—as," was the unexpected reply. "The little gel was cryin' out, and the dawg was well nigh throttlin' the gentleman, he were so mad like."

A fierce light burned in the Frenchman's eyes, and the hands that were clutching Taras against his heart trembled.

"What direction did they take? Quick lad!" cried Roger Densham eagerly.

"The 'igh road. You'll see it a mile further on where four cross roads meet. It be called Hamborough Road."

"Good boy! Here! Catch it!" and a five-shilling piece rolled to the astonished lad's feet.

"I would that every creature we met could give us as valuable information as that country lad, and as intelligently," muttered Mr. Densham.

But Pierre said nothing. The boy's words had roused within him a fever of fear and revenge. She had been heard crying out! Had the villain then hurt her? What had he done? Oh! brave Jacques! Oh, faithful friend. Le bon Dieu be praised that he was beside Camilla.

"Cannot we drive faster, Monsieur?" was all he said in a chocked voice.

Mr. Densham gave him a side glance. The pallor of the Frenchman's cheek and tne burning light in his eyes struck him for the first time since they had started.

He drew out his brandy flask, but Pierre motioned it away.

"I feel in a fever, already," he said. "Monsieur, I want nothing, I care for nothing. I can neither eat, nor sleep, until I find the child."

"Nor I," answered Mr. Densham. "But we have covered as much ground as Bartoletti has, for though he had four hours' start of us, we have driven several times as swiftly as his horse has. He can't have got beyond Hamborough, I fancy. At Hamborough we shall change horses, if I find it necessary to do so. But devil an inch will I stir, man, until you take a drop of this. It will put fresh life into you, else I shall be feeling half a murderer for tearing you away from your bed and your doctor in this mad fashion."

He would take no denial, so Pierre obediently gulped down a few drops of the fiery spirit, and handed the flask back with a hand that still trembled from excitement.

On, on they drove, through one turnpike after another, Mr. Densham in each case giving more than half again the amount of toll required of him. No words were now spoken. To the Frenchman it seemed a matter of life and death: the charge reposed in him, the trust accepted, the dying father's face—all stood out vivid and clear. And before Roger Densham's eyes there stood the memory of the well-lighted library at Redhill, and the crafty look on Mr. Bartoletti's face.

"I'll let no foreigner worse me in this affair," he said between clenched teeth. "Madeleine's child shall not remain one instant longer in his hands if I can prevent it."

At length they entered a town of some pretensions. Fine houses and beautiful gardens, met their gaze on every side. The

At length they entered a town of some pretensions. Fine houses and beautiful gardens, met their gaze on every side. The reeking horses with foam-flecked bridles attracted some attention, and passers-by stood to gaze at the travellers.

"We've reached Hamborough, I expect," said Mr. Densham. "But the place is quite unfamiliar to me. Have you passed through it before?"

Pierre shook his head. "We never came this way," he replied dully.

Mr. Densham glanced sharply at him. "Cheer up, man," he said kindly. "Never say die."

He pulled up as he spoke at an inn before which a signpost swung. "If they cannot give us a fresh pair of horses here," he said, "they must bait them, and we will travel on again after we've had a snack ourselves."

As he spoke his eyes lit upon the figure of a lad standing on the pavement a few yards away. There was excitement in the boy's face, and an eager lighting up of his eyes which did not escape Roger Densham's notice. They both looked full into each other's faces, and then the lad made a bound across the road.

"Great heavens!" he cried aloud, laying an impetuous hand on Pierre's arm, "you're the Frenchman I saw on board The Fair Nancy! And you—gracious powers!" looking excitedly at Mr. Densham, "you are the other passenger that was on that same ship.

Pierre stood up, trembling in every limb. "Monsieur," he said agitatedly, "it is le jeune Monsieur who saved Jacques!"

Guy seized his hand. "It is you!" he cried. "Jacques was your dog, and I could almost swear that I have just seen him in company with my little cousin—the child you carried through the water so nobly that awful night——"

He stopped, chocked with excitement, and breathless from the rapidity of his words.

As for Pierre, he could only gaze at him spell-bound, for part of this was unintelligible to him, knowing nothing as he did of Camilla's relationship to this frank-faced English boy.

But Roger Densham looked like a warhorse ready for battle. In a second he had recognized the strong Falconer likeness in this boy.

"What Falconer are you?" he asked abruptly.

"Brian Falconer's son, and Rexington Falconer's nephew." And with the last words a light as to the indentity of this dark man dawned upon Guy. "And you," he said hurriedly, in a helf defiant tone, "can you be Mr. Densham?"

"Right—oh!" was the reply. "Now tell me sharp whom you saw Camilla with just now. Was it with a rascally Italian named Bartoletti?"

For an instant Guy looked straight at him without replying. His brain felt in a whirl. What did it all mean? What was Mr. Densham doing in company with the Frenchman whom everybody was hunting for? Was there something fishy after all about the Frenchman? And had Mr. Bartoletti discovered him, and borne the child away to present himself to her grandparents?

All this revolved rapidly in Guy's mind whilst he stared straight at Roger Densham "Why do you want to know?" he asked warily. And then his eyes suddenly met those of the Frenchman. No treachery rested there. No fishyness lay behind the candor of those eyes. All his former faith and trust in Pierre were revived, whilst the old dislike for Anita's uncle was intensified.

"Pshaw! my boy, don't quibble," returned Roger Densham, in sharp impatient tones. "We are hunting a black fox; one that has stolen a chicken from this man here, and the sooner we recover it the better for your family; for this chicken is no other than your cousin, Camilla Falconer. This man desires to place your cousin in her grandparents' hands. What Mr. Bartoletti wishes to do, I know not."

"Monsieur," cried Pierre, holding out both his hands; and Taras, released from the tight grip in which he had been held, peeped from out of the coat, and peered inquisitively with bright eyes at the lad's flushed face; "Monsieur, if you are a Falconer—of the same family of Falconers that I have these months been seeking—tell me if you know of la petite Mademoiselle's presence. She has been borne away from me by one that I know not; but that he is an enemy, I am fully aware. Monsieur—Monsieur—I have been honest, I have been true, but Fate has worked against me; yet surely it is my own hand—the hand that Monsieur Falconer gave his child into—that should restore her to her grandparents. It is what I have worked for, what I have longed for all these months."

He paused. His dark eyes, hollow from illness, looked pleadingly into Guy's.

"Of course it will be your hand," cried Guy impetuously. "I always swore you were straight, and I believe it still, though I don't know the ins and outs of everything. Yes, Mr. Densham, the child I thought was Camilla was driving in a gig with Mr. Bartoletti. I recognized her golden hair, and I honestly believe the Frenchman'e poodle was with them. He is a rascally Italian, although —although——"

"Although he is your uncle," put in Roger Densham cooly.

"Not my uncle, thank goodness," was Guy's quick retort. "My counsin Anita's uncle, you mean. If you'll give me a lift, I'll show you the very house at which I saw the gig stop five minutes before you came up. I was just wondering what I would do when I saw you pull up at the 'Rose and Crown,' and I recognized the Frenchman seated beside you. They stopped at an eating-house, where the name of Beppo Diviani is written over the door."

"Most fitting," answered Roger Densham, with a slight laugh, as Guy sprang in. "A fellow countryman, of course."

They drove at a decorous pace through the crowded market town of Hamborough, and Roger Densham pulled up at the bottom of a side street, indicated to him before by Guy.

"It is higher up, about the middle of the street," said Guy. "Won't you go right up to the door?"

"No. I think the better plan would be for me not to show up unless I am obliged to; but I don't fancy there will be any need. You," turning to Pierre, "must go with Camilla's cousin. I think the two of you will be sufficient and you will manage it best together. But should he prove unreasonable, which I very much doubt (for a fox always knows when he is run to ground) you can mention that you have a friend," with a dry smile, "in Roger Densham, who is much interested in the case.

Her Birthday Gift

It is my darling's birthday. But between
Her land and mine no carriers come and go;
Across that space all travelers outward fare
And none return to ways they used to know.

And now it is her birthday; and she dwells
In a far land most marvelous and bright;
But if there be some joys she has not known
Father, give her this day one new delight!

Yellow Treasure

BY HILDA RICHMOND.

Everyone on Sycamore street said that John G—— was a very bad boy, and some made it much stronger than that, that is, all but John's mother. His father was away so much that he could hardly be said to live on Sycamore street or anywhere but in a railway coach, and his mother had always had the care of the family. There really was no denying that John needed a firm hand or something to restrain him, but his mother was all unconscious of this important fact. When the neighbors complained about John she thought them "too mean for anything," and when her son was saucy and impertinent to her she fondly excused him on the ground that he was young and would outgrow all these bad habits. Just what would have happened is not known, though many of the neighbors feel sure they could easily predict the future of the fourteen-year-old bad boy, if Grandfather G—— had not made them a visit, and taken in the situation in a very short time. Before he left for home he presented his grandson with a fine Jersey cow to the dismay of Mrs. G—— who foresaw endless trouble as a result of keeping a cow on a town lot.

To tell the truth John wasn't overly pleased with the fine animal, and he only half believed the wonderful stories his grandfather told about her money-making possibilities. But the shrewd old gentleman, who saw there was the making of a good boy in John, proceeded to milk the cow and then engage customers around in the neigborhood. His daughter-in-law followed him up to explain that "Grandpa is childish, and you must not pay any attention to what he says," but the neighbors saw the fine cream on the milk and held their peace. Childish or not childish, they liked good milk, and when it was presented at their doors at a reasonable price they eagerly purchased it. The first money was unhesitatingly handed over to John who proceeded to gorge himself with peanuts and candy and sodas, but a few days of pain in the region of his stomach taught him the folly of that proceeding.

Grandfather G—— stayed only long enough to instruct John in the mysteries of finding pasture for the cow, properly feeding and currying her, caring for the milk vessels and such details, and then he went back to his farm well satisfied. Mrs. G—— immediately broached the subject of selling the animal, but her son said he was willing to take all care of her. He took special delight in currying and feeding the cow, leading her to and from pasture and selling the milk, when once he established a routine of business.

In a few weeks the neighbors began to say that John wasn't such a bad boy after all, and the little acts of rowdyism fell off wonderfully. Grandfather G—— had wisely seen that it was only a case of misdirected energy that made the lad go whooping through the alleys and generally disturbing the peace, and when his hands were full of tasks he became transformed as if by magic. At first the money flowed through his fingers like water as he treated himself and his friends, but he soon found out that the boys who were his special friends when his pockets were full of candy were busy elsewhere when the stable was to be cleaned or feed placed in the little mow. Then he came to himself and decided to start a savings account.

That cow proved just what the lad called her, a "Yellow Treasure," and has been the means of reforming more than one bad boy. Other mothers, seeing the magic of the plan, bought chickens or invested in something that would give the boys plenty of employment, and some money to spend and they bless the day when Grandfather G—— brought the fine young cow to the neighborhood to reform his grandson.

A Seed Story

BY GENEVA M. SEWELL.

"Oh, Auntie, won't you please tell us another story about the flowers? Mamma has gone to the convention and we are awfully lonesome," begged Arthur and Minnie.

"What if I should tell you of a convention which the seeds are holding right now by the side of the big rock at the edge of the path? Would you like to attend?" laughed auntie.

"Oh! Oh! Oh! Let's!" chorused both children.

When they were all comfortably seated on the big rock, near which a thistle grew and around which were floating dandelion and milkweed seed, auntie began: "Mr. Thistle will please state the object of the meeting." Then auntie went right on talking as though she were the thistle. "We are here, said the thistle, that we may tell each other how we take care of our seed babies, and how we send some of them from us so there may be other plants of our kind in other places."

"If you please, cried the little dandelion seed," auntie continued, "I should like to speak first, as I am afraid if I do not I shall have to leave without speaking, for the winds are making me tremble now. Early last May I was a lovely golden flower in the midst of a rosette of dark green leaves. Every day more golden flowers appeared. All these flowers (I was one of them) were very sensitive to the changes of the weather. When it was going to rain we closed our yellow rays and covered them in our green calix or hood. Every night when the sun sank low in the west, we closed our eyes and went to sleep and slept until the sun rose in the east, and called us to awaken.

"Oh! Oh! I've seen 'em. I've seen 'em" cried both children. "I must hurry and tell you about the seeds," went on auntie, "for I fear I must be travelling soon. In the place of my golden flowers soon appeared a fuzzy, globe-shaped ball of seeds. The seeds are on one end of the fuzz. This fuzz acts as our wings, and aids us to fly a long, long way. When our seeds are fully ripened we are blown off by the wind to start another colony of Dandelions. There, I cannot stay a minute longer; see, I am going! Good by, good by!" and auntie blew lightly on the dandelion she had been holding and the seed scattered in every direction.

"Will the milk-weed speak next?

"I have larger wings than the dandelion, but my seed is larger and heavier, and I am not as sensitive to the wind as she is. I will begin at the beginning. We milkweeds have a milky juice, although some other plants do also. We have rather curious shaped flowers, and some of our flowers are very cruel for they catch bees and insects and lovely butterflies, if they happen to stay in our cups when it is time for us to go to sleep. After the flowers our seed forms in a rough looking pod on the outside, but it is very soft on the inside," Auntie showed the children. "There are a lot of us on the inside, too many for comfort, so, bye and bye the pod of the cradle bursts open, and out we fly with only a slight invitation from Mr. Wind. By and by the cradle that held us is empty and we are scattered in all directions and one does not often know where our little brothers and sisters that grew up in the cradle with us have gone, but each has work to do and we do it the best we can. We scatter now and bid you good by." Auntie opened the pod and they were carried off by the wind.

"Mr. Burr has the floor: "Mother nature did not give me wings to fly with, but she gave me little hooks and told me to catch on to anything that might be passing by." Auntie showed the children the little sharp hooks. "I got about discouraged, for all my brothers and sisters were getting a lift out into the world to set about their work and I thought my turn would never come but one day a little dog came trotting past, I hooked onto him and got a free ride to this place. I am what is called a burr from a burdock. We have very insignificant flowers, but we Burrs make people notice us. Little children love to gather us and make baskets and furniture from us."

"Oh, don't you remember how we filled them with choke cherries last year?" queried Arthur eagerly.

"The first rain that comes," went on auntie, "will probably pass me into the ground, and if it does I shall lay there until spring and then I shall begin to grow."

"When Jack Frost came and opened my very prickly burr and cradle," said the chestnut, who now began addressing the convention, "I was the first one to fall out. I thought I would never stop falling, but I did at last, and lay on the ground for a few days, when a little squirrel came running along and picked me up."

"After he had picked up quite a number of us, he started off for his home and I thought it was my work to be eaten instead of being planted, and I'll confess that I shivered some, and when we reached here in some way I fell out of his mouth, and here I have laid ever since. When the warm days of next spring come I shall awaken. The blue bird and the robin will be the first to call me. Then how happy I shall be to begin my new life. I hope to grow into a noble tree."

"I should like to speak a few words," said Mr. Thistle, before we adjourn. I am a winged seed like the Milkweed and the Dandelion. My ancestors have always been great travellers. I am a Scotch Thistle; how my ancestors ever got to America I cannot tell, but we are here to stay. We have relation much smaller than we are—they are called the Canada Thistle—they travelled a long way too." I am here today, but tomorrow I may not be. I am not quite securely weighted down, but it may not be for long, perhaps for all winter, but I am ready for my work when it comes. As it is getting late I move we adjourn."

"Second it," cried the chestnut. The rest of the convention had blown away.

"I know now how seeds travel," said Minnie, "the wind blows them and they catch on to things and are carried in that way, and the squirrels carry them. I wonder if there are any other ways for them to travel."

"Well, the little birds sometimes drop them from their beaks and sometimes the farmer spills them from his wagon when he is going to mill," replied auntie.

"Auntie, I think it is perfectly fine to know about all these flowers and things and I thank you very much for your pretty story," said Arthur.

"So do I—Oh, there comes mamma!" and both children ran to meet their mother, who was home from the convention.

Put Up the Sword

I have sung of the soldier's glory
As I never shall sing again;
I have gazed on the shambles gory,
I have smelled of the slaughter-pen.

There is blood in the ink-well clotted,
There are stains on the laurel leaf,
And the pages of fame are blotted
With the tears of a needless grief.

The bird is slaughtered for fashion.
And the beast is killed for sport;
And never the word compassion
Is whispered at Moloch's court.

For the parent seal in the water
Is slain, and her child must die,
That some sister or wife or daughter
Her beauty may beautify.

And the merciful thought we smother—
For such is the way of man—
As we murder the useless mother
For the "unborn astrakhan."

But a season of rest comes never
For the rarest sport of all;
Will His patience endure forever,
Who noteth the sparrow's fall?

When the volleys of hell are sweeping
The sea and the battle plain,
Do you think that our God is sleeping,
And never to wake again?

When hunger and ravenous fever
Are slaying the wasted frame,
Shall we worship the red deceiver,
The devil that men call Fame?

We may swing the censer to cover
The odor of blood—in vain;
God asks us, over and over,
"Where is thy brother Cain?"

—James Jeffrey Roche, in the Century.

When to Cry

There are millions of little boys and girls in the world who want to do just the right thing and the very best thing. But they do not always know what just the right thing is, and sometimes they cannot tell the very best thing from the very worst thing.

Now I have often thought that there are little boys and girls who cry, now and then, at the wrong time; and I have asked many of the older people, but none of them could tell me the best time to cry.

But the other day I met a man older and wiser than any of the rest. He was very old and very wise and he told me:

"It is bad luck to cry on Monday.

"To cry on Tuesday makes red eyes.

"Crying on Wednesday is bad for children's heads and for the heads of older people.

"It is said that if a child begins to cry on Thursday he will find it hard to stop.

"It is not best for children to cry on Friday. It makes them unhappy.

"Never cry on Saturday. It is too busy a day.

"Tears shed on the Sabbath are salt and bitter.

"Children should on no account cry at night. The nights are for sleep.

"They may cry whenever else they please, but not at any of these times, unless it is for something serious."

I wrote down the rules just as the old man gave them to me. Of course, they will be of no use to boys and girls who are past six, for those children do not cry. The wise man meant them for the little ones—the millions of little boys and girls who want to do the right thing and the very best thing.—St. Nicholas.

Religious Idling

Sir John Lubbock found this epitaph in a country churchyard:

"Here lies a poor woman who always were tired,
For she lived in a world where too much were required.
Weep not for me, friends, she said, for I am going
Where there'll neither be working, nor reading, nor sewing;
I don't weep not for me, friends, if death us do sever,
For I'm going to do nothing forever and ever."

The Freeman (England) says the verse illustrates the notions some people have of the state of the Church notably in heaven but on earth as well. In the latter view it chimes with the story our Methodist friends like to tell to this effect: A man who had been a Methodist offered himself to a Baptist Church. On being asked why he proposed to change his connection, he answered, "In the Methodist Church I am forever being asked to work and give, and give and work; I want to join the Baptists so as to be dipped and done with it." The candidate evidently got his idea of the Baptist way from the old Antinomian offshoot; still it is to be feared that too many in all Christian Churches have set themselves to the tune of "going to do nothing forever and ever."—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"Then here's to our boyhood, its gold and its gray!
The stars of its winter, the dews of its May!
And when we have done with our life-lasting toys,
Dear Father, take care of Thy children, the Boys!"

Her studies of Kentucky life, so imbued with feeling and humor, are remarkably true and faithful. It was written to aid in securing to the married women of Kentucky a right to their earnings and property.

"Friendlier Than the Smiling Days"

As the insect from the rock
Takes the color of its wing;
As the boulder from the shock
Of the ocean's rhythmic swing
Makes itself a perfect form,
Learns a calmer front to raise;
As the shell, enameled warm
With the prism's mystic rays,
Praises wind and wave that make
All its chambers fair and strong;
As the mighty poets take.
Grief and pain to build their song;
Even so for every soul,
Whatsoe'er its lot may be—
Building, as the heavens roll,
Something large and strong and free—
Things that hurt and things that mar
Shape the man for perfect praise;
Shock and strain and ruin are
Friendlier than the smiling days.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The End of the Way*

During all the later years of Paul's active ministry he had been looking forward to the time when he should see the imperial city of Rome, the capital of the world and the place from which most hopefully the influences of the gospel might go forth. To have evangelized all other regions and missed Rome was to have failed in his life work. To plant the gospel in that great center was to insure its diffusion soon or late throughout the empire. It was in this tone that he had written to the church in Rome some two or three years before, while he was in Corinth (Romans I: 13-15). Since the regular program of his missionary ourneys had not brought him to this goal of his hopes, he was the more willing to take advantage of his rights as a Roman citizen and appeal his case to the emperor in person. This, he knew, would insure his arrival in the Eternal City.

Departure From Malta.

After the dangers of the long voyage were passed and some three months had been spent quietly on the island of Malta where the storm had driven them, sailings were secured by the centurion Julius for his company of prisoners in a cornship of Alenandria which had stopped in the island for the winter .This ship had as its name or as a symbol on its prow, "The Twin Brothers," the reference being to Caster and Pollux, the divinities if sailors. Only one who was himself present as a passenger on this voyage would have noted this detail. Luke and Aristarchus seen both to have journeyed with the apostle to Rome.

The first portion of the voyage was from Malta to Syracuse on the island of Sicily, a distance of about ninety miles in a northeasterly direction. Here they stayed three days, probably for such traffic as the ship carried on, but no reference is made to any disciples in Syracuse. The next stop was Rhegium, which the narrative says was reached by a "circuit." This town, the modern Reggio, and the scene of some of the severest earthquake shocks in the recent devastation of Lower Italy and Sicily, was about sixty miles in a straight line from Syracuse and directly opposite the Sicilian seaport, Messina. The circuit described by Luke probably refers to the longer course necessitated by unfavorable winds. The Straits of Messina through which the apostle was now passing, northward from one of the most interesting waterways in the Mediterranean. Along this narrow channel the commerce of the centuries has passed. At the entrance, near the ports of Messina and Reggio on opposite sides of the channel, are the two danger spots of ancient navigation, the Rock of Scilla on the Italian side and the whirlpool Charibdis near the Sicilian port. These were reputed by antiquity to be monsters of whose wrath mariners stood in deadly fear. The recent terrible catastrophe that befell this whole region is fresh in the minds of all. No Christian tranverses this narrow waterway without deep emotions as he recalls this same journey of the apostle through this channel on his way to Rome.

Landing in Italy.

After a day spent at Rhegium the ship took advantage of a favorable wind from the south and went on northward to the Italian coast. The landing was made at Puteoli, the modern Pozzuoli, a place due north from Malta and about 212 miles distant from Rhegium. This was the landing port of southern Italy, the place at which voyagers traveling from the south to Rome generally landed. It is now often visited by Bible students who wish to stand upon he spot where the apostle first touched Italian soil.

Here Paul and his company found disciples from Rome, the first they had seen since they had left Sidon. In spite of what must have been the desire of Julius to get his prisoners safely to Rome, they remained for a week in that place. Perhaps this was a mark of respect for Paul on the part of the centurion. It would at least give them opportunity to rest after the inconvenience and peril of the long sea voyage. After this they went forward toward Rome and were met by at least two companies of Christians who came to meet them at the Market of Appius, forty miles from Rome, and the Three Taverns, thirty miles from Rome, respectively. The coming of these disciples was a joy to the apostle who considered it a good augury for his future work.

Arrival in Rome.

Upon his arrival at the imperial city he was quartered in a house by himself with a soldier who guarded him and who was relieved every few hours by a new member of the Guard. This gave Paul an admirable opportunity to meet many of that influential body of soldiers, the Pretorian Guard, which largely controlled matters in the capital; and through this very means, as we know from references in the epistles to the Philippians and the Colossians, the gospel was spread through the official circles of the capital. (Phil. 1:13-14; Colossians, 4:18; Philemon 10, 13.) This prisonerhood of Paul's was therefore relieved in its confinement and weariness by many privileges of intercourse with his friends and brethren. During all the time of his imprisonment, which lasted at least two years and how much more we do not know, he was busily engaged preaching and writing ithin the limits of his privileged confinement.

The closing section of the lesson deals with Paul's early concern to introduce himself to the leaders of the Jewish community in Rome in as favorable a way as possible. The decree of Claudius which forced Jews to depart from Rome (Acts 18:2) did not long remain in force. There was a considerable colony of them in the city. As soon as he was able to arrange for an interview, he requested the leaders of the Jews to meet him at his lodging. Here he explained to them that there had really been no reason why he should not have been released in Judea except the opposition of the Jews in that region. Perhaps these Jews had written to their brethren in Rome accounts hostile to Paul. They responded that they had had no such communications, although it was evident they had heard many things about the remarkable man in whose presence they now stood, and they asked of him a full report of his work and his opinion concerning the Christians.

Paul and the Jews.

On a day chosen for that purpose by mutual consent, Paul was again met by large numbers of his Jewish countrymen, to whom he spoke all day long in vindication of the Messianic claims of Jesus, reviewing the Old Testament scriptures in their utterances regarding the Messiah. The results were various; some were persuaded, but others refused to accept the claims of the gospel. Paul closed his interview with them by referring to Isaiah's characterization of Israel in his day as blind, hard of heart and unwilling to accept the truth which the prophets presented

Close of Acts.

At this point the Book of Acts abruptly closes, with the bare statement that Paul continued in his own hired house to receive all who came and to preach to them the gospel with boldness and without hindrance for the space of two years. What then happened we do not know. Was Paul released from his imprisonment after presenting his case to the emperor? So many have thought. On the other hand, he may have been condemned by the will of Nero, who sent so many other worthy men to their death in his brief and bloody reign. A silence falls over the New Testament records at this point. Did Luke intend to write another narrative giving the story of Paul's later ministry, if such there was? Was Luke himself unable to furnish his contemplated narrative, or did the apostle's early death leave the promise of a later ministry unfulfilled? There are no hints offered by the New Testament regarding the years that followed, and the biblical student will always be haunted by a sense of mystery which closes in upon the narrative of the great apostle to the Gentiles.

The Purpose Accomplished.

But he had at last accomplished the one great purpose of his life, the arrival in Rome; and he had been able without hindrance and with effectiveness to proclaim that message which was the passion of his life to all classes in the capital, even though he was still a prisoner. The epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon took form during these years and went out upon their inspiring mission. Paul was visited by his friends from near and far, and when the end came we may trust that he was not without the comfort of those who loved him as the defender of the faith, the great apostle to the Gentiles, the noblest of the early champions of Christianity.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

THE WITNESS OF CHURCH ATTENDANCE.

Topic Nov. 3. Acts 2:1-16; 3:1-10; Heb. 10:19-25.

Is church attendance a duty? Is it a privilege? It is both. It is a duty, for the message of the church is made effective by those who openly give their support to the church. It is a privilege, for one who enters into the worship of a congregation of believers receives more than he gives of spiritual renewal. The duty and the privilege should both be kept in mind. Downright honesty would compel many a man to acknowledge that laziness keeps him away from the Sunday worship more often than anything else. He usually has some other reason to offer to satisfy his self-respect. If he were concerned for duty rather than for comfort he would always be found in his place in the church on Sunday. If he also watched over his own soul and observed the gradual displacement of human feeling by desire for money, power, and success, he would use the means of grace provided by the church for the deliverance of men from sordid selfishness.

The Witness of the Learner.

It is the business of the church to create dissatisfaction with spiritual conditions. Wherever there is a real church of Christ people are trying to find what they ought to do in order to be more useful members of society. The easy, comfortable feeling which is sometimes supposed to be the one great gift of the church to its members is anti-Christian and a disgrace to the church that allows it to exist. The disciple has the feeling that, whatever may be his attainments, he is just beginning to live. His peace comes from the confidence that there is something better to be attained by him and by others. It is impossible for a community to stagnate morally while it has within its borders a company of people who possess this spirit of progress and who meet weekly to stimulate one another to worthy living. The most indifferent man cannot wholly escape the influence of such a company. If nothing can be done for him, others will take him for what he is and be in no danger of accepting his cheap wisdom as genuine.

The Witness of Like-Mindedness.

The Christian religion was spoken of in its early days as a "Way." The disciples were those who walked in the way of God or who followed Jesus as the way to God. They had a mind to be at one with God. Their strength of purpose was such that they forced the enemies of Jesus to take notice of them. They could not be ignored. Now that Christianity has become so powerful and has so many adherents, church attendance bears witness to the universal need of religion. There is no law to compel anybody to attend church. Free to stay at home, people in large numbers go to the house of worship on the Lord's day. Perhaps a majority of those who do not go would be sorry to see the worship of God neglected. In spite of ignorance and wilfulness the world desires to know God and to walk in his ways. These who worship in spirit and in truth can have the assurance that their worship has significance beyond the circle of church membership. Many seemingly care-drawnless and indifferent men and women are being drawn to God through the public worship.

The Witness Against Special Wrongs.

The church has to declare itself against every sort of wickedness and crime. It frequently happens that the public conscience is aroused against certain organizations because of their insolent defiance of right and decency. Then attendance upon the worship of every church that is doing its full duty is a declaration that justice must prevail. A well known politician left off attending Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst's church when the preaching was directed against crookedness in politics. The preaching of Dr. Parkhurst make it necessary for this politician to reform or listen to the preaching of some other man. Unfortunately, it is possible for politicians to attend some churches regularly and never observe the slightest inconsistency between crooked policies and the testimony of the churches. The preachers may be conscientious men who are fighting sin in the abstract but are not aware of their duty to attack the particular sins in their neighborhood. If they learn from Jesus they will give attention to particular sins and particular sinners.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

TOPIC FOR NOVEMBER 7.

Life Lessons for Me from the Book of Hebrews. Heb. 12:1-7.

The element of struggle bulks large in the accomplishment of every life which is worth while. We often think, and sometimes say that those whom we call successful do not really know what it is to strive against difficulties. For physical existence probably not, but if they are engaged in making a life, no matter how favorable their environment they have difficulties and must struggle. The very poor will have to battle for physical existence while the very rich will find it necessary to ever guard themselves against the world, the flesh and the devil. The student in high school or college may constantly have to battle against temptations to cheat in the class room and on examination days, while a clerk may constantly be struggling against the temptation to take money from the cash drawer. The big assumption with which we must all start, in the making of a life is, that there is a long patient struggle before us.

Life a Race.

Because of the fact stated above the author likens the making of a life to a race and urges that every weight or hindrance be laid aside by all who enter. The athlete knows how important this is in any contest. So must it be with him who seeks to make a life. After we have taken every possible precaution and made all the preparation, we know there still remain so many things over which we have no control, which will oppose us that we will still need fiber of steel. This preparation all must make. One will find it necessary to fortify himself in one respect and another in another. Look to the sin which is most common to you and which is hardest to resist; that is the one you are called upon especially to lay aside. It may be one of the dark secret sins of which no one knows but you—and God. Again it may be, and most likely is, a lack of self-control, lack of ambition, a sort of undefined ideal—a purposeless life other than to have a good time, in a word, to follow the line of least resistance throughout life. Such a life cannot avoid failure. Defeat is certain here because nearly always such an one insists that since he is doing nothing aggressively wrong that his life is good. He fails to see that real goodness means aggression for a righteous ideal.

Need of Patience.

Moreover, no one will succeed in such a struggle who lacks the quality of patience. Oftentimes one's most strenuous efforts seem to bring failure. Even when he has been true to his ideal, there are so many who are oblivious to the things he is trying to do that his efforts seem wasted. Who has not felt this way at some time? Then the success of a righteous life is not easily defined nor is it easy to value in world standards. The dollar sign is meaningless here. It must be estimated in terms of character and this, time alone reveals. Only the patient man will persist under such conditions. That it pays to continue, however, the experience of the race abundantly testifies.

Need Ideal.

To live such a life one must have an ideal. Naturally enough, then, are we admonished to look upon Jesus, the author of our faith. This ideal is interesting. He never wavered from his ideal. His enemies might despise and shame him. They might carry their contempt for him to the point of persecution, yea, even unto death, the ignominious death of the cross, but he endured all for the sake of a true life purpose, viz.: fidelity to righteousness. What a lofty ideal for us who are constantly tempted to yield what our own judgment tells us is right.

Of us, as of the Hebrews to whom the letter is addressed, it may be said we have never "resisted unto blood." For the most part we have lived in an environment where it is easy, even popular, to be a Christian. We ought to remember that when God calls us into his kingdom he does not call us into a realm of idle pleasure, but he calls us to be servants in a world of need. This service means aggression, heart ache, toil, disappointment, hardship, self-sacrifice. It may mean reverses and losses, but such a discipline is so much the better for us. Such things teach us our helplessness, our need and dependence, in a word, humility and sympathy. They make us rich companions. "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."

When Even' Cometh On

The mother-heart doth yearn at eventide,
And, wheresoe'er the straying ones may roam,
When even cometh on they all fare home.
'Neath feather sheltering the brood doth hide;
In eager flights the birds wing to their nest,
While happy lambs and children miss the sun,
And to the folds do hustle one by one,
As night doth gather slowly in the west.
All ye who hurry through life's busy day,
Hark to the greeting that the Ages tell,
"The sun doth rise and set, hail and farewell."
But comfort ye your heart where'er ye stray,
For those who through this little day do roam,
When even cometh on shall all fare home.

Because my fleshy ills increase?
No; for there still remains one chance
That I am not his Masterpiece.

Church Life

$80,000 was the gain of the Foreign Society last year.

What of the next one hundred years? Will the work we are now doing as pastors, teachers, evangelists, and editors stand the test of time?

The Christian Century extends a hearty welcome to the large number of friends who joined its circle during the convention. We shall do our best to make the paper serve your interests and those of the Brotherhood.

The daily routine work at home will seem a trifle commonplace after the great crowds and addresses of the Centennial convention; but it is, on that account, none the less important.

The editors of the Christian Century are gratified to notice how many churches paid the expenses of their pastors and wives to the Centennial. This is right. It should become more and more an established custom with the churches.

Our readers should not miss the articles concerning political, social and religious conditions in Palestine now appearing in the Christian Century, and written by Edward A. Henry, who spent most of last year studying in Jerusalem.

The delegation of the University Place Church, Des Moines, en route to Pittsburg, spent Sunday in Chicago. They attended the service at the Englewood Church.

The delegates to the National Convention from Texas were in Chicago over Sunday, and availed themselves of the opportunity to hear E. S. Ames and Herbert L. Willett.

Herbert Yeuell and his evangelistic party will begin a meeting witn the First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, about the first of November.

A new $5,000 pipe organ is being installed at Marysville, Mo., where the church is making fine progress under the leadership of L. O. Bricker.

The church at Milton, Oregon, gave $600 to the building of the Steamship Oregon. C. H. Hilton is the minister of this great church.

E. W. Darst, of California, we are sorry to note, is reported to be seriously ill at the home of his sister in Ohio, where he has been visiting for a few weeks.

Miss Muriel Holland has been sent by the Foreign Society as a missionary to China. Miss Holland is a graduate of William Woods College.

At Greensburg, Kansas, a $7,000 brick veneer church is being erected. The pastor, Bishop M. Hopkins, will close his work with the church November 1.

The chair of Sunday-school Pedagogy in Eugene Bible University, Eugene, Ore., is to be occupied by Frank Billington, formerly pastor of the church at Silverton, Ore.

"Ideals for Minerva" is the general head under which J. A. Wharton, pastor of the church at Minerva, Ohio, has been preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons.

W. L. Mellinger, of the Woodlawn Church, Portland, Oregon, is to become the director of the school of the C. W. B. M. at Monterey, Mexico.

C. C. Morrison, H. L. Willett, E. S. Ames, O. F. Jordan, Austin Hunter, W. F. Shaw, C. G. Kindred, W. D. Endres and E. J. Arnot were all away from their Chicago pulpits Sunday, October 17.

W. C. Cole, pastor of the church at Goldfield, Iowa, has just returned to his work from a visit to his old home at Malta Bend, Mo., where he held a two weeks' meeting, in which a large number were added to the church.

Seven hundred in the Bible School by January 1, is the aim of the church at Columbia, Mo. All who know Madison A. Hart and the temper of this church believe that they will reach the goal.

The church at Cornwallis, Ore., where H. H. Hubbell is the minister, will have their new building ready for dedication very soon. Dr. Errett, of Salem, will preach the sermon. This church is doing well in its work.

Dr. Edward Scribner Ames of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, usually has a large number of preachers in his audience, but Sunday, October 10, there was an unusually large number present. Dr. Ames' sermon subject was, "Religious Conventions."

Mr. and Mrs. Z. E. Bates were presented with beautiful gifts by the members of their congregation at Atchison, Kansas, at a recent prayer-meeting service which marked the close of the second year of Mr. Bates' labor with the church.

R. W. Clymer has resigned at Noblesville, Ind., and will close his work with the year 1909. He has been with this church for four years, and has made a fine record. The church has taken no action toward securing his successor.

A new church has been erected at New Bloomfield, Mo., at a cost of $3,500. The dedicatory service was held October 3, and was directed by T. A. Abbott, Kansas City. Paul E. Wright is the present pastor of the church.

T. F. Weaver, who has been serving as state evangelist for Texas, has resigned that work and entered the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. Mr. Weaver is available for preaching with our churches within reach of Chicago.

J. E. Lynn, pastor of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, is preaching a series of sermons on "Life's Dangers." They are: "Dangers to Youth," "Dangers to Young Manhood and Womanhood," "Dangers of Middle Life," and "Dangers of Old Age."

J. K. Ballou, pastor of the church at Calousa, Cal., has been loaned by his church for a meeting at Princeton. The purpose of the preacher and church is to organize a new church at Princeton. This is a good missionary work, provided a church is really needed in the community.

The church at Davenport, Iowa, will begin a series of "gospel meetings" October 24. The pastor, I. M. Perkins, will do the preaching. Professor F. F. Dawdy of Topeka, Kans., will have charge of the music, assisted by a male quartet from the church. Careful advertising of the meeting has been made.

Toward the building of the steamship Oregon, the church at Eugene, Ore., has given more than $1,000. J. S. McCallum is the pastor of this church. One of the most delightful aspects of the work of our churches during the Centennial year has been the raising of money for this steamship by our churches in the western states.

Wilmer Monroe and wife, missionaries at Jhansi, India, are compelled to return to the homeland on account of the ill health of Mrs. Monroe. They will reach New York about the first of November, and will soon make their way to their old home in Ontario. Mrs. Monroe will have to spend some time in a sanitarium. We hope that she may speedily be restored to health.

The following are the topics upon which A. W. Conner is speaking evenings in the First Church, Warren, Ohio: "The Boy Problem—A Statement," "The Boy Problem: Solution Suggested"; "The Big Boy: His Nature and Powers"; "Character Castle: Its Turrets and Foundation"; "Church and School: Friends or Foes?" "Every Boy is a Prince" and "Rex Van Wonce: The Worst Boy in Town."

The Central Church, Kankakee, Ill., is suffering from the loss of some of its best members. About two years ago many of the mills of this little city were closed down for several months. Many people were out of work. From this the church suffered a loss which it has not yet regained. O. O. Motsinger, who has been with them as pastor for about one year, has just resigned. We are not informed as to the plans of the church for the future.

Claude E. Hill, formerly of Missouri, but for the last six years pastor at Mobile, Ala., has accepted a call to the First Church, Valparaiso, Indiana, where he succeeds Bruce Brown. Mr. Hill has a fine record for effectiveness, and we are glad to welcome him to the tasks of the northern states. At Valparaiso there is an opportunity for service which will appeal to his strength. Valparaiso is not far from Chicago, and we hope Mr. Hill may frequently be seen at the Chicago ministers' meetings.

R. W. Clymer who has been pastor of the church at Noblesville, Ind., for four years, presented his resignation to the church October 17. He will close his work in sixty days. Mr. Clymer has done a good in these four years and "The Times," in reporting the resignation, says: "The Times deeply regrets that Mr. Clymer is going away. He is an agreeable gentleman, a finished orator and a thorough consecrated Christian gentleman. He has a number of places in view for the future and it is not likely that men such as Rev. Clymer will have to look before finding something acceptable.

It is a fine record that Peter Ainslie has made in the eighteen years he has been pastor of the Temple in Baltimore. During this time he has seen four other churches spring from the mother church of which he is pastor, and a mission established and maintained by his church in Wuhu, China. The church has also established a home for young ladies which has behind it a record of ten years' efficient service, with more than 300 names enrolled in that time. For six years the Temple Seminary has been open for Bible Study. The value of the property now owned by the Christian Temple is estimated at $115.00. Mr. Ainslie has asked the church for a year's leave of absence, when he will answer many of the calls that have been made upon him by many interests in various parts of the United States.

The Centennial a Revelation

The Centennial gathering in Pittsburg was a revelation to many. The people of Pittsburg did not expect anything extraordinary in the way of attendance. They opened their eyes in amazement as they saw special train after special train unloading passengers in their city. The street-car men were not prepared to handle the multitudes. The gathering was a revelation to the police. Special men were added to the force to preserve order. The police had nothing to do. They said they did not see one person that even looked bad. The hotels were surprised at the number and quality of their guests. The proprietor of one hotel said that in thirty-two years he had entertained all sorts of conventions and gatherings, but this one excelled them all. Those who thought that the Disciples of Christ know nothing about heart religion were surprised to discover that the spiritual note was the sponse from the audience. The large number of cultured and consecrated young men ber of cultiured and consecrated young men who are ready to take the places of those whose work is almost done was an inspiring revelation to all. The addresses were a revelation to those who heard them. The delegates from other communions spoke admirably, but no better than our own men. The Brotherhood meeting was one of the astonishing features of the week. Few of the most sanguine among us would have predicted that so many men would have put in an appearance. The Centennial was a revelation of our own people to themselves. While in Pittsburg they became conscious of their own power. There is nothing too great for such a host of redeemed souls following the Lamb, whithersoever he goes.

and who intends to remain in Hamborough until the child is committed to your care. This, remember, will only be necessary should he deny having the child with him."

Guy gave a laugh of elation. "Agreed, Frenchy?"

"Mais, oui, Monsieur."

So together they proceeded up the street.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Mr. Bartoletti is Worsted.

"You start the talk, Frenchy," whispered Guy, as the eating-house was reached.

"Mais, oui, Monsieur," returned Pierre with dignity. "It is but my duty. I am answerable for the child until she is with her grandparents."

A fussy little Italian bowed smilingly to them over the counter, but his face slightly fell when Pierre asked politely to be allowed a little conversation with Mr. Bartoletti, who had been seen to enter a short while before.

Begging them to be seated, the man left the shop; then returned and asked them to follow him into an inner room.

There, seated at a table with writing materials before him, was the dark-faced man whom Pierre well remembered to have been Mr. Sinclair's companion that morning on the village green.

At sight of Guy, Mr. Bartoletti's hardly-formed plans suddenly vanished. There and then he made up his mind that any treachery he may have planned against Camilla must be abandoned. Perhaps, in his heart of hearts, he felt relieved that such was the case; that nothing weightier than an evil thought had on this occasion found lodgment in his breast.

"Monsieur, I have come for my child—the child that was committed to my care by her father, Monsieur Rexington Falconer, and whom you, by some accident, drove away with this morning."

"My good sir," said the musical voice (and Guy in after times remembered the half relieved, half-sickly smile which spread that moment over Mr. Bartoletti's face), "I must beg your pardon a thousand times for having caused you any trouble. But your little friend and I were so deeply interested in our drive that we went further than I had at first intended, until I feared it would be too late to return the same day. I was, as you see"—pointing to his paper-strewn table—"preparing a message which would have reached you tomorrow at 'The Robin's Nest,' and thus have relieved you of any anxiety on the child's behalf."

"I can scarcely believe that Camilla is found, eh, Mr. Bartoletti?" broke in Guy, unable to restrain himself longer.

"Nor I," returned Anita's uncle with a forced smile. "She told me her name only just as we were entering Hamborough, and you can imagine my surprise when I heard it. It would have given me much pleasure to have restored her myself, but seeing that this—gentleman's intentions have at last become honest, I must relinquish to him the joy of witnessing your grandparents' delight at her recovery."

"Monsieur, if I could but see her now——" began Pierre, his heart so thumping with relief that no obstacle had been raised to his receiving back the child, that he could well afford to ignore the Italian's slur upon himself.

"Certainly. She is in the next room, resting herself. And her little dog is with her—a most devoted animal. Will wou follow me?"

He opened a door on the opposite side. Camilla was sitting on the floor, facing the door, with her arms round Jacques' neck, and tears were flowing freely. As Pierre's head looked in, she sprang to her feet with a joyous cry.

"Pierre! Pierre! Oh! Pierre! Pierre!"

Of Guy she took no notice whatever. He was nothing to her—a perfect stranger. But to Pierre she clung with wild sobs of delight, and the Frenchman's great heart throbbed with joy.

"Ma cherie, ma cherie, ma petite ange!" was all he could say, as the child clung to him, sobbing out that her heart would have broken if he had not followed her.

And all the while Jacques' wolly paws were clasped round his master's leg, and he was uttering short cries of delight.

"Jacques took care of me. Jacques protected me," she sobbed. "Oh! Pierre, I would have been so frightened but for Jasques."

"But no, cherie, there was nothing to fear," Pierre added soothingly, half fearful of what the effect of such words might be on the Italian.

Mr. Bartoletti, however, had withdrawn, and he did not appear again. But Beppo Diviani's ears were keen, and he heard him mutter as he closed the door on the quartette—

"So that old rascal was acting a part after all on the village green! I would give something now to have unmasked him then!"

They had got out of the resaurant, and had proceeded some little way down the street, when Pierre said suddenly—

"Thy wig, cherie? Hast thou left it behind?"

"It's in the river, Pierre. That bad man pulled it off when we were driving, and threw it away."

Then Pierre laughed—one of his old hearty laughs, such as Camilla had not heard for a long time. "'Tis well, cherie. We need no disguise now, neither thou, nor I, nor Jacques. Thy family is found, mon enfant. And see, le beau Monsieur la," pointing to Guy, "he is thy cousin, mon ange—thy own true cousin."

But Camilla looked shyly at Guy, and had no words to say. She could only grip Pierre's hand very hard. To her, at present, the Frenchman was all that she required.

"It is true, Camilla," said Guy quietly. "We are cousins. Your father was my uncle."

"And thou wilt soon see thy grandparents, cherie. N'est-ce pas, Monsieur?"

Guy nodded. "The sooner the better," he said.

And then Pierre suddenly realized that he was very tired, and was feeling weak, and that a lump had gathered in his throat at Guy's words; and he sighed to think what a blank Camilla's absence would make in his life.

Mr. Densham was lounging at the corner where they had left him, having driven his tired horses back to the "Rose and Crown" to be baited.

"No need to ask questions," he said with a laugh. "The presence of our little maid is enough. Well, Camilla, you have given us a fine chase after you. I never expected to find my little friend vanished when I came back to the 'The Robin's Nest.' However, all's well that ends well. We'll stop the night at Hamborough. Then, tomorrow, we'll hie us back to the inn and collect Monsieur's animals, and Camilla can then tell me if she likes driving behind a pair of horses better than in a gig. A few days' rest will set Monsieur up, and you'll all be then speeding on your way to Devonshire. What say you to that?" and he looked at Guy and Pierre.

"Capital, sir. It will give me time, too, to send a letter to my people to prepare them for Camilla's recovery. She must not take them by surprise;" and Guy breathed a deep sigh of excited satisfaction.

"Monsieur's plans are well," said the Frenchman, but the drop in his voice did not escape Mr. Densham, and he realized a little of what Pierre was feeling.

"Come," he said, "we must not forget that you are still on the sick list, although I believe that our rapid drive has done you no harm. A good sleep and rest, man, and the best doctor in Hamborough, and you will be ready to get back to the animals and 'The Robin's Nest.'"

CHAPTER XXX.

Camilla is Found.

It was a gorgeous morning. Rosslyn Towers was bathed in summer glory.

On the half-finished breakfast-table lay a letter, and every now and again old Mrs. Falconer's fingers strayed towards it.

"I cannot believe it," she was saying in tremulous tones.

"It truly seems impossible to believe," replied the Squire. "If it were not Guy that had written it I would not believe it." And he held out his hand for the letter again, and read it aloud for the twentieth time:—

"Dearest Grans.,—My search has ended sooner than I expected. Camilla is found. She has been in good hands all this time, for she has been with the Frenchman, who is a downright, jolly, good chap, as you will all say when you see him.

"We hope to be with you at three o'clock on the afternoon of Tuesday, for as the Frenchman has been ill we must return home by easy stages. I want you all to be present when we arrive, and to meet us on the upper portion of the plantation.

"Your loving grandson,

"Guy."

The Squire laid down the letter, and coming round to his wife's side took her hand in his.

"If the time has seemed long to us, wife, it has come at last," he said in a husky voice.

"Shall I really and truly clasp Rexington's child in my arms?" returned Mrs. Falconer, with the tears rolling down her cheeks.

A DOCTOR'S SLEEP
Found He Had to Leave Off Coffee.

Many persons do not realize that a bad stomach will cause insomnia.

Coffee drinking, being such an ancient and respectable form of dissipation, few realize that the drug—caffeine—contained in the coffee and tea, is one of the principal causes of dyspepsia and nervous troubles.

Without their usual portion of coffee or tea, the coffee topers are nervous, irritable and fretful. That's the way with a whisky drinker. He has got to have his dram "to settle his nerves"—habit.

To leave off coffee is an easy matter if you want to try it, because Postum—well boiled according to directions—gives a gentle but natural support to the nerves and does not contain any drug—nothing but food.

Physicians know this to be true, as one from Georgia writes:

"I have cured myself of a long-standing case of Nervous Dyspepsia by leaving off coffee and using Postum," says the doctor.

"I also enjoy refreshing sleep, to which I had been an utter stranger for 20 years.

"In treating Dyspepsia in its various types, I find little trouble when I can induce patients to quit coffee and adopt Postum." The Dr. is right, and "there's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Our Readers' Opinions

WHO IS AN ORATOR AND WHAT IS ORATORY?

I enjoy Charles Clayton Morrison's writings. They have a quality of analysis that is keen and at times scintillating. And there is a distinct literary flavor about them. I do not always agree with Mr. Morrison, which is a small matter, but I seldom fail to enjoy him, which is more important. For one thing, he makes me think and I need to do that sometimes even if it hurts. Mr. Morrison's "write up" of pastor Charles S. Medbury is exceeding well done. One, as he reads, can almost see the man and feel the power of his beautiful life. However, I take issue with the writer at one place in that fascinating article and that is where he writes, "Nobody says he is an orator. . . . You never in the world would call him clever in public address,—that is to say, you never would think of him as clever." Aye, but he is an orator! He is not a rhetorician or a word juggler, nor does he do any jiu jitsu performance with his sentences, but an orator he surely is. One may just speak right on and tell ever so simply the heart of God and man to a sin-weary people and still be an orator. If oratory is the power of personality finding expression through human voice (and it is) if oratory is the power to move mightily and uplift vast audiences(and it is) then Charles S. Medbury is one of the greatest of our brotherhood. And he is "clever" in public address and I did think him so the few times it has been my privilege to hear him.

No man, however saintly his life, can speak week after week to great audiences who listen with delight and come back again as Mr. Medbury does again and again, except he be an orator. No man can thrill convention after convention as this man does unless he possesses in large measure the oratorical temperament. Mind you, I do not mean "rhetorician" when I use the word "orator," nor do I think that the former term necessarily means a speaker of either artifice or artificiality, but there is to my way of thinking a vast difference of meaning in the two words. A rhetorician is a public speaker who has a gift for striking off or shaping beautiful and striking sentences, or of turning figures of speech into very wonderful agents for the pressing home of truth. He may or may not be an orator. An orator is a public speaker who is aglow with a great message, which is part of him, who is never dull, sometimes thrilling and always instructive. He is seldom a rhetorician.

I should place Charles S. Medbury in that circle of preachers among us who grace every platform they occupy, and who never fail to move an audience upward and betterward, that is to say, I would place him along with E. L. Powell, George H. Combs, H. L. Willett, Hugh McLellan, F. M. Dowling, and John E. Pounds. These men vary considerably in style and thought, some of them are gifted rhetorically, one of them, the last named, is an epigramist, but all are orators.

And definition of oratory that is confined solely to polished, scholarly, graceful and musical voiced speakers is too small and inadequate. Why, such a definition would exempt Edmund Burke and Patrick Henry.

But after all, I do not think Mr. Morrison and the rest of us are far apart on this interesting subject. He would have us know that there is something grander about Charles S. Medbury than anything he says, and that is the highest compliment any public speaker can ever hope to receive.

Edgar DeWitt Jones.

First Church, Bloomington, Ill.

[Certainly there is no divergence of opinion between myself and Mr. Jones, either in our conception of oratory or in our estimate of Mr. Medbury as an orator. It had not occurred to me that my statements regarding Mr. Medbury's oratory could be construed as an expression of my own estimate of him. But the fact that I have received a number of letters raising the question, and among them this from so discerning a reader as Mr. Jones, indicates that there must have been an ellipsis or indirection in my statement. I was telling what people said of him when I engaged them in conversation. The fact that nobody said he was an "orator" or "clever" or "a manipulator of men" did not indicate that he was not any of these, but that he was more—that he was, as I pointed out, a big man, a true priest of God. My own judgment is that I could not have accorded Mr. Medbury higher honor nor one which his own heart would appraise more highly. Yet if my form of statement was unclear, it is more than compensated for in having drawn out from my critic the discriminating observations he has set forth in the above letter.—C. C. M.]

The Standing of Scholarship in America

Hugo Munsterberg, in the October Atlantic.

If we are sincere, we ought not to overlook the fact that the scholar, as such, has no position in public opinion which corresponds to the value of his achievement, and to the mental energy which he needed for it. The foreigner feels at once this difference between the Americans and the Europeans. The other day we mourned the death of Simon Newcomb. There seems to be a general agreement that astronomy is the one science in which America has been in the first rank of the world, and that Newcomb was the greatest American astronomer. Yet his death did not bring the slightest ripple of excitement. The death of the manager of the professional baseball games interested the country by far more. Public opinion did not show the slightest consciousness of an incomparable loss at the hour when the nation's greatest scholar closed his eyes. And if I compare it with that deep national mourning with which the whole German nation grieved at the loss of men like Helmholtz or Mommsen or Virchow, and many another, the contrast becomes most significant.

When the president of Harvard University closed his administrative work, the old Harvard students and the whole country enthusiastically brought to him the highest thanks which he so fully deserved. But when, the year before, William James left Harvard, the most famous scholar who has worked in this Harvard generation, the event passed by like a routine matter. At the commencement festivities every speaker spoke of the departing administrative officer, but no one thought of the departing scholar. And that exactly expresses the general feeling.

A Piano for the Old People's Home

Living at Jacksonville, the seat of the Old People's Home of the Christian Church, I am in a position to see much of and to know the needs of our old people, who are inmates of the Home. Believing all good Christians to be interested in these old people, I appeal to all such to assist me in the purchase of a suitable piano for the Home, at Jacksonville.

We have thirty or thirty-five old people now in the Home and music to cheer them on their way is much needed.

Contributions may be sent direct to me at 850 South Main street, Jacksonville, Ill., or to Mrs. J. W. Fell, president of the local board of the Old People's Home, at Jacksonville, Ill.

Ministers in all our Christian churches are respectively and kindly urged to call this matter to the attention of their congregations.

Any help I may receive in this undertaking will be greatly appreciated by the old people in the Home and by the undersigned.

Respectfully,
Florence Loar.

Cotner University at Pittsburg

One of the things long to be remembered about the Pittsburg Convention will be the sweet fellowship that it afforded. Many people met at the Convention who had not seen each other for years. This was especially true of the college reunions. It was indeed very good and pleasant for the college boys and girls of former years to meet around one common festive board again. There were many such happy gatherings. We speak only of one, Cotner University's. Thirty-five of Cotner's alumni were present at the banquet given Friday night at the Crankshaw. The guest of honor was Chancellor Aylsworth. The writer served as toastmaster. Mrs. Alice Gadd Harmon, of the class of '93, led the speech-making in a very happy address, in which she told of the things that occurred in the early days of the school. After her captivating speech many others were heard in short, spicy speeches. All present greatly enjoyed the occasion, and rejoiced much in the present prosperity of the school. The alumni are all intensely loyal to their alma mater. Chancellor Aylsworth, who has been with the school from the very beginning, is greatly beloved both by the old and the new students. He has been indeed a true spiritual father to many of us. We just love him, that is all. The meeeting at Pittsburg will always be remembered as one of those sweet experiences that come into life only now and then. Next year we expect to meet in large numbers at Topeka for a grand rally. C. A. Finch, that mighty Convention Nimrod, is a Cotner University Alumnus.

William Oeschger, Class of '94.

A Word from Centennial Headquarters

Four years we have been saying "50,000 at Pittsburg in 1909," and they were here—not all at once, fortunately. At least 26,000 sat together in the Communion of the Lord's body and blood.

There was never anything like it before, and never will be again. So everything connected with the occasion will increase in value. Every goblet, plate, pitcher and table cloth used in the great communion service was sold immediately.

I saw him across the dingy street,
A little old cobbler, lame, with a hump,
Yet his whistle came to me clear and sweet,
As he stitched away at a dancing pump.

Well, some of us limp while others dance;
There's none of life's pleasures without alloy.
Let us thank heaven, then, for the chance
To whistle, while mending the shoes of joy.

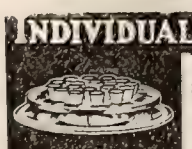
BIBLE TALKS

The present firm of A. J. Holman & Co. has been publishing Bibles in Philadelphia for nearly forty years, succeeding to Bible publishers of over twenty years' standing, and this succession of Bible making extends back to the latter part of the eighteenth century.

Philadelphia can be truthfully called "The City of Bibles," as it was in Germantown, now within the city limits, that the first Bible (in the German language) was made by Christopher Sauer in 1743. The first English Bible with an American imprint was also made in Philadelphia. Ever since that time and up to the present, there have been more Bible made in Philadelphia than in all the rest of the United States put together.



The output of Holman Bibles exceeds that of any other line sold in this country, and one reason for it is that the Holman concern are specialists in Bible making, and that they not only publish the Bible, but print and bind. The Holman line is made under one roof, every stage of manufacture from printing, gilding and binding, to the completed book, being under the immediate supervision of the publishers.

The Holman line is noted for its many improvements in letter press and bindings, flexible bindings being an exclusive Holman feature. The paper used in the popularized editions of the Holman Teachers' and Hand Bibles is thinner and more opaque than that used in similar editions of other houses, but in spite of the thinner paper, it is the most opaque used in these editions. This is due to the fact that only a high grade quality of paper is used.

Sixteen years ago the Holman Company first introduced the pronouncing feature in Teachers' and Hand Bibles. This feature has been extensively copied since by other publishers. Since that time many improvements in types and bindings, covering neatness and durability, have been made, and other improvements will appear from time to time as the opportunity arises. The success of the Holman line is due in no small measure to their policy of discarding plates and making new ones whenever it is found that improvements can be made. The purchaser can always feel sure when buying a Holman Bible that he is getting the best and the latest improved edition.

The publishers have issued an interesting little pamphlet about the various editions of the Bible published in America, which will be mailed to any address on receipt of a postal card.

A Progressive Religious Weekly For Christian Homes

-- Editors --

Herbert L. Willett,

Thoroughly Up-to-Date The Christian Century is a progressive religious paper. It is abreast of the times. It stands for those growing ideals which are fast taking possession of the minds of modern men and women. It is not alarmed at scholarship. It believes in education. It gives a vision of things as they are to be. It places the reader in touch with those great lives the country over which are being spent for the welfare of humanity. It strives to develop in its readers the open mind, a broad outlook and the habit and passion of service.

Devoted to Christian Union Thoroughly up-to-date, The Christian Century is no free lance. It rides no hobby. It loves free discussion, but hates the contraversial spirit. Its Editors devoutly believe in the plea for the unity of all Christians proclaimed by Thomas and Alexander Campbell and by the Disciples of Christ for almost a century. The Fathers were the most progressive thinkers of their time. Were they living today they would be leading the procession of religious and social progress.

The Staff of Contributors The Editors are re-inforced by a staff of the best equipped and most brilliant writers among the Disciples. Our pages are full of rich and interesting writing.

George A. Campbell conducts a page entitled "Views of Life" that has been styled by hundreds of our readers as the finest piece of literature produced among the Disciples today.

Errett Gates conducts a page on Christian Union. Dr. Gates is a specialist in this field and writes with authority.

Alva W. Taylor interprets the Trend of the World's Events with illuminating insight.

Professor Silas Jones writes the most helpful prayer-meeting message that appears in current literature.

Professor H. L. Willett conducts a page of Biblical Problems, answering all sorts of questions on the Bible, and presenting an exposition of the Book of Acts (the Sunday-school lesson) which is itself worth the price of the paper.

W. D. Endres conducts a Christian Endeavor meeting each week.

Orvis F. Jordan keeps our readers in touch with Chicago, that mysterious, fascinating and strategic field of Christian work.

John R. Ewers conducts a department in which are presented ideals and practical methods of work for Our Church Men.

An Inspiration in the Home The whole round of life is ours. The Christian Century is an assistant pastor in every home into which it goes. Pastors will find the readers of our paper among the most useful and intelligent workers they have. Its pages are adapted to every member of the family. The department especially for children is conducted by Richard W. Gentry. Our splendid news service is edited by Harry F. Burns. Continued stories of the highest grade are running almost constantly.

We wish you to belong to the Christian Century family.

A Word to our Friends

The work you did for the Christian Century at Pittsburg has yielded results beyond our plans. We will be unable, we regret to say, to send the first two issues following the convention to more than half of the new subscribers, so much larger is the list than our calculations. A great body of sentiment is organizing itself in behalf of the Christian Century as an exponent of those ideals for which the Disciples must strive in the new century. Our true friends are not content to merely stand by and watch and applaud but they want to help. Many are asking what they can do.

The best thing you can do for The Christian Century is to get new subscribers for the paper. The following is a facsimile of a letter by Dr. B. B. Tyler, sent to nearly two hundred homes of his church members in Denver. It was a practical way of showing his appreciation.

My Dear Friend.

If you are not a subscriber to, and reader of, a Christian Church paper I desire to call your attention to and commend The Christian Century. This is a good paper. It is up-to-date in its news and discussions. Its editorials are above the average. The notes on the Sunday School lessons, and Christian Endeavor topics, are helpful. The department entitled: "Home and the Children" is interesting. The "Book Mould" department is alone worth many times the Subscription price of the paper.

I am persuaded that if you will read The Christian Century weekly you will thank me for this note of Commendation.

Mrs Packwood, will become to me and highly esteemed for her character, will call on you for your Subscription.

You will, I am sure, receive her as your Spiritual Minister who is engaged in the Master's business.

The Biggest Idea of the Convention

The Disciples Renewing Their Study of the Basis of Union

WHAT WAS THE MOST IMPORTANT IDEA EXPRESSED AT THE CENTENNIAL CONVENTION?

Of course the importance of an idea depends upon its setting, upon the circumstances within which it arises and the other ideas with which it relates itself.

If you hold up to the light almost any true idea long enough to allow its inner connections with life's vital interests to assert themselves it will seem at that moment the most important idea.

One might take, for example, W. T. Moore's thesis that the heart-life should be made supreme over the intellect-life and he would see in it implications of a new religion and a new world.

Or one might find in E. L. Powell's address on the Lordship of Christ the germ from which the whole contemporary development in theology has grown. He started with Christ as a fact in human life who commands us just because he is the kind of a fact he is, not because we impute to him some metaphysical or supernatural halo.

From yet another point of view one could take Arthur Holmes' epigram that a man may save a soul for five dollars and damn two souls in making that five dollars. Here is an idea that mirrors the modern development of social Christianity. The whole Kingdom of God is packed away in that epigram.

But if the peculiar business of the Disciples of Christ in the world is, as George H. Combs said in his keynote address, the promotion of Christian union, then any idea that would open up the path along which this union movement is to proceed would take on, in a convention of the Disciples, an especial importance

From this point of view, the biggest idea at the Centennial convention, the idea most vitally affecting the Christian union enterprise and the Disciples' plea for union, was that which formed the thesis of I. J. Spencer's address on the opening night, and of J. M. Philputt's sermon on Sunday morning. This was their thesis—

That there is no practicable fashion in which divided Christendom can be united except upon the basis of personal faith in and loyalty to the person, Jesus Christ.

The significance of this idea is not that it has never been uttered among Disciples before. It has been a commonplace of our teaching since the Campbells' day. No doubt many other speakers at this convention reiterated it.

But the significance of what Mr. Spencer and Mr. Philputt said lay in the distinctions they drew, frankly and clearly, between Christ as a ground of union and certain other grounds of union that have been proposed.

No well-trained Disciple of Christ would count it a piece of information to be told that Christ, not a human creed, is the bond of fellowship and of unity among Christians. With that distinction he has been familiar since his baptism.

But when this same Disciple is told that he must distinguish Christ as the basis of union from the Bible as the basis of union the statement falls upon startled ears.

And this is why the messages of Mr. Spencer and Mr. Philputt are big and significant: they made this distinction. They did not make it casually, nor as an incident. They argued it. They felt its importance.

They saw that with the Bible as the basis union meant one thing, and with Christ as the basis it meant another thing.

Mr. Spencer saw plainly that the Bible nowhere shoves itself to the front as an authority over the church; it shoves Christ to the front.

"The Christian faith is not doctrinal, but personal," he said, "and likewise union must be personal and not doctrinal—founded upon the personal Lord and Savior. Christ was the constant and sufficient theme of apostolic preaching and teaching. He was greater far than all that might be written about him.

"The motto 'Where the Scriptures speak we speak, and where the Scriptures are silent we are silent,' was a splendid one," continued Mr. Spencer, "for the day in which it was born, when human creeds bound men's consciences more than the Word of God did bind them. But it now requires careful and constant explanation to prevent its abuse."

Here is the issue, fairly and plainly put by one of the most loyal and trusted leaders of the brotherhood, which the Disciples of Christ must face consciously, candidly and with a sense that if it is settled one way we are one kind of a people and if another way we are another kind of a people.

If we go forth to divided Christendom with a plea for union upon the Bible we end by becoming another denomination with a creed, written or unwritten, like every denomination. All denominations are engaged in just that business of asking men to unite with them "on the Bible." With this plea we would be only asking them, like all the rest, to unite on our understanding of the Bible.

But if, instead of trying to unite all Christians in an agreement on what the Bible teaches, we make it our business to show all Christians that in their personal loyalty to the personal Christ they already are one, and if we plead with them to allow no mere differences of understanding as to what the Bible means to keep them from manifesting their unity in every conceivable way, then we have a right to think of ourselves as not a denomination, but a movement within the church catholic working toward the breakdown of denominationalism.

Mr. Philputt pointed out that union upon the Bible is an increasingly hopeless program. Divergences of interpretation multiply with the years.

In addition to the old time differences we have now upon our hands a complex of new-time differences growing out of the newer methods of studying the Bible.

An attempt to unite Christendom upon the motto where the Bible speaks we speak is both impertinent and sectarian.

It is impertinent because it assumes that all Christians do not already strive to speak where the Bible speaks even though they do not agree with us as to what the Bible says.

It is sectarian because it assumes that our notion of what the Bible means must be made the basis of union and a test of fellowship in the united church.

That the seeds of sectarianism are in it is amply evidenced by the division it has already caused among the people who have subscribed to it.

The gradualness of the process by which another sect numbering 150,000 souls has been organized right out of the heart of the Disciples' body must not blind us to the startling significance of the fact.

The lesson contained in the deplorable alienation of the so-called "Antis" from the main body of Disciples is that the attempt to unite Christians upon the Bible is impossible.

The difference between the two bodies is that while the smaller clings consciously to the old motto, "Where the Bible speaks," the larger works unconsciously with Mr. Spencer's revision of the old motto into "Where Christ speaks."

Had the whole body from the beginning made the clear distinction between the personal Christ as the basis of union and a body of literature as the basis of union there would never have been such a division.

No duty in the realm of our thinking is so urgent at the opening of our new century as to make conscious to ourselves that the ground of our fellowship one with another is our personal faith in Christ.

This duty is important for two fundamental considerations:

Only upon this basis can we hope to maintain our own unity.

And only upon this basis will our plea for the reunion of Christendom have any point or effectiveness at all.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

PUTTING STRIPES ON MILLIONAIRES.

Bourke Cochran declared some time ago that it was impossible to put a millionaire criminal in prison. The eloquent Irishman was not far from right at that writing but much water has run under the bridges in the short time since. Chas W. Morse is in prison for a fifteen years term unless the Supreme Court of the United States shall free him on a technicality—the refuge of the guilty rich. Likewise John R. Walsh of Chicago will serve a sentence if the iniquitous technicality does not save him. Both these men manipulated securities, purchased stocks of themselves in their banking business and so concealed the transactions as to deceive creditors and by such devices took money that did not belong to them. Happily the day is come when "high finance" cannot get an "immunity bath" though it will yet be long, no doubt, before the man with money will be unable utterly to cheat justice, for skilled procedure will ever be the tool of crafty lawyers and there will be lawyers who can be hired to use their skill to defeat justice by means of the very necessary forms of proceedure.

HOW LONG MUST WOMAN WORK?

A great deal of interest has been aroused by Judge Tuthill's injunction restraining State's Attorney Wayman from prosecuting certain manufacturers who broke the law prohibiting women from working more than ten hours per day. A certain wealthy box maker by the name of Ritchie, a "good" churchman it is said, brought women who had worked for him for years into court and had them testify that they were unable to make a living on ten hours work per day. The Court ruled that the law was an interference with the right of free contract. The Illinois law is a copy of the famous Oregon statue which has been tried out in the courts and finally sustained in the Supreme Court of the United States. It is difficult to see how Judge Tuthill ignored this fact. The so called "freedom of contract" is indefensible from every social standpoint. It is like "personal liberty." It may be made slavery for the helpless. It can only be construed with strict consideration of the consequences upon the larger social interests and upon the laws, province to protect the weak. Seldom has a judge been so assailed over an act as has Judge Tuthill over this injunction. He claims in a public letter that he had no other province and that his action was simply a legal method for getting the law before the Supreme Court of the state quickly. The state's attorney does not seem to see it that way but is bringing several cases of like nature before another judge. Meanwhile Mr. Ritchie and his kind have come in for a public castigation that must bring the blush to their cheeks if there is any shame in them. To grow rich on the labor of women who cannot support self and one dependent on ten hours per day of work is a piece of industrial vampirism that these times will cry out against.

THE SECRET OF GIPSY SMITH.

Gipsy Smith has concluded a series of meetings in Chicago that are perhaps the most remarkable of his career and perhaps, too, the most remarkable of modern evangelism. For a month he has filled to overflowing an Armory seating 8,000 people and most of the time many were turned away. He never uses an unrefined word, he makes no sensational remarks, he has no clap-trap methods, he simply appeals to the people with remarkable power that is indefiable. Someone has said the success of preaching is not in what you say but in how you say it. This is certainly the success of Gipsy Smith. The fact that he is a gipsy throws a romantic interest about him. The success he has already attained of course gathers cumulative interest to him. He is not a doctrinal preacher any more than he is sensational. He does not preach "hell-fire and brimstone." He does nothing that so many modern evangelists are criticised for doing. He sings at every service and his clear tenor has a quality in it that is not born of the schools but of the soul of the man. Some one says it has that magic quality that no other living singer but Caruso possesses. He stills the murmur of the multitude with that marvelous voice in some sweet favorite hymn. With it he opens the hearts of them all and they forget self while they listen to the same vibrant tones delivering a message so simple that it would not impress one in print. His voice is not powerful or great in volume but clear and vibrant and rings to the remotest corner of the great auditorium like the tones of a silver bell. Then it carries pathos and humor with dramatic modulation and charms with the natural power of the born actor who acts with no affectation the things that are welling in his heart. The "secret" may be summed up in the simplicity of the message, the dramatic (not theatrical) deliverance of it, and the great soul of the preacher. The great evangelist is as simple hearted, unaffected and spontaneous as an unspoiled boy. He pours out his message without effort. He preaches like the brown thrush sings, making his soul a liquid melody. You may go with the cold hearted design of a doubter who intends to find flaws, or with the penetrating eye of the psychological analyst, and you may leave unconvinced that mass evangelism is a success but while you are under the thrill of the Gipsy you will laugh and weep at his behest unless you have locked the natural man in a safety device before starting. When the invitation was given a few nights ago hundreds flocked to the "Inquiry Room" and he came down from the pulpit and asked all who would yet come to Christ to come up and take his hand. Hundreds came. He stroked the silvered hair of the old men, held little lads to his bosom, grasped both hands of aged women and mothers and said simple words to each that they will never forget for the tidal gates of their souls were all down. It may have been a wave of emotionalism but it was human and it was full of the best in everyone of them that one could but think of the multitudes that pressed about the great Christ he had so eloquently preached, if perchance they could but touch the hem of his garment, and the eyes of thousands were full of tears. None but a cynic could look on in cold disdain.

EVANGELIZING CONDITIONS.

But the final question is not answered when we have seen the thousands profess conversion as they have in this most remarkable revival. What of the morrow with them? Their impulses have been turned toward the right but do they know whither they are to go and can they go where they would? Is it the best method to arouse the impulses of thousands and leave them unassured of any help adequate to their newly aroused and emotionalized impulses or would it be better to reach fewer and insure their safety in the future? It is impossible for the quiet work of the churches to seem other than humdrum to many who come from such meetings in such emotional state. They go back to the same old surroundings and are unable to cope with them. The place and manner of a man's life make him quite as much as he makes them. We need an evangelizing of conditions in the work of the church. The parable of the sower might well be used as a delineation of environment. Some will go to the home and street of barren soil, others to that of thorns and rocks, and it will be impossible for the seed of their new intentions to thrive there. Men are made helpless by conditions often. They are foredoomed by the places they live in and it is barbarious to cry "let them get out" when there is no way out for them. We need a social evangel in our religious revivalism and it will have to deal with problems that cannot be settled in a night. It will not cry out against a Gipsy Smith but it will deal with all the nature of the man and it will give the new found resolutions a chance to live. This does not apply to all places but it is living question in a city like Chicago and a consideration of it will reveal why the poor are not in the churches and why the saloon thrives and why the workingman seems to have so little interest in religion.

THE GIPSY'S ONE MISTAKE.

This paragraph is not meant to dogmatize. It is but an opinion. Those who read "A Prophet in Babylon" will recall the march of the hosts through the slums and purlieus of the wicked. Gipsy Smith has adopted the brilliant picture of his friend Dawson and re-enacts it during his meetings. He gathers the great host that has heard him, thousands augment it, and he leads them through the vile allays of wickedness where bad women leer and worse men curse. His motives are the best. He desires to attract them to hear his message and draw them into midnight meetings held in near-by theaters. But there are other considerations. No method is good that entails a greater amount of bad even though the designer be an angel. It is claimed that 20,000 marched behind the Gipsy. The crowd on the streets were estimated at 50,000. Among them were multitudes of youth who would never have been seen in such places but for the religious excuse offered. They saw things and heard things and had things burned into their memories and imaginations that will never out and many who ranged near the borderland received suggestions as onlookers, not from the procession but from the surroundings, that will ripen into lust and perversion. The ground forbidden to boys and girls by every sense of respect in them became an open invitation to explore the secrets deeper at a more convenient season. The inmates of the "house of the woman in scarlet" were sent out of the district by the orders of the police. Every door was locked and every window darkened. Thus the real habitues were not reached. But, horrible to relate, as soon as the procession was past the places opened with wild revelry and from the thousands who lingered the dives were filled until in some cases the police had to cordon the doors to prevent an overcrowding that might have meant riot. The depraved owners of the resorts claimed it the greatest night of the year for their unspeakable business. Bacchanalian revels that cannot be told here took place in the open streets in mockery of the parade. The beauty of the bride had walked before the beast of lust. Let the work in these reeking moral slums be done but let it be done by brave and mature men and women who go in quietness and strength and reach down to the heart of the matter.

Editorial

WE HAVE watched the pages of the Christian Standard with growing surprise that the final article of Professor Willett in response to Z. T. Sweeney has not been published. We expressed some wonder at the time the series was published by the Standard that the final paper should have been omitted from a discussion that bore the general appearance of being complete. Professor Willett's concluding paper was announced in the Christian Century on the same day that the Standard series appeared, and was published the following week. We have assumed that both Mr. Sweeney and the editors of the Standard would see the propriety of giving this paper the same attention as those that preceded it. We hope to see this article, and if possible a reprint of the one by Mr. Sweeney to which it is the response, published by the Standard without further delay.

REV. Henry C. Mabie, D. D., former Secretary of the American Baptist Missionary Union, is giving a course of lectures at the University of Chicago on "The Place of Missions in the Modern Church." Dr. Mabie is one of the most informed and accomplished interpreters of missionary interests in America today. In figure and personality he is not unlike Isaac Errett in his strongest days. His grasp of missionary problems is statesmanlike and broad. The course of lectures which he is giving includes such themes as "Missionary Achievements of the Last Century," "The New World Consciousness and the Kingdom," "Present Day Forms and Factors of the Missionary Enterprise," "The Missionary's Personality," "Missionary Organizations," "The Pastor and the Missionary Church," "America as a Propagating Bed for World Missions," and "The Task and Its Accomplishment." Those who have had the privilege of listening to Dr. Mabie appreciate the fact that a masterful interpreter of the missionary problems is with them. Especially timely are these lectures, coming as they do in close connection with the return of Professor Burton from the mission fields of the Far East.

THE death of Marquis Ito, the Japanese statesman, has sent a shock of surprise and horror throughout the civilized world. Perhaps no statesman in recent years, not even President McKinley, has represented the ideals of civilization and progress more notably than the Marquis Ito. Only the elements of fanaticism and anarchy could have desired the death of either of these great men. The long service of the Marquis as the leading statesman of the Japanese empire made his word an authority on almost all questions of eastern diplomacy; and his interest in and sympathy with modern and western life was one of the elements which carried Japan safely over its transitional period from mediaevalism to the modern world of which it is, in the East, the foremost representative today. There is partial compensation for the loss of such a man in the reflection that his ideals have already been in a large measure incorporated into the life of his nation, and the prevalence of those ideals is the surest guarantee of immunity in any land from the horrors of war and the threats of the type of men who plotted and carried out his assassination.

TO WHAT lengths popular revivalism will go in debasing the customs of the churches and the religious conceptions of church people has not yet been determined. One would think the limit had already been reached. But some new trick of getting converts or setting the town by the ears or raising money is brought to our attention every week. Just now it is a device for raising the money to pay the evangelist. In a down-state paper in Illinois a communication from a town named Morrisonville tells us that a revival came to a close there "with a record of 354 converts for the four weeks." Evangelist Forsythe was "assisted by his wife, sons and the clergy of Morrisonville."

"To the $600 previously raised to pay the expenses of the meeting, $800 was added Sunday to pay the evangelist. The matter of raising the contribution for Mr. Forsythe was in charge of the Rev. C. A. Nyman, the new pastor of the Methodist church, who has been the press agent for the revival, and who, more than anyone else, Mr. Forsythe said, was responsible for the great good that was done during his four weeks' stay in Morrisonville. The Rev. Mr. Nyman's method of securing the funds was to announce to the audience that some one would sing a solo for $50 and the audience would proceed to 'chip in' to get the musical number. Officer Frank Schliegel, Morrisonville's big policeman, on a dare from some one in the audience, gave a vocal solo for $10, ten persons contributing a dollar each. While he was in the agony of his effort there were several who offered twice this sum if he would quit. The barbers' trio, Frank Clower, William Compton and Thomas Pence, three tonsorial artists all well known in Taylorville, brought $100 into the evangelist's fund. These three barbers were all converted during the revival. 'The preachers' wives' duet number was given by Mrs. C. A. Nyman and brought $75. Jack McFree, the tent janitor, gave a solo for $75; Charles Forsythe, a son of the evangelist, for $25; Dolph Pence for $100. The first $250 raised resulted in a duet by the Rev. Mr. Nyman and Roy Forsythe, the musical director of the revival. Today the evangelist gave the Rev. Mr. Nyman a handsome stick pin and Mrs. Nyman a silver baking dish as a testimonial of his appreciation of their invaluable services."

Is there any school boy who reads this who would be unable to find in it a strong suggestion for answering the question, "What is the matter with the churches?"

CONSIDERABLE agitation has been caused in Presbyterian circles, especially in the vicinity of New York, over the examination of three graduates of Union Theological Seminary who were applying for license to preach. They showed signs of hesitance in answering the questions concerning the conventional doctrines of the Bible's inspiration, the Virgin birth of Jesus and the Westminster Confession. The New York Presbytery granted the license by a decisive majority. One of the three young men is Mr. Archibald Black, a brother of the well-known Rev. Hugh Black. Mr. Black having been called to a pastorate the presbytery was asked to ordain him. Whereupon the reactionaries filed a protest which presbytery answered through a committee appointed for that purpose and proceeded with the ordination. Prior to the ordination Mr. Black wrote a frank letter to the presbytery declaring his faith in fervent and sincere words, and setting forth his motives for entering the ministry and what would be the substance of his message as a preacher. From this letter we quote the following:

"At this time I would like to take the opportunity of stating frankly and in brief why I desire to enter the ministry, and my desire can be summed up in the words 'that I may testify to the gift of the grace of God.' My one desire is to preach to men the grace of God as revealed in Jesus Christ, whom I know as my redeemer, who as the divine Son of God was sent to us by the Father in his mercy. In Christ God has supremely revealed himself to me, and with Paul I can say that 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself.' Through Christ alone can we truly know the Father and his will for us, and this he has shown us by his life here, his death on the cross and his resurrection from the dead. 'And the word became flesh and dwelt among us.' He offered himself as a sacrifice for our sins, and is now lifted up that whosoever believeth may in him have eternal life. In my life I desire to preach Christ to men that they may be persuaded to come to him from their sins, that they may know him in truth and love him with their whole souls and take him as their Lord and God."

The Interior, to which we are indebted for the foregoing facts, adds that "people who would by church prohibition prevent this young man from realizing the desire which he thus so fervently voices, might be expected to apply for an injunction to forbid the candle on the candlestick from giving light to all that are in the house."

Our Church Men

A Keen Analysis of the Brotherhood's Task

By John Ray Ewers

To those of us who are deeply interested in the awakening of our church men, the sessions for men only were most interesting. Enthusiasm reached the highest level at these meetings. It was indeed thrilling to be one of that noble throng of more than two thousand Christian men. One of our greatest and best business men, Mr. R. A. Long, presided, and his band played. Secretary Macfarlane made a broad-minded address, showing his awareness of modern problems and his warm sympathy with efforts of reform. His speech was filled with keen, penetrating points clothed in language of surpassing beauty and grace, like a Damascus blade draped in a scarf of vari-colored silk.

A Strike from the Shoulder

Dr. Arthur Holmes, of Philadelphia, brought the men to their feet with his masterly speech. He struck right out from the shoulder. He knew his subject and was fearless in his presentation. It is refreshing, occasionally, to hear a man who says what he thinks, who does not play to the galleries continually. I will not attempt an epitome of any of these speeches, hoping that all of them will appear in The Christian Century.

Not the least important event was the introduction of prominent business men for short speeches. U. S. Senator Oliver, of Pittsburg; Phillips, of New Castle; Vance, from Oregon; Chapman, from California, and several others made ringing speeches. This feature is noteworthy. The time has come when our laymen should be heard in our conventions. The men who do the paying should be heard as well as the men who do the praying. It is to be hoped that more time will be alloted these business men in our coming conventions. In all the sessions preachers have been doing most of the talking. Give the business men a place. They deserve it. A layman will tell you what he thinks without fear of losing his job. Nothing is more belittling to manhood than to see a fellow dodging the truth and cringing and fawning through fear. Let those kiss great toes who will. There are some kings who will not. They were all kings at the Men's session and it was a royal occasion.

Now that it is all over, let us try to analyse it. The Brotherhood of the Disciples meets a real need. The men of our communion are enlisting for service. Throughout this country were thousands and thousands of men who would have enjoyed being at that meeting, but they were toiling in stores, shops, offices and on farms. Their hearts are loyal, and they must be reckoned as the rank and file of the men's army. At the close of the first year's work, then, a great group is aroused and are ready for battle.

Movement Lacks Definiteness.

The movement is well manned. The officers and secretaries are efficient. What we lack is definiteness of purpose. Perhaps two-thirds of the enthusiastic men at the sessions were unidentified with the movement. Why? Because they fail to see just how the movement helps them personally.

Upon reflection we know that the secretaries are worthy of support because they are working away at the immense problems of organization. They are feeling their way along the lines of experience to practical solutions. This work must be done. It will take time, and we must exercise patience while at the same time giving all the sane advice we can. One of the secretaries said to me, "We have to deal with so many different men, in different sections of the country, with so many different ideas that it seems impossible to find any one plan or purpose that will be adapted to all." This is precisely our weakness as I see it. We are scattering our energies. We lack definiteness.

Danger of Enthusiasm Vanishing.

Unless very soon some great challenging goal can be found and agreed upon, all this splendid enthusiasm will vanish into thin air. Men cannot be held together long without some such purpose. We must decide this year. The general constitution is too vague. It permits almost anything. Let me define the real situation. Here we meet and enjoy the delightful fellowship of Christian men. We applaud and wave handkerchiefs. We say, "That was great, wasn't it?" and then we go away. Here is a man who belongs to a men's Bible class. "Are you identified with the Brotherhood?" "No." "Why?" "I see no real reason why I should be." Here is a man who belongs to a men's club in some church. He is in the same situation. Here is a man gloriously interested in the Layman's Missionary Movement. He complains because our Brotherhood does not swing itself into line with foreign missions and thinks that there the solution can be found. He is not far wrong.

Here is a man whose interests are all bound up in civic reforms. His church club works at that. He wants social betterment made the big thing. He also is not far wrong. Thus all the many men of many minds pull various ways and unity of purpose seems impossible. One man suggested to me that for one year all the energies be directed toward missionary enterprise, the next year toward social improvements, and the third toward some other worthy endeavor. This might not work. We simply must solve this problem this year. We cannot go on in this divided condition. Men will not support the organization unless they feel they are getting some concrete return. Beholding that superb group of men I felt like crying out, "What mighty possibilities! What undirected energies!"

Unity of Purpose

As one who passionately loves the men's cause, as one who is most anxious to see it succeed, I plead for unity of purpose. Mark what I say, that unless some one great challenging purpose is found this year the whole thing will dissolve into air. Shall it be missions? Nothing could be better in this day of The Laymen's Missionary Movement. Shall it be civic betterment? That is a noble motive. Shall it be personal evangelism? That motive has held together the Brotherhood of St. Andrew for years. Shall it be temperance? Few things stir the hearts of men more today. Some one worthy thing must be selected at once and every Bible class, club and group must be brought into line. Personally, I favor the missionary motive as supreme, with sub-committee on Evangelism, Civic-Betterment and Temperance.

Say not another is fitter than thou—
Shame to the manhood that sits on thy brow!
Own thyself equal to all that men may.
Cease thine evading; God needs thee today,
Move to the fore!

—James Buckham.

Massing the Masculine at Pittsburgh

A Live Report of the Men's Meeting

By Alva W. Taylor

The most prophetic moments at the Centennial Convention were those given to the special men's meetings on Tuesday. Here was our latest achievement, our most exemplary effort to catch step with the times, our most promising new movement. This is an age for men in religious endeavor. It is the psychological moment for masculine Christianity. Everywhere the Spirit of Strength is moving upon the face of the waters. The Y. M. C. A. is the most virile religious organization of the times if the strength of a religious institution is to be measured by the results it produces in manhood. The Layman's Missionary Movement is the mightiest upswelling of genuine apostolic zeal for the first and last of all Christian causes in the church of today. In every religious communion the Men's Club is receiving a largeness of attention never before given to any one class within the church. The times call for men and men are seeking the means and methods whereby they may enlarge the work of the church and adapt its evangel and institutions to the peculiar needs and abilities of their kind. There will have to be experiments. Plans will have to be revised. The process will be a development but it matters less about plans and methods than about the spirit and the enthusiasm.

Men's Sessions of Prophetic Character

In spirit and enthusiasm "Brotherhood Day" at the convention was both reassuring and prophetic. Thousands of men came to the meetings with eagerness and an enthusiasm that was not suppressed. They cheered the telling sentences of the speakers and they cheered at times that made glad the hearts of the faithful men that lead in the work of the churches and on whose hearts the cause of righteousness lies like a flame upon the altar. They received with acclaim the declarations of both Mr. Long and Arthur Holmes that it mattered more even about how a man gets his money than how he gives it. Nowhere in the programs of the whole convention was there a session given to the social cause.

A Startling Indictment

Nowhere did this great Disciple Convention in formal way lend ear to the cause of the workingman or listen to a single address on the social question as such. It was deaf to the cry of the women and child workers, the fight on dread disease and more dreadful habitations. A hundred organizations are doing work for humanity that crave the help of the church both morally and organically and to whom the public declarations of a great religious body at a time like this would give great impulse and encouragement. To set apart a session for their consideration would commend the church to mankind more than any other significant thing it could do. It is not according to the tradition and custom of our conventions. It is argued that it is not properly their business.

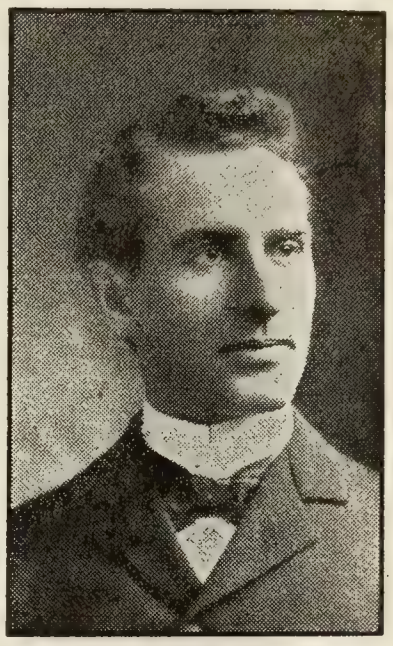
But is not that the very essence of their business? Is our evangelism confined to the immediate securing of the confession? Would it not be good for us to give some consideration to the evangelizing of conditions? We are set to do all of Christ's work, and is not every human cause His cause?

In this Brotherhood meeting the sign of the times was written large. The note that sounded clearest was the cry for men to help men. Manhood in the church was challenged to attempt these human tasks in the name of the Christ who "went about doing good" and preached the doctrine of the "Inasmuch," and the manhood of the church shouted back its acceptance of the challenge with ringing applause.

Discovery of New Leaders

In every convention there are surprises. Many men make great addresses. On every program are the tried men who never fail to rise to the heights. Then there is always some one who is among the less known that rises to great heights and makes his address the talk of the sessions. Such was the speech of Arthur Holmes at the Brotherhood meeting. It aroused the great audience to the semblance of a political meeting's enthusiasm, but it was everything a political convention's "sound the note" effort is not. There was no appeal to the loved traditions to gain a shout and no sounding of party shibboleths to waken the rafters. It was the ringing appeal of a young prophet, speaking out of an experience that fitted him as no man among us to make just that appeal to men for men. Mr. Holmes has for some years been working in a Railroad Y. M. C. A. There he met men of the world and men of toil, and there he had free hand to adapt methods to their need and see how the gospel could evangelize character in a hundred ways in addition to that of preaching. His address had been four years in preparation and that without knowledge of when it was to be delivered. Then it was given out of the heart as well as out of the head and the great audience of men had both hearts and heads for its reception. It made up in no small measure for the omission from all the programs of the social problem of the church. Its strength, inspiration and timeliness demand that it be published in full.

The Man Behind the Movement



Behind every significant movement somewhere is a significant man. The significant man behind this movement within the church of the Disciples of Christ is the man who presided over these sessions at Pittsburg, and who presides over its board meetings and who, more than either of these, presides over the movement as its presiding genius, bearing it about in his heart by day and night and making it the beneficiary of his business acumen and generosity. Mr. R. A. Long is one of those men whom all good men love to see in the possession of money. Jacob of old offered to tithe his prosperity with Providence, but here is a man who impresses you as making no division but as holding his all as a stewardship. The man who gives his notes for benevolence just as he does for the enlargement of his business is certainly of as great faith regarding sacred as secular things, and daring to build both together marks himself as one in a thousand among men of means. Mr. Long has stood back of the Brotherhood Movement with money, brains and faith, and his heart must have been made glad at the promise given in this convention—the promise of interest and enthusiasm and an understanding that guarantees success. His address was all significant. Here are some of the striking passages:

"Allow me to say, as a plain business man, that what we want is not a new religion, but a closer adherence to the old religion."

"New methods of doing church work will come with new conditions, but the principles of the gospel of individual and social redemption must remain the same as when Jesus declared, 'No man cometh unto the Father but by me.'"

"We have new business methods, but the principle of business remains the same as when Abraham bought the Cave of Macphelah."

"In all my life nothing has so thrilled the pulsations of my heart as looking into the faces of these thousands of strong, happy men, looking to the accomplishment of one great purpose."

Alva W. Taylor, Pastor of Irving Park Church, Chicago; Author of "The Trend of Events"

"The pursuance of a commercial life to the exclusion of all else means decay and destruction as in the case of the parable of the Rich Fool."

"We are confronted with a species of commercial infidelity—a sort of unfaith in the ethical principles of Jesus. Men say, 'I cannot be successful in business unless I lie, cheat, gouge, steal, and crush.' I want to declare my unalterable convition that such is not true."

"Even if one succeed in the accumulation of wealth, if he be disloyal to the teachings of the Master his life is a failure."

"Recognizing the immense power organization places in his hands, the big business man especially needs to be careful that his business enterprises are permeated with the Spirit of Christ."

"The great questions of business monopoly, of aggregated industrial values, of the relationship between capital and labor, to say nothing of those between vested interests, must find their solution in the principles contained in the Sermon on the Mount."

"No loafer can develop into even a desirable citizen in the world's commercial activities, much less in the activities of the Kingdom of God."

The Brotherhood can depend not only upon the unfailing support of its president in money and time and influence, but it can with confidence nail to its banner the sentiments expressed in the above quotations and on to its task with a program as broad as the teachings of Jesus in their applications to the problems of the world in our time. Everywhere wrong comes into conflict with right and men in the world of affairs see the issue joined. There is a call to this Brotherhood to rally to the banner of Christ and do battle for righteousness. The business of the church is not within the walls of the church house alone, nor is it confined to the relations of individual to individual as they meet face to face. It includes social righteousness and must go to the business mart, the city council, the legislature, the political caucus and everywhere right meets wrong, and take with it that Sermon on the Mount as the final solvent.

Secretary Stephen J. Corey's Address

There were other great addresses at these two sessions of the Brotherhood in Pittsburg. Stephen J. Corey sounded a note that will not die out of the hearts of the men who heard it. He offered the Brotherhood the great cause that would hold them together in the face of all distracting causes, a cause that challenges the biggest in every man that moves in the world today more profoundly than any other. We hope to see it published fully at a future date, but give here a few sentences:

"No movement ever succeeded without a big job on hand."

"The vital danger in any movement is that its end may become smothered in its means. It must have a great, challenging, sacrificial task. A banquet is good as a springboard, but not as a couch. As a brotherhood of Christian men we need a master passion."

"The great commission is not a suggestion but a command."

"The Christian whose sense of debt goes no farther than his community has not advanced much beyond the incubator stage."

"One hundred years ago the Bible was an unheard of book to seven-eighths of the population of the globe. Today it is accessible to seven-eighths the population of the globe."

"One hundred years ago foreign missions were an experiment. Today we have a scientific basis for our work and a century of experience to back it up."

"One hundred years ago there were barely one hundred lonely, poorly equipped foreign missionaries in all the world. Today there are nineteen thousand of them scattered in every land that the sun shines on."

"One hundred years ago there were practically no native Christians in heathen lands. Today there is a native church for every 1,500,000."

"The greatest heroes of this hour are the lonely pickets on God's far frontier, who beat down the stubborn walls of paganism and plant the flag of glory there."

"God is calling for a new kind of volunteer today. He wants men who will volunteer to stay at home and make money for him with exactly the same degree of consecration and heroism."

"Christian men, if we are to take our share of the world's conquest, we must within the next ten years increase our yearly offering by $1,000,000 a year and raise the average gift of $1.25 per member."

Men's Responsibility for Boys

In the address of T. W. Grafton a vital theme was treated and one that was especially appropriate to a Brotherhood meeting. He laid upon the shoulders of the men a task that no other can do but a man, and one that challenges the local Brotherhood of every church to concrete, at-home effort. If Clubs are asking what they can do, let them get a suggestion from Mr. Grafton's address, then write to A. W. Conner about one of his Campaigns for Boys. If the Clubs do not prosper it is because they have not a vital and inviting task. The boys of the community furnish the task to every club that is desirous of work. Here are a few of the sentences from "The Man in the Boy" that bring the heart of Mr. Grafton's message to the reader:

"Two problems confront the twentieth century church—the men's problem and the boys' problem. They are not new problems, but new conditions have arisen, making new solutions necessary."

"The men of religious power and influence have, without exception, come to a religious decision as boys."

"It is the boy-life, infused with the spirit of Christ, and saved from the distorting, malignant touch of vice, that shines with brightest luster in every field of Christian achievement."

"The lack of sympathy with youthful pursuits and pleasures is sending more boys to the devil than all other agencies. Says Judge Lindsay, friend of the misunderstood boy: 'When you seek a boy, go after his heart.'"

"To sympathize with him we must first appreciate his worth. As Michael Angelo, with the insight of genius, saw the angel in the rough block of marble, awaiting release by his well-directed chisel, so the man capable of dealing successfully with boys must see in each urchin something divine."

"To sympathize with the boy we must understand his aspirations, his temptations, his environment and then get into sympathy with his life battles, which, though often imaginary, are very real to him."

"The school and the textbook are all right in their place, but they miss the practical problems of boy-life. He must learn elsewhere many of the vital questions of the unfolding mystery of life. Often he is left to discover them from evil sources and bitter experiences."

If the physiology that is never taught could be given to the boy at the right time, what a world of blackening, blighting, cankering, damning sin would be escaped."

"The boy is a hero-worshipper. The boy is an imitator. He is sure to imitate his hero and his hero is always a man. What the man is, the boy worshipper will attempt to be. He smokes because men smoke. He drinks because men drink. He swears because men swear. Be sure, whatever his hero does, he will attempt to do."

"If the boy is to reach the normal, manly estate there must be some provision made for him in the church. The modern church has seldom taken him into account."

"Our church architecture has left the boy and his necessities out of the plans. From basement to dome, there is no place where he can set his foot with freedom."

"The boy's nature is not antagonistic to church and religious influence, but he feels the sting of neglect, and resents what he regards as an attitude of injustice. On the other hand he is responsive to every attempt to help and use him. Let the church provide for the boy and he will love the church and will serve it with a loyalty that puts to shame the puny service of your men."

Good Man—Good Speceh

Walter S. Goode does not belie his name. He is just what you call him—"good." His address on "The Church Man in the World" was a ringing call to social duties. He would enlarge the borders of church activity beyond the conventional lines and enlist the best institution on earth in all the causes that challenge humanity. Here are some of his scintillants:

"The world's test of our religion is the Christian man of today."

"The Church Man in the World is an unanswerable argument for or against Christ and the Church."

"If our lives are untrue, the world, weary and confused, cries back, 'I can not hear what you say, what you are speaks so loud."

"The world is not clean, but only that religion which makes and keeps men clean will have the world's respect."

"The world worships strength, and is led only by strong men. The strong man

R. A. Long, Kansas City, *P*resident of the Brotherhood is he who knows his task and gives himself to it."

"Such a man was Paul. One who never turned his back, but marched breast forward. Ours is a man's war, and this is a man's way."

"Dimly the world sees that justice is the only true charity, for justice is of Jesus Christ. It expects, then, that the church man, like his Christ, shall be just to all, and the champions of justice for all; that his face shall be set like flint; that his voice shall be raised; that his arm shall be uplifted against all unfairness toward a fellowman. In this the world is right."

"Who should be enlisted against industrial injustice like Church men? Are the weak oppressed by force and fraud? Are the poor, the ignorant, exploited, sold by graft and greed? Who should know and feel it like the Church man!"

"Do housing conditions condemn multitudes of men, women and little ones to lives of filth and weakness, shame and crime? Who, if not the the Church, should hear the bitter, silent cry of those submerged ones for whom Christ died!'

"That Church man who lends his tongue to venom and vituperation, who who dips his pen in acid when he writes fills the air to holy conflict with unholy epithet and unbrotherly accusation, or of the mistakes and failings of his fellows, forgets his Christ, betrays his cause, loses his case in the judgment of the world."

Addresses like Mr. Goode's relieve the church of much of the criticism that even goon men pass upon it because they observe how current problems are passed by in the pulpit as if Christianity had nothing to do with them.

Words Drawn from Rich Experience

There were two addresses by visitors, both of which were excellent, especially that of Rev. Robert Johnstone of Canada, but space forbids giving more than some note of W. F. Richardson's. Mr. Richardson always says the right thing and has come to be looked upon as one of the pre-eminently judicial minds among us. His sixteen years of service in an old, down-town church in Kansas City, and his persistent refusal to desert so difficult a cause, even when most inviting positions have been offered him, mark him as a man of might in spirit as well as mind.

"In the beginning, men led, in numbers, in prominence and in activity. Apostles, elders, deacons, evangelists, pastors—all were men. The early converts were mostly men."

"The world a new conception of character, in which the strength of man and the gentleness of woman, the courage of man and the patience of woman, the passion of man and the purity of woman, should be combined in one life; and he himself lived that life and exhibited that character."

"All honor to the faithful women; and it looks as if all the honor belongs to them."

"It will no longer be tolerated that the Gaiuses, Aquilas and Philemons shall shirk behind the skirts of the Lydias, Priscillas and Phoebes. The colored minister was setting forth a condition, and not a theory, when he said to his people, 'Bredren, de women ah de backbone ob de church, and dey am rapidly comin' to de front!'"

"This is not the place for the backbone. Men can no longer pose as elders and deacons on Sunday, and leave their wives and daughters to bear the burdens of the week."

"Why should not men devote to their religious life the same energy and effort that they do to their business, their clubs, lodges and labor-unions?"

"The mission of the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ is one of agitation, education, inspiration and organization. To arouse the indifferent, instruct the ignorant, encourage the willing and organize the workers is our task."

This might be called the launching of the ship. It has been building from beam and hull upward and there is yet much to be done before it is ready for rudder and capstan; but this great gathering broke the wine of blessing upon it and slipped it into the everlasting waters. The great body known as The Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ is afloat. It may need alterations in its design and modifications of its inner construction, but its dimensions are set and its prow is pointed and all its passengers are to belong to the crew. If Messrs. Macfarland and Elliott do not object and call the figure strained, we will add that its sailing master and purser are alert and ready to cry "heave-ho" and to give hearty welcome to all who will "aboard."

The Christian Man's Contribution to the Kingdom

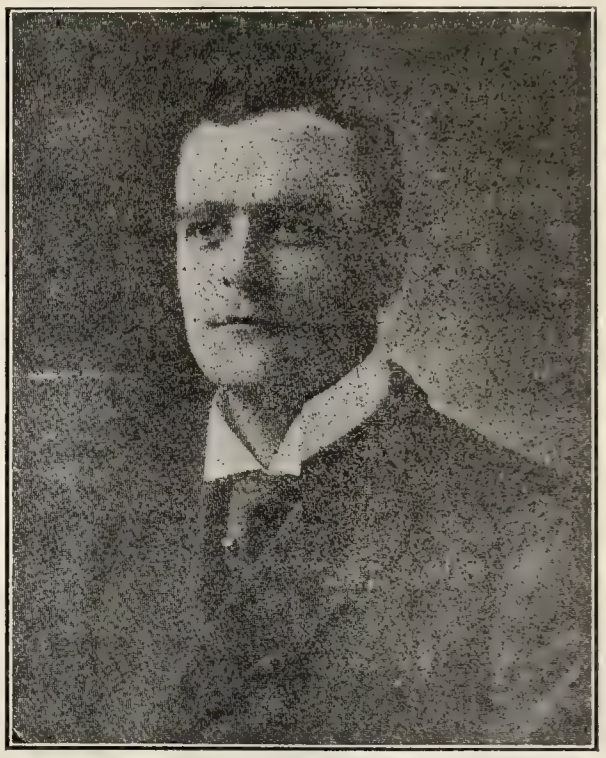
A Manly Plea for Manly Work in the Church by Layman and Preachers

By Arthur Holmes, PhD.

The kingdom of God will not advance by standing still. Many Christians act as if it would. They seem to believe that nothing more is demanded of them than lives of mediocre righteousness; to be just as good as the standards of their communities happen to demand. They believe in anchoring to the rock of salvation and staying there. Somehow, by the grace of God, the good ship of the kingdom will get along like that boat in Dr. A. C. Dixon's story. According to him, two yachts sailed a time-limit, straight-away race up along the New England coast where the tide runs high. The signal gun was fired; the sails went up, the canvas swelled out gloriously in the breeze, the gallant little crafts keeled over until rails were awash; the foam plowed up under their prows, driving the salt spray back over the crew. They were making a splendid dash. Bye and bye the wind died down a little, but they apparently held their pace. One captain, however, keeping his eye on a landmark, discovered in reality they were drifting backward. Strong as the wind was, the tide was stronger, and was actually carrying them the other way. The captain, seizing upon the situation, slyly dropped an anchor, made fast, and held his boat exactly where she was. He won the race by standing still. A good many good people feel that way about the kingdom. They are busy asking if the anchor will hold, and forget all about hoisting sail. They exhort the brethren to live "up to" the high standard of the past. They emphasize Paul's exhortation to stand, to withstand, and having done all, to stand, and forget his equally emphatic example of pressing forward to the goal of the high calling in Christ. They adopt the defensive rather than the offensive, the negative rather than the postive, the passive rather than the aggressive policy. To them the army of the Lord is a standing army, and they are satisfied if it does not fire a shot in a hundred years.

Pleads for Active Campaign

My plea is for an active campaign. My belief is that while the kingdom may be maintained by every good man's living up to the accepted standards of his world, it will never be advanced an inch by such living. Jesus was lifted up that he might draw all men unto him, and every advance the world has made has been by bloody stairs, every step of which was a dead body of a martyr-prophet. The contribution of every Christian man to the advance of the kingdom is some degree of martyrdom.



The Man in the Shop

Begin with the man in the shop. What contribution can he make? Is he a good mechanic? Does he do his work well? Does he do a fair day's work for his wage? Is he sober, industrious, thrifty, a providing husband, a sacrificing father, a good neighbor, an intelligent citizen? If he is all these, then he merely maintains the kingdom; he has not elevated the standard one whit; he is not pointed out in his shop as an out-standing and brilliant example of a Christian man. Even the Gentiles do the same!

He must do more than all this. He must do as well as they, and then add to it a positive piece of work, voluntarily, at some cost to himself, without reward, and through it raise the standard of right living in that shop.

An Example

For example, let me tell you about a nickel-plater, Thomas French, and a blacksmith, Peter Rule. Both of these men are church members. They are active committeemen in religious work in the railroad shops. They held services at noon, sang hymns, prayed and did all the conventional things Christian men do. They were asked to enter a mechanic labor organization. Most righteously they shook their heads. That organization was an ungodly, unworldly, drink-loving body of men, with which no decent Christian man ought to have anything to do. Later on they saw a great light. They entered that society and resolutely used their influence for righteousness. At the yearly banquet, for the first time in its history, liquor was ruled out. Thomas French was invited to perform the unheard-of service of opening the repast with grace. They secured a local option resolution in that particular lodge, and finally carried the local option plank into the national organization, where it is being considered today.

Arthur Holmes, for Five Years Educational Director in the Y. M. C. A., Philadelphia, Now Instructor in Psychology, University of Pennsylvania.

Thus by their efforts they changed the spirit of that whole organization; they eliminated drink from that order; they compelled the members to stand for a far-reaching movement; they distinctly set a new standard for the men of their shops, and today they stand as the apostles of a new order, prophets of God in their world.

Our Poor Excuses

Business and professional men are prone to excuse themselves from active campaigns in advancing the kingdom by saying they are too busy to attend church, act on committees, be present at the special meetings. They are sometimes charged with permitting business to interfere with their religion.

To such charges the average man is either silent, accepting the tacit assumption that the kingdom of God can be advanced only through church activities, or he replies that he is doing his Christian duty every day of his life.

The lawyer, for example, will point to his probity and respectable standing in his world; the physician will exhibit his roll of free patients or his hospital services; the business man will refer you to his list of contributions to all sorts of religious and philanthropic enterprises.

The Church Needs Derricks

To all these things I say "Amen." Thank God for that increasing belief that religion is not confined to the four walls of any building, however holily dedicated. All praise be given to that man who withstands daily the terrible suction of the under-currents in his business and nobly lives clean and strong before his fellows, a righteous man, one without reproach. Such men are indeed pillars of the church. Pillars are necessary. They may be ornamental. But for raising things the finest Corinthian pillar ever hewn from transparent marble is discounted to zero by the clumsiest derrick ever patched together from rought-hewn beams. And further, every pillar first needs a derrick to swing it upright and put it into place. The church needs derricks.

Contrast, if you please, the career of two young lawyers. Both of them began poor; both of them secured political positions. One of them kept close to the bosom of the "organization." In everything he "went along" with the bosses. He kept his skirts clear, of course. Respectability covered him with her bleached rags. Promotion came as a matter of course. Today he is pointed out as an example of smug righteousness and the prosperity that covers a multitude of sins.

The other young man was speedily faced in his political position with the question of his position on civic righteousness. He stood at the forking of the roads. One led to ease and low ideals; the other to his relegation to private life, the struggle for a practice and obscurity. Owen Roberts chose the latter, and through that choice raised the standards of his profession.

Still another young lawyer, Clarence D. Gibboney, rises like a rock out of the ooze and mire of the political morass and stands nobly against all odds in the face of all vituperation, for everything that is clean and pure in civic life. The standards of their profession demand from neither of these young men such sacrifices.

Complacent respectability could have easily soothed their consciences into somnolent acceptance of its decrees, and speedily prosperity would soon have guilded them successful and shining lights of the bar. By their heroism they have advanced the kingdom of the Almighty God, by setting a new pace for their fellows.

Importance of the Business Man

Time will not permit detailed illustrations from each profession. The business man's large importance demands some reference, however.

I confess I am not hardy enough to cast myself into the seething caldron of industrial problems, though I do believe that here, rather than in laymen's societies, brotherhoods and missionary enterprises, will the real contribution of the business man ultimately be found. All these named activities are good; they are skirmishes leading up to the real grappling with enemies of righteousness.

Peabody Quoted.

I will take refuge in a few quotations. One from Professor Peabody, who asks: "May it not come to pass that the solution of the social question shall be found in the principles of the Christian religion? And is it not, on the other hand, evident that the only test of the Christian religion which the modern world will regard as adequate, is its applicability to the solution of the social question?" And coming closer to the industrial problems of the business world, he says further of Maurice, another reformer, "I do not see my way further than this: Competition is put forward as a law of the universe; that is a lie." With these sentiments Professor Rauschenbusch agrees in his still more searching declaration, "Today there are few Christians who realize it is a crying wrong to hold land idle for speculation in cities where men's lungs are rotting away, overgrown with tuberculosis bacilli for lack of air; few who realize that it is a flat denial of Christianity to take advantage of the needs of your fellow-man to buy his labor cheaply or to sell him your goods dearly."

And now, like the Irishman who accidentally left the gas turned on in his shop, thoughtlessly lighted a match, blew himself into the middle of the street, and replied to a passer-by who helped him up with the question, "Are you much hurt?" "No, not mooch. But," gazing at his blazing shop, "sure I got out just in toime, didn't Oi?" I will leave this part of my subject for pleasanter themes.

The Greater Work

But I do not believe that the demands of the kingdom are to be satisfied by wasting giant strength of business men in palliating charities. To quote a German reformer, "Christianity is not satisfied with almsgiving and giving help to the helpless, but is called to contribute to the new industrial issue the forces of organization and self-help.

For the kingdom's advance the question of "How does a man make his money?" is just now of more importance than how he spends his money. He may tell the truth, lose $100,000, and do more good than by giving $1,000,000. Possibly he may save a soul for five dollars and damn two souls making that five dollars.

Whatever else is true, gentlemen, the kingdom of God is not a money-giving proposition. It can't be bought or sold. It is righteousness, joy and peace in the Holy Spirit. It spreads by contagion. Somebody must have it first, then give it. It is a fever of the soul, a zeal that eats a man up, and whenever anybody comes near him, he gets it. Now and then a case is so severe that an epidemic results from it alone.

More Than Dollars

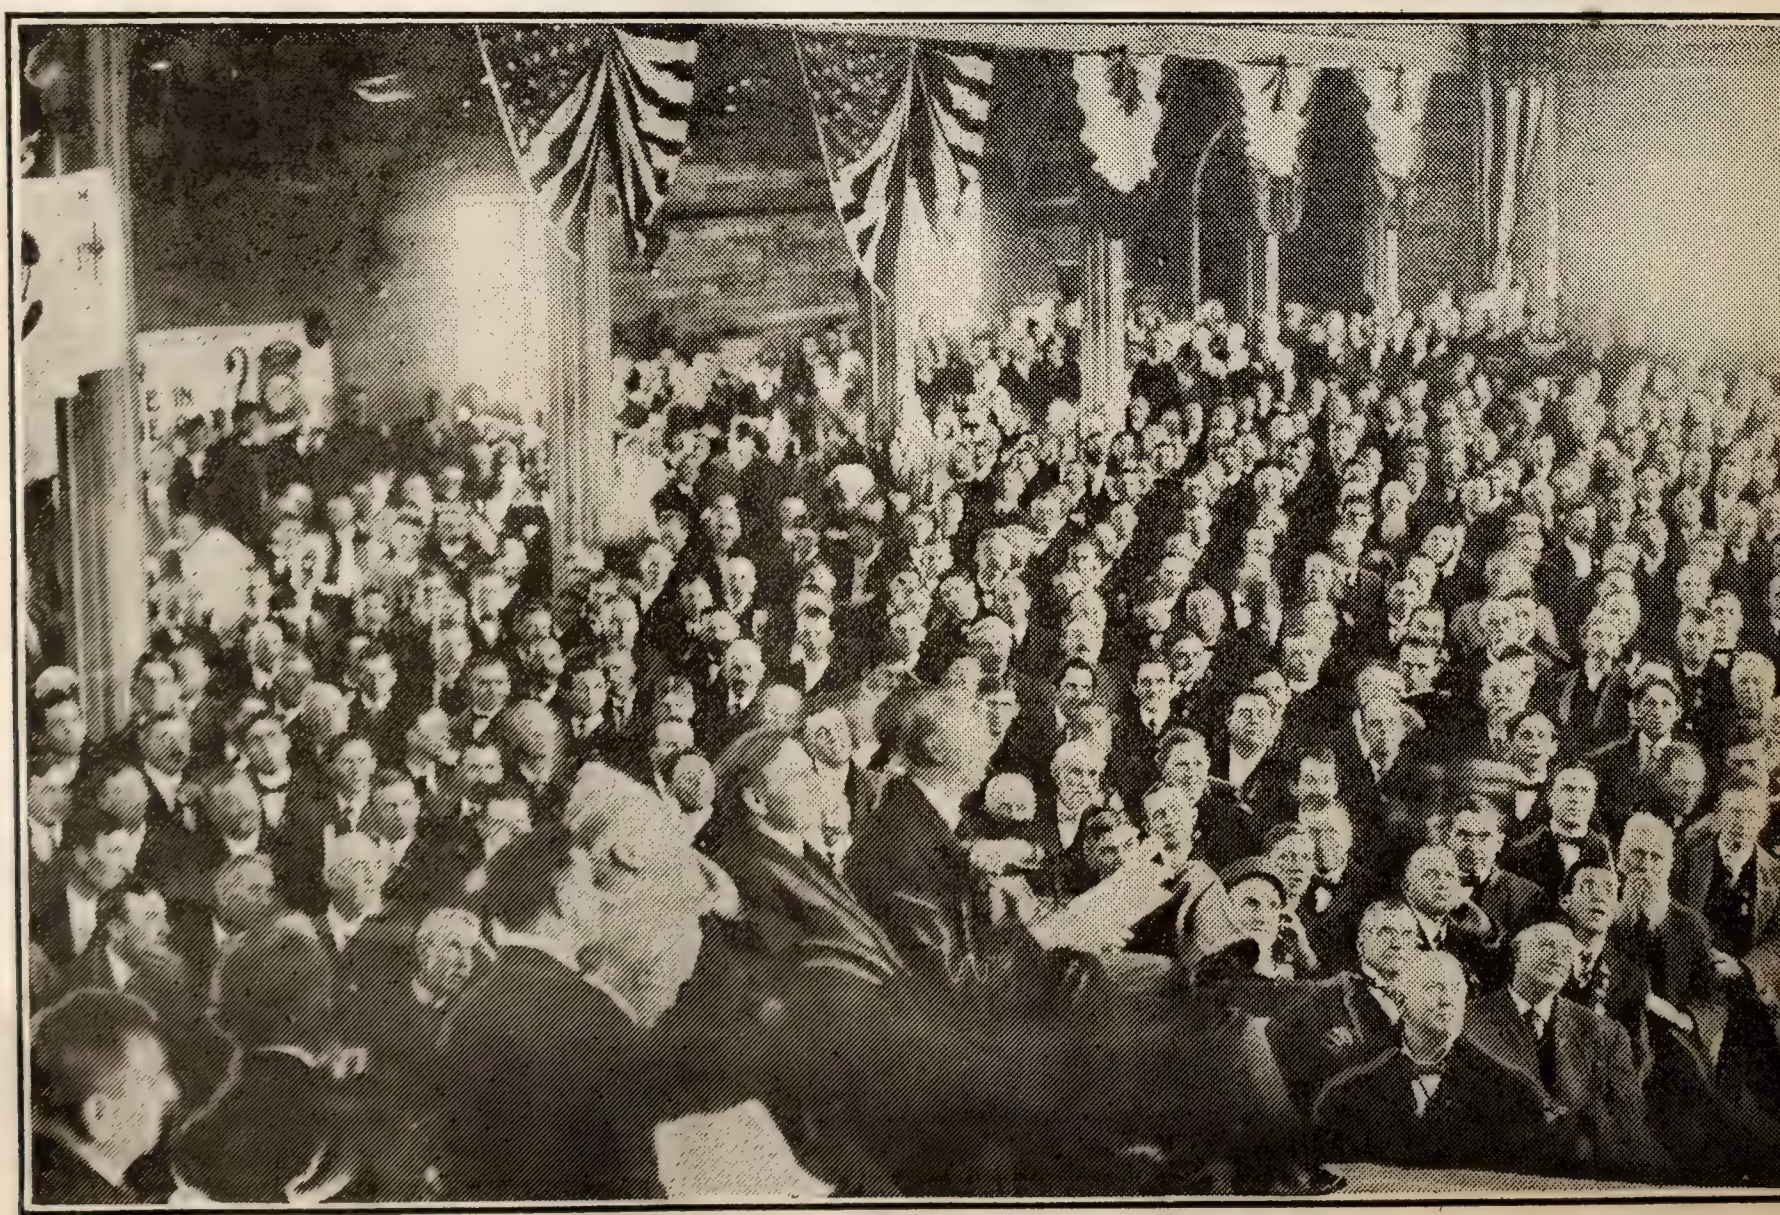
The contribution of the business man, then, is not alone his dollars, but himself; not in giving his dollars, but in making his dollars. I would like to see every business man inspired with something of that zeal for extending the kingdom which actuated Columbus in his discovery of a new world; or, something of that fiery fanaticism which changed the scattered hordes of Arabians into a mighty army and sent them over the world to take all kingdoms for Islam. I would like to see every Christian business man undertake to establish the kingdom in the business world; to substitute spiritual standards of success for material, co-operative methods for competitive, unselfish motives for selfish. Between our modern business organization and the day when savage hunters brought down some great beast, fell upon the carcass with hatchets and knives, tore off each his selected piece, fought knee-deep in gore for choice bits and finally scurried away to his hut with his booty, there is a long and glorious history of advancement. To me it seems that the future holds in store just as glorious and just as far-reaching advances in industrialism before the kingdoms of this earth become the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. In this consummation the business man can have just as vital a part as the preacher in the pulpit. To him is squarely presented the issue:

Will he ignore moral standards and spiritual values and bend all his energies toward material success?

Or, dare he play the mighty game of business according to the Golden Rule, place men above dollars, right above gain, law above power, honor above everything, and leave behind him the example of a moral pioneer?

If he dares to choose the latter, whether he dies rich or poor, counted a success or a failure, he has made his contribution to the kingdom.

The Appeal to the Minister



If the contribution of the business man, avowedly devoted to material things, shall be a higher spiritual ideal for his world, what towering demand for the extension of the spiritual kingdom shall be made of the minister, the professed apostle of unseen and eternal things?

For the sake of argument I will beg you to admit that the minister, like every other man, does not promote the kingdom of God by doing what he gets paid for. To be sober, pious, godly, learned in the Scriptures, to advise, comfort, visit the sick, bury the dead, preach two good sermons a week for forty years—all these things are matters of pay and taken for granted. Beyond these things, in whatever holy sacrifice beyond what is required by the expectation of the people, in whatever way he may endow the supererogatory of grace, in these he actually moves forward the divine work in the world.

To do this, if I had the practical power, I would organize every minister in this country into a labor union and then declare a strike. That strike would demand the right of every minister to be a man.

Minister's Course.

That means, in general, that he shall steer a course somewhere between a sympathetic old woman and a straight-laced ecclesiastic.

(By Courtesy of the Gazette-Times, Pittsburg.)

The Great Men's Meeting in Luna P

It means that he shall be free to engage in hearty, human, wholesome interests; that he refuses to be cabined, cribbed, confined within the traditions and customs of sainted platitude and pious inanity. It demands that he shall come into his birthright; enter upon his rightful, robust career, refuse to spend his time talking squawtalk to women and chucking babies under the chin.

Must Avoid Professionalism

Particularly, it means that the minister shall lay aside his professionalism. There is a vast difference between a clergyman and a man, or a business man and a man. One may be a clean, crisp new dollar-bill sort of character when you meet him in his office. The other may be a hale fellow well-met, with his feet on the porch-rail and cigar in his mouth when business hours are over. One is the man on duty; the other the man off-duty. Something like that is what is wanted in the minister. He is always on duty, always on parade. He never forgets who he is. He ought to forget it. He ought to un-stiffen, lose his oratorical voice, change his clothes, wash off the odor of sanctity, hand the universe over to the Creator, step down with the crowd, run the risk of losing his job by some supercilious critic's charge of worldliness, take the Ladies' Home Journal out of his pocket, and read the Saturday Evening Post.

The Way to Men

If he dares to do that he will come to his other right of mixing with men. That involves the art of knowing men's sins, without estranging them. That is a hard thing to do. One church overcomes it by screening off the confessor from the penitent. They can not look into each other's eyes. But the true minister, transformed by the alchemy of human love, can look his fellow-sinner in the eye, hear his pitiful strivings with overmastering passions, and still walk this earth with him as a brother. That minister has learned the secret of searching men's hearts as with fire. If he can do that, he can help men without humiliating them. The Son of God can do no more.

Daring to be a man brings with it another glory. It touches the wider and deeper, the more subtle and more dangerous forces of our nation. It grips our national ideals and gives battle even with our Zeitgeist. It engages the world-wide battle between materialism and spiritualism. The real fruitage of daring to be a man while still remaining the champion of the spiritual, breathes into all religion the virility of masculinity.

The present-day American idolizes success. Success means material possessions. A hundred cents is his standard of value, and a hundred million cents his measure of success. Conversely, spirituality means failure. Failure means weakness.

The Order of Success

Today, in the order of success comes, first, the business man with his modern methods and jungle ethics; second, his ally, the politician; third, his apologist, the corporation lawyer. These are the three great successful evils of America. After these come the failures; first, the doctor; second, the teacher; third and last, the preacher. The doctor, the teacher and the preacher are poor, and the poorest of these is the preacher. Far be it from me to make a plea for poverty in the ministry. There is no need. If I had my way, I would make the least salary of a minister $75,000 a year. Every good minister is worth at least as much to the country as the President.

But since poverty is a necessity, I'd make it a virtue. In a land where material prosperity was pointed out to men as the only road to happiness, the poverty of the man of God should enter its protest by the incomprehensible peace of poverty and the inexhaustible power of poverty. He should be at peace because he is not trying to get rich; powerful, because he is already rich beyond the dreams of avarice.

What the Minister Should Be

The representative of heaven should be a great, strong, healthy, happy, care-free soul. When he walked abroad, I'd have him be the envy of the richest man alive, the example of happiness to the poorest, the hero of the strongest. The greatest possible sermon the preacher can preach today is the manhood of himself. To me the most inspiring being on earth is the man who has sung all his days "My mind to me a kingdom is," and whose ripening soul is rich as bending orchard trees with life's best fruitage.

O man of God, thing apart, ambassador of heaven for our sakes, invested with the divine prerogative of becoming poor, that we through thy poverty might become rich, unportioned, uncrowned, unknown, thy failure a pattern for all success, standing at the apex of the centuries, be for us in our flat materialism a tower of spiritual strength!

"Like some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the plain and midway leaves the storm,
Though rolling clouds about its breast are shed,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

Let that sunshine be the same glory that touched Golgotha's shameful cross and transmitted it into the symbol for the kingdom of kingdoms. Help our dull ears to catch the echo of thine own solemn chant.

"Build thee more noble mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave the low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!"

And when thou hast lived and labored and loved, fling back to us from the eternal shore the last brave message from one who:

"When the angel of the darker Drink,
At last shall find him by the river brink,
And, offering his Cup, invite his soul
Forth from his lips to quaff—he shall not shrink."

The Brotherhood Sessions at the Centennial

Reviewing the Great Meeting in Luna Park

By P. C. Macfarlane, General Secretary

By common consent, the session of the First Annual Convention of the Brotherhood of Disciples on Tuesday afternoon and evening were among the very greatest of the great Convention. What made the Brotherhood session great was not so much the speakers as the audience. Four thousand men gathered on that wintry afternoon in Luna Park, the storm threatening without, but the sunshine of His glory playing within. The Third Regiment Band of Kansas City assisted W. N. Sparrow, of Kansas City, who led in a splendid and inspiring song service. The opening address was that of President R. A. Long, of Kansas City. It was delivered in clear, ringing tones that reached to the utmost border of that great assembly, and was noticeable for its high spiritual content, for the very wide range of appreciation of the man problem as regards the church, and for the keen and incisive grappling with each of the issues as they presented themselves to the mind of the President of the General Brotherhood. Without embarrassment, and with something of the enthusiasm of a prophet, the President's address was delivered, meeting with a hearty response from the great audience of men who listened, frequently breaking into hearty rounds of applause.

Psychologist Awakens Enthusiasm

What was, also by common consent, the most enthusiastically received address of the Brotherhood sessions was that of Arthur Holmes, of Philadelphia, Religious Work Director of the Pennsylvania Railroad Branch of the Y. M. C. A., and Professor of Psychology in the University of Pennsylvania. This address was not only punctuated with frequent applause, but at times wrought the audience to such a pitch of excitement that the entire mass arose as one man, and with waving hats and handkerchiefs and stentorian cheers, they expressed their approval of the sentiments uttered. The subject of Mr. Holmes' address was "The Christian Man's Contribution to the Kingdom," and he considered the professional man, the business man and the minister.

The Business Men's Session followed immediately, and was again marked by scenes of the greatest enthusiasm. As each speaker was introduced, the band played a few bars of some well-known martial air, continuing until the speaker had arisen and reached the platform, prepared to make his address. Senator George T. Oliver was the first speaker, and moved to the front to the stirring strains of the "Star Spangled Banner," while J. H. Allen, of St. Louis, Missouri, who came next, who has lived long in the South, walked to the front, accompanied by the opening bars of "Dixie." Other speakers in the Business Men's Session were: T. W. Phillips, of Pennsylvania; C. C. Chapman, of California; Ex-Congressman LaFayette Pence, of Oregon; E. E. Elliott, Congressman William H. Graham and Robert Campbell, grandson of Alexander Campbell.

T. W. Grafton, of Indiana, then spoke upon "The Man in the Boy." He was followed by W. F. Richardson on "The Men in the Church," and he in turn by the last speaker of the afternoon session, Walter S. Goode, of Youngstown, Ohio, who thrilled every one with a great spiritual message on "The Church Man in the World."

The Evening Sermon

The first speaker in the evening was Rev. Charles M. Watson, pastor of the First Baptist Church at Arlington, a suburb of Boston, whose theme was "The Christian Man and Education."

He was followed by Stephen J. Corey, of Cincinnati, who spoke upon the topic "The Brotherhood and the Challenge of World Conquest."

The last address at the Brotherhood sessions, which was to set the whole effect of afternoon and evening in a spirit of entire consecration to Jesus Christ, was delivered by Robert Johnston, D. D., pastor of the American Presbyterian Church of Montreal, Canada, a familiar figure on International platforms, and one of the best known Canadians on this side of the line. He stands some six feet and a half tall, and, with his flashing black eyes and trim black beard, suggests to the imaginative thought an escaped Highland Chieftain, more than a clergyman of the established order. He demonstrated that there was Celtic blood in his veins by the keen play of his jovial humor and the exceedingly engaging compliments which he paid to his audience. The audience in turn, however, enjoyed a most hearty laugh at the doctor's expense, when, the various preliminaries of his introduction and his international greetings having been discharged, he solemnly approached his theme and found himself utterly unable to remember it. A ripple of laughter in front grew into a storm that swept to and fro over the house as the gentleman dived frantically in his vest pocket to find out what he was really going to talk about after all. He appeared to enjoy the joke upon himself as much as any one, however, and, recovering him theme, which was "The Aroused Manhood of the Church of Christ in America," addressed himself to it in one of the most eloquent and inspiring sermons ever delivered upon a convention platform.

Personal Devotion to a Person

The keynote of his address was that "A great movement could find its inspiring motive only in a personal devotion to a person, and in the case of the church that person must be the living, reigning Lord." "Our call," he said, "is not a call to arms, but a call to carry into life, as we know it today, into commerce, into athletics, into municipal and political government, the life and spirit of Jesus Christ. To enthrone Him as Lord of all life, must be the passion of our lives, and to place upon His brow the crown of all the Kingdoms of the earth."

In closing, Dr. Johnston spoke of the pleasure with which he had seen the people responding to the martial notes of their own anthem, told how he, himself, loved to sing "God Save the King," but how much more he loved to sing the grandest of coronation hymns that had for the object of its worship our Savior, Jesus Christ. He then called upon the audience to stand with him with uplifted right hand and join in the singing of "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name." To see the men in thousands standing, to see the strong right hands lifted high toward Heaven, to catch the measured movement of those hands in rhythmic response to the throbbing emotions in their breasts, while with lusty yet trembling tones they chorused their joyful and devotional tribute to Him who had been given a name above every name, was a sight of the most inspiring kind. It was a vision and an experience that must linger forever in the memory of every man whom God was good enough to permit to be there.

With the measured cadences of the Lord's Prayer sounding from the hearts of these deep-throated men, the First Annual Convention of the Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ came to an end.

IMPRESSIONS OF CENTENNIAL CONVENTION.

By Alva W. Taylor.

The things that impressed me most were:

The enthusiasm of our people for the cause,

The marvelous growth of the century,

The good natured tolerance of differing opinions,

The consistent note sounded on our plea for union,

The missionary zeal of the thousands who represent leadership in the churches at home.

The great outpouring was itself a testimony to the enthusiasm of the brethren. They were enthusiastic before they came or they would not have come in such numbers and from such distances.

The greatness of the brotherhood was deeply impressed upon us. While we celebrated the hundredth anniversary of the first note sounded for the work to which we are set, we must remember that the real anniversary of organized work will not come for two decades yet. It is doubtful if any religious movement in christendom has grown so rapidly.

There we met face to face and learned that in the warm hand grasp and the communion of hearts the like faith is everything, the differing opinions little. Of course some cried out in tones that did not sound so brotherly but the great dominant note was true to our motto: "In faith unity, in opinions liberty."

Nearly every one who spoke boasted not but pleaded that we live up to our plea for union by practicing it. The dominant note in the Declaration and Address was not missed.

Greatest of all was the zeal for the cause that is above all others—That Christ might be preached unto the uttermost.—That we may be one that the world may believe in him.

THE FINDING OF CAMILLA

By Lucie E. Jackson, author of "Feadora's Failure," "For Muriel's Sake." Copyright, Ward Lock & Co., London.

CHAPTER XXX.

At that moment Brian Falconer walked in through the open French window followed by Algy, who was waving another letter in his hand.

"Good news!" he cried. "Good news! Camilla is found. Hip, hip, hurrah!"

Brian Falconer gave the Squire's hand a hearty shake; "Why, father," he said, "you look ten years younger. And as for mother ——!" The kiss he gave her told how full his heart felt for her joy that morning.

"Hasn't a letter been sent to Anita, too?" asked Algy. "Guy seems very lavish with them. He would surely not leave Anita out in the cold. Poor Anita! And oh! still poorer Mr. Bartoletti. I believe that it is my lucky halfpenny that has worsted him."

"No, it is God's merciful Hand," murmured Granny softly.

How the hours dragged till Tuesday arrived! To the Squire and his wife they seemed weighted with leaden feet. Before three o'clock arrived, they had started for the appointed meeting place, walking slowly through the plantation, so rich now with summer verdure and summer flowers.

On the lower side of the plantation a little group could be seen slowly advancing, and Squire Falconer, with his wife on his arm, stopped, and looked keenly at the party through his gold-rimmed glasses.

What a picturesque procession it made with the old green trees forming a canopy overhead, through which peeps of the blue sky could be seen, with here and there a golden sunbeam glinting through the branches.

First there came a big white poodle dog, walking with a majestic air as if heralding their approach; next, followed a goat, gaily decked with ribbons, with trappings that shone like silver, drawing a dainty little carriage in which sat the sweetest fairy that ever gladdened the hearts of grandparents; and on either side, as if guarding the carriage, walked a smaller dog, keeping step to the goat's slow pace.

In the rear came Pierre with his hat in his hand, and Taras peeping at the newcomers from out of his coat. And Guy was walking by him with a smile of radiant pleasure upon his face.

"My child! My Rexington's own little Camilla!" burst from Mrs. Falconer's trembling lips as she hurried forward.

And then suddenly the whole procession stopped as if by magic, and Camilla stepped out of the carriage, and was clasped in her grandmother's arms.

"It is my Camilla? It is my son's own little girl, is it not?" she cried again, the tears raining fast down her cheeks.

"Yes, Granny, it is she," said Guy coming forward. "This is the little cousin whom we thought was lost to us. And this," laying his hand on the Frenchman's shoulder, "is Pierre Gascon, as good a fellow as ever stepped, into whose care Uncle Rexington gave Camilla. Later on he will tell you himself how it was that Camilla was not given up to you before, and when you know all you will say with me that a finer fellow never lived than this good Frenchman!"

Poor Pierre! he was still very weak, and his knees trembled under him as he bent low before the Squire and his wife. Words did not come as easily as usual to him. It was hard to stand there with so many questioning eyes fixed upon him, so hard to vindicate himself and satisfy them all of his straightfordwardness. He had not thought it could be so hard.

But whilst he stood tongue-tied, a fragile little hand stole into his, and at the touch the words came with a rush.

"Monsieur and Madame, I have much to tell, much to explain. Not one little instant would I have detained la petite Mademoiselle, had it been possible. My one wish through all our troubles has been to place her in your hands, where I know Monsieur Rexington Falconer wished her to be."

"It is a long story, Granny, and you must hear it all by degrees," put in Guy. "But this thing you must know now, that not for one second has Pierre abused the trust which my uncle placed in him."

"I well believe it," cried the old lady, taking Pierre's hand in both her own. "I well believe it."

"And if further proof were needed, we have it in our grandchild's affection for you," said Squire Falconer in a husky voice, pointing to where Camilla stood with one hand clinging to the Frenchman's arm. "Come, wife, come Brian, come Algy, shake hands with Camilla's friend, and bid him welcome among us. How we shall ever thank him sufficiently for his care of our child, I know not."

CHAPTER XXXI.

The End.

For the remainder of the summer and the whole of the next winter Pierre lived at the lodge as the Squire's guest. Camilla would not hear of being parted from him, and the Frenchman was glad to rest quietly, for his strength seemed slow in returning.

But with the first breath of spring, Pierre began to stir. He had been a wanderer for too many years to enjoy now a life of quiet monotony. Moreover, Squire Falconer had so far removed the uncertainties of his profession by making him a handsome provision for life, thereby enabling him to become independent of the bounty of a fickle public.

But it was only after extracting a promise that Camilla consented to his going. It was arranged that a goodly portion of every year should be spent by Pierre and his troupe at the lodge at Rosslyn Towers, and with that promise he was allowed to go.

Every Christmas there comes a gift addressed to Camilla in an unknown hand, and the only sign that tells of the sender are the words and the initials written in a corner on the outside wrappings:

"With all good wishes from R. D."

And Camilla's grandparents are happy in the knowledge that Roger Densham's kindness to their son's child has taken away for ever the sting that his name once held for them.

To all that showed kindness to their grandchild in her wanderings the Squire and his wife were very grateful, and one morning Mr. Josiah Brown and his son became the proud possessors of a silver watch each, whilst Mrs. Josiah was made happy by the gift of a side of bacon and a black silk dress.

And as for the good innkeeper and his wife at Deal, you may be sure they were not forgotten.

Mr. Bartoletti never cared so much for Devonshire after Camilla had come to live there. He and Anita began to take long journeys on the Continent, till at last they absented themselves altogether, and made their home in Italy.

Camilla is very happy, and makes the lives of her grandparents all the brighter for her presence. And perhaps, as years go on, and Jacques grows old, and Chicot and Taras become less nimble, the one wish of her heart will be realized—that Pierre may be more willing to seek a permanent resting place beside the gates of that beautiful home where lives the child that had once been so carefully shielded by himself.

The Child in the Midst

When the Lord of the great and the little,
The potter whose hand shapes our clay,
Sets a child in the midst of the market
Where the world-peoples chaffer all day,
Sets a child with its innocent questions,
Its flower-face dimpled and fine,
In the very heart's core of the clamor
A thought of the Maker Divine:—

And men, in their lust for dominion,
Their madness for silver and gold,
Crush the beauty and charm from that spirit,
Make the flower-face withered and old,
Bind the hands and the feet with a tether
That childhood can never untie,
Deem not that Jehovah unheeding
Looks down from the heights of the sky.

From the mine where the midnight engulfs it,
From the mill where the clogged air is thick
With the dust of the weaving that chokes it;
From the home, where it's fevered and sick
With man's toil, when God meant it for gladness,
The child in the midst in our clay
God-moulded, reed-marred, calls to heaven
For the vengeance we're daring, this day.

Boys and Mothers

"Let's go up to the hill for nuts."

"Yes—let's."

"You come, too, Cliff," as one boy worked himself out of the small crowd just let loose from the country schoolhouse and went out of the yard.

"No, I can't." "Why not? We'll have lots of fun."

"I'd like to." Cliff cast a longing look up the hill shining with the scarlet and gold of autumn. Very well he knew the fun of hearing the brown nuts rattle down an accompaniment to the shouts of merry boys.

"Come on, then." For a moment Cliff wavered, then braced up.

"No," he said. "My mother'll be looking out for me. She always feels a little afraid about the bridge, and if I'm not home just at the time she gets frightened."

"Pshaw!" cried Tom Barnes, with a sniff. "As if I'd be tied to my mother as you are. I can't go up the hill 'cause my foot hasn't got over the sprain, and it hurts. , But if I could, I'd go, mother or no mother." Cliff was angry, and cast about for something sharp enough to say.

"Perhaps I would if I had such a mother as yours." "What's that?" cried Tom, flaming up. "I say," answered Cliff, delighted at seeing the effect of his words, "that if I had such a mother as yours I suppose I'd do just as you do. But I haven't such a one. I wouldn't have a mother that wasn't worth minding."

Cliff had multiplied his words, flinging them out with more and more relish at Tom's anger. He now turned and ran away with a laugh.

With a shriek of rage Tom started to follow him, but was soon forced by the pain in his foot to stop. As he continued to shout his anger after the enemy, the teacher came from the schoolhouse and went toward him. The other boys were by this time beyond hearing.

"Did you hear him, Miss Morse? Did you hear what he said? I'll thrash him tomorrow," doubling his fists up, "till he takes every word of it back. And won't you punish him too?"

"Well, I don't know," said Miss Morse, drawing the boy to a step and sitting down beside him. "What did he say?"

"He said—why, he said," said Tom, in his excitement not really remembering what had been said, "he said that my mother wasn't a good woman." "I didn't hear that, and I could hear all through the open window."

"Well, he said he wouldn't—wouldn't—like to have a mother like mine.

"Not exactly that, either. I heard him say he wouldn't have a mother that was not worth minding. And I don't know, Tom, but I agree with him. I shouldn't like that kind myself." "And who says my mother isn't worth minding?" said Tom, bristling again. "Well, don't you?" "No. I never said such a thing in my life." "See here, Tom," Miss Morse smoothed the boy's hair and fanned his hot face with his hat, "don't you ever stop to think that there are different ways of saying things—that our actions speak as loudly as our words? More loudly, I should say, for we can say what is not true, but what we do shows really what we are and what we think. Now, how does anybody know your mother is worth obeying? Do they learn it from you?"

Tom stared for a moment at his teacher, then gave a low whistle. She sat in silence while one new thought after another crowded upon his mind.

How did anybody know it anyhow? Tom had never really intended to be undutiful to his gentle little mother, who indulged him far more than was good for him. Now he recalled the morning chores she asked of him. If he felt like doing them they were done, but more often they were left for someone else. If there was nothing "up" among the boys after school he heeded her mildly expressed wish that he should come home promptly; otherwise he stayed out as long as he pleased. No, certainly, nobody would know from him that his mother was worth obeying. "I don't know Cliff's mother," went on Miss Morse, "because I haven't been here very long, but I feel sure from what I have seen of Cliff that she must be a good woman. When you see a boy ready to think of his mother, anxious to keep her from anxiety, willing to give up a pleasure rather than run the risk of distressing her, I can give a pretty good guess what she must be." Tom colored deeply. "My mother's good," he growled, under his breath.

"I haven't a doubt of it, my boy. But how are people to know it through you, unless you are? People will judge her by you. If you do not nonor her by obedience, how can you wonder at their thinking that, as Cliff expressed it, she is not worth minding?"

"But she is," exclaimed Tom, firing up again. "I wish more boys would remember," said Miss Morse, gently, after another little pause, "what joy and comfort they can be to their mothers if they will. And, oh, that they would remember it while they have time! There must come a time, you know, when their voices will be hushed. Our words can not reach them when the sod is between them and us, no matter how we ache to tell them how much we did love them, in spite of all our careless ways.

"And I think those of us whose mothers are mild and quiet not sharp and loud, but low-voiced in their way of letting us know what they want of us—we ought to feel special tenderness for them—don't you?"

"Yes'm, I do," said Tom, getting up, "Good-by."

"Why, Tommy, you're home so early," said his mother, looing up with a pleased smile as he entered the room at home. Tom liked the smile, it was so different from the troubled look with which she usually met his home-comings. "Yes—'cause," he began, in the embarrassment of the new feeling which he did not like to show, "my foot hurt—and—say, mother," with a burst, "I'm coming home when you want me to. Every time."

"Are you dear. Well, that will be a great comfort to mother." She looked after him as she went to do some small duties neglected for days, and there was a mist in her eyes along with the smile, as she thought: "The dear boy will forget it all before long. But it's good to have him think it."

Cliff arriving home, found the house quiet and his mother away. It was disappointing and he growled a little.

"There, now! I might have stayed with the boys as well at not."

And the feeling stayed with him as the lonely evening dragged on, and she did not come home until late. But the last of it went out of his heart when she said: "My good boy! I had to go to your aunt, who is ill. But I should not have had an easy moment if I had not felt sure you would be at home just when I expected you."

Tom did not offer Cliff the threatened thrashing. Indeed, it seemed from that day on to take so much of his time and energy to show that his mother was as well worth minding as Cliff's mother, as to have little opportunity for quarreling with anybody.—Southern Presbyterian.

The Conquerors

"Captain, but the heights are steep!"
Follow, follow where I lead.
"Captain, see! The shadows creep."
There is light for every need.

"Captain, but the way is long!"
We must win the battlements.
"Captain, see the hosts that throng!"
Near them we must pitch our tents.

"Captain, I am sick and worn!"
Courage! we must win the fight.
"I must rest until the morn."
We must struggle through the night.

"Captain, see the blood we spill."
Yes, 'tis blood to right the wrong.
See, we press them up the hill,
Soon to hear the victor's song.

"Yea, but I am wounded sore,
See the life blood ebbing fast!
Captain, I can fight no more."
Lo, the battlements are passed.

In Autumn Days

MRS. FRANK A. BRECK.

The Lord walked in the autumn wood,
The birds their music hushed;
The tamarack felt his presence good,
The maple branches blushed.
Yon tardy dandelion fair,
That smiles upon the sod,
Conscious of holy presence there,
Waked at the kiss of God.
His message caught on every breeze,
Goes forth to vale and hill;
And forests singing jubilees,
With answering glories thrill,
Oh, take thy shoes from off thy feet—
'Tis holy ground ye tread;
In "burning bush" the Lord ye meet—
Bend low and bare thy head.

All Hallow E'en

BY CLARA J. DENTON.

November first is a church day called "All Saint's Day," and from this fact the last evening of October takes its name, although in actual deed it is not, as we all know, "a holy eve."

The service on "All Saint's Day" is a solemn, religious one, and it seems very unfitting that the evening before should be given over to the wild senseless practices with which we are all familiar.

The custom of keeping the night of October 31, however, came to us from the Druids. You will remember they were heathen priests, who taught their strange religion to the ancient people living in Great Britian, in certain parts of France and in Germany, and who were called Celts. Do not think, though, that the wild lawlessness of this day came from the Druids; on the contrary, they kept it as a solemn religious festival.

It was a part of their worship to light, three times a year, great bonfires in honor of the sun, which they worshiped. They lighted one on May 1, in order that there might be a good time for seed planting, another on June 21, the summer solstice, in order that every thing might ripen well, another on October 31, that all the crops might be safely harvested. The fire lighting on the last named date, being the final one of the year, was made a very solemn ceremony.

In those days, in all parts of the country, were built cairns or large mounds of stones. On top of each one of these, was a sacred fire which was kept constantly burning until the night of October 31, when it was put out. The people of those days had not learned the art of kindling fire quickly, therefore, fire seemed to them a mysterious and holy thing.

On the evening of October 31, the priests, clad in long, white robes, gathered around the sacred cairns, while the people waited near in solemn silence; the priests prayed, and, then, at the proper monment, they quenched the sacred fire. As soon as the fire was all out, not a spark remaining, the priests set about kindling a new fire, while the people waited in breathless expectancy. Can you not imagine their uneasiness? What if the priests snould fail to ignite the fire again? Is it strange that as soon as the light gleamed up in the darkness the people sent up a great shout? They believed themselves then safe from harm for another year, and, as other fires gleamed up from the surrounding hilltops they rejoiced again and again, over the safety and prosperity of their neighbors.

When the solemn service was over, the people scattered to their homes, each head of a family, taking some of the sacred coals with him to kindle the fire on his own hearthstone, for he had carefully put out his home fire before going to the festival. By kindling the flames anew in this way from those kindled and blessed by the priests, they were supposed to turn aside from themselves and their families, all evil and harm of every kind.

When the Celts embraced the Christian religion they were unwilling to give up their ceremonies of fire-lighting. This is not strange, for there is certainly a witchery about a night bonfire, which we never outgrow. The church saw this, and so, to turn the thoughts of the people away from the sun worship, they made November 1, into the Christian day called "All Saint's Day."

Just when and how the custom arose of playing tricks on the eve of this day, no one seems to know. It is probable, however, that it came from the superstition that ghosts and witches would be abroad on the eve of the day set apart for the dead.

The custom of serving fruits and nuts at this time is borrowed from the Romans. They kept on the first of November, a festival to Pomona, their goddess of fruits and nuts. She was said to be very careful of her treasures, and was believed to keep her orchards locked. Just how she managed to lock up an orchard, the story does not explain. To win her favor, therefore, so that she would unlock her stores to poor mortals, they made this feast to her once every year.

You will see, I am sure, that the keeping of this eve is a strange mixture of many old customs.

After all, it is a great change from the solemn service of the Druids,, even though they were full of wrong ideas, to the wild rowdyism of the present day Hallowe'en.

The true spirit of this time should be hospitality, good fellowship, and harmless merriment which makes no one sad or uncomfortable.

THE MISSING LINK.

A lawyer having offices in a large office building recently lost a cuff-link, one of a pair that he greatly prized. Being absolutely certain that he had dropped the link somewhere in the building he posted this notice:

"Lost. A gold cuff-link. The owner, William Ward, will deeply appreciate its immediate return."

That afternoon, on passing the door whereon this notice was posted, what were the feelings of the lawyer to observe that appended thereto were these lines:

"The finder of the missing cuff-link would deem it a great favor if the owner would kindly lose the other link."

Paul's Apologia*

The church at Corinth was one of the most vibrant and volatile with which the Apostle Paul had to deal. It was like the city in which it was located—full of conflicting emotions and purposes, never very steadfast, very proud of its attainments, especially of its wisdom, and without deep convictions upon the essential principles of conduct. The two epistles which have survived to us, addressed to the church at Corinth are only a part of Paul's correspondence with it. These two epistles refer to two others, and perhaps there may have been still further correspondence which has neither survived nor been mentioned. But the two epistles show to us the kind of Christians with which Paul had to deal. There were many of them who were not at all steadfast in the new faith, and their tendency to waver in conduct was increased by those Jewish enemies of the apostle's who both in and out of the church spared no efforts to discredit and to impugn his motives.

The Divided Church.

The church in Corinth was divided into several factions, and the first object of the apostle in writing the earlier of the two letters that we now possess was to reprove the disciples there for their factional and discordant conduct. There were friends of his own who insisted that they belonged to Paul. Others were partisans of Apolos, the young preacher whom Paul and his friends at Ephesus had sent to minister to the church. Still others insisted that only Peter (Cephas) could be accepted as the valid interpreter of Jesus, while the fourth party, perhaps as sectarian as any of the others, insisted that they would have no human leaders, but bear solely the name of Christ.

This latter was an admirable platform, but unforunately the conduct of this party in the church was at great variance with its pretentions to entire obedience to the Lord.

Paul's Defence of his Work.

For, if we are able to judge from all the indications of the two epistles we now have, it was the so-called Christian party in the church at Corinth which made Paul's work so difficult. In fact the second epistle is almost wholly devoted to a vindication by Paul of his apostolic right to teach and minister in the name of Jesus. His enemies in the church were speaking of him constantly with disrespect and hatred. They charged that he was no apostle, that he had no authority form Jesus, that his work among the churches was selfish and only performed to promote his own advantage, and secure to him financial suport. It seems pathetic beyond words that the great apostle, whose message and influence have been so profoundly effective in Christian history, should have had to defend himself from a body of obstructionists who understood neither him nor the Master he preached. Yet the undertone of the entire second epistle, which might well be called, "Apologia pro vita mea." was a defense of his work as an Apostle.

The portion of II. Corinthians included in our lesons is one of the most pathetic of all Paul's writings. Stung by the reproaches of his enemies that he had only used the gospel as a cloak for self-preferment and advantage, he breaks the long silence of his life regarding himself and puts down in a few passionate and headlong sentences a picture of hardship and sacrifice so thrilling and convincing that the centuries of Christian believers have bowed their heads over it in shame that any evil tongues could have spoken against his life, and that Paul should ever have to defend himself before such tribunals.

The apostle, in taking up this matter, intimates that he is filled with a sense of self-abasement that he is compelled to refer to his own work for Christ. He says he knows he is speaking only foolishly, and that men might call it boasting, but if his conduct is to be measured in terms of suffering for the cross, he must put himself on record as one who has not shunned, but fully met all and more than all requirements. With delicate irony he bids them bear with one who is foolish, being wise themselves. But since they are boasting of their standing as Jews and Christians, he is compeled to resort to the same distasteful method. And then folows a catalogue of his claims. He says that he is a Jew as truly as any of them. From the very innermost circle of the Jewish faith he came to be the advocate of Christ. If any one claims to have been active in Christian work, Paul can show a more competent record. Who has labored so constantly? Who suffered more in prison? Who borne more stripes? Who run more frequently the risk of death?

"The Marks of the Lord Jesus."

Five times he was beaten in the Jewish synagogue with the prescribed 39 lashings. Three times was he scourged by the awful Roman method, which not infrequently left its victims dead. Three times over he had been shipwrecked, and this, it must be remembered, was written before Paul's memorable voyage to Rome. A day and a night he had drifted about on the deep in some perilous form of shipwreck. Then there were his long and tiresome journeys, the dangers in fording rivers, the dangers in travelling on roads frequented by brigands, the dangers from his own Jewish country-men who deemed him an apostate, the dangers encountered from the non-Jews who despised him as a member of the hated race, the perils of the city, the perils of the Arabian wilderness in which he had passed months of preparation, the perils of false-hearted Christians who hated him and sought his undoing, the labors which were constant, the sleepless nights, which were many, the hunger and thirst necesitated by the exposures of his ministry, the physical sufferings of heat and cold to which he was no stranger.

The Care of all the Churches.

But, beyond these there was also the daily pressure of anxiety which came from responsibility for the churches, and how many there were who claimed his attention! Hardly had he left one city to evangelize in another before messengers or messages warned him that dangers had already sprung up among those he had left. Perhaps persecution had terrified the disciples, and the structure of Christian faith was about to be overthrown. These were the tragedies that made up the life of an apostle. And as if to give one instance more humiliating and distressing than any other that had happened, Paul closes the list with the record of his ignominious departure from the city of Damascus, to which he had come in the glory of his official authority only to find that his aceptance of the Christian faith had reversed all his fortunes and he was compelled to find safety by the hazardous and pitiful method of being let down from a window in a basket.

The Glorious Side.

In contrast with all this, the section of the lesson contained in the twelfth chapter deals with the glorious experiences which Paul had enjoyed as a Christian. Many years before, when he was in Lystra, he had been stoned by the Jews, and yet at that very moment when he hardly knew whether he was in the body or out of it, it seemed as if he were called up into heaven and heard unutterable mysteries and known such glories as that ever since his soul had been flooded with the vision. Probably such experiences of happiness in Christian service had been more than once, and in the joy of such a life he ever had lived, even overcoming that physical weakness and distress which he calls his "thorn in the flesh, and of whose nature we can only surmise. Was it some form of partial blindness? Was it epilepsy? Was it the recurrence of periods of weakness and fainting? We do not know. Many conjectures have been offered, but none that satisfy our curiosity. Above all these defects Paul rose supreme in the glory of his Christian faith, and in the consciousness of the ever-living Christ with whom and for whom his life was spent.

The Grass

Around the world once more your banners sweep,
O thou triumphant legion of the grass!
You shake the hill and valley as you pass;
Across the rivers and the seas you leap.
The music of your marching wakes from sleep
The forest and the field and the morass
And in thy fragrant train, a starry mass,
The blossoms all like constellations creep.

What power is thine, O army of sweet peace!
To you at last all victories belong;
All battlefields are thine beneath the sun;
To every sorrow thou dost bring surcease.
What vanquished empire but hath heard thy song?
Answer, O Egypt; answer Babylon.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

THE MORNING FACE.

Topic, Nov. 10. Psalm 3:5, 6.

The third Psalm is a prayer of one whose enemies are many and active. His ruin seems certain. The enemies are exulting over their coming victory. But God is more real to the Psalmist than his dangers. Many may say that there is no help for him from God, but he knows God will help him. In quiet confidence he lies down to sleep and his heavenly Guardian protects him during the darkness. In the morning he utters his prayer of trust and is ready for what the day may bring. The very dangers and difficulties by which he is beset serve but to strengthen his faith. The dawning of the day is for him the coming of opportunity. While others are dreading possible wounds and death, he is rejoicing in his fellowship with God. Feeling that it is enough for him to be a co-worker with God, he can submit to inconvenience and hardship without murmuring.

A Revelation of Character.

The morning face reveals what sort of man wears it. The fearful and unbelieving show in their faces indecision and cowardice. Peevishness exhibits littleness of soul. The gloomy face is evidence of a fundamental defect in character. The cynic cannot hide his deep seated contempt for moral worth. The hateful activity of the meddler begins early in the morning and disturbs the peace of the first meal of the day. The folly of the fool appears the moment he awakes. On the other hand, the rich and deep experience of the wise man is at the service of the first human being he meets in the morning. He sleeps to be refreshed for useful activity. His eye is clear and his mental powers are vigorous because he knows how to rest. He has not been kept awake and restless by envy and wrath. He left the results of his work to God when he retired to sleep. He avoids dissipation that injures health and temper. He counts it a sin to be fretful and inefficient as a result of indulgence. Hence his morning cheerfulness is a part of his real life. It is not something assumed to cover malice or designing selfishness.

A Prophecy of the Day.

To begin the day in a doubting mood is to invite defeat. The task that frightens us will prove too much for us. If we begin the day with the feeling that our friends will overlook us or deal harshly with us we shall probably have occasion to blame some one for indifference or hostility. If, however, we give the world friendly greeting, if our faces speak of good will and a disposition to share the common lot, we shall get the best the world has for us. We may do in a fashion some of the coarse work of life in spite of distrust and envy; the great and fine work of building character is done by those who go joyously to meet their obligations. It is a sorry day for family virtue when the husband snarls at the breakfast table and the wife voices her conviction that all is vanity and vexation of spirit. One may become cheerful and hopeful in defiance of a wrong start, but why should he have the wrong start? The ugly morning face is usually a bad habit. Bad training or no training in childhood is probably responsible for it. It is not a sign of good sense that men sometimes take pride in this bad habit. If they stopped to consider its effect on the experiences of the day, they would regard it with horror and fight it with the desperation of men fighting for their lives.

A Social Asset.

Elaborate plans for the welfare of those whom we love are less important than the attitude we take toward success and failure. What story does yesterday's experience write on our faces? Has money gained increased the sense of responsibility or has it created a disregard for law and right? Has financial failure driven the man to despair or has it enabled him to realize the supreme value of pure affection and of simple faith in God? As long as bodily and mental health remain it is possible for men to be courageous and cheerful. Weakness of body need not be accompanied by fault-finding feebleness of spirit. The ability to begin the day with hope gives a man power among his fellows. Faith, hope, and love are the three eternities of the gospel of Jesus. The day that begins with them will end in blessing.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

TOPIC FOR NOVEMBER 14.

Pilgrim's Progress Series. XI. Beulah Land.
Isa. 62:3-5.

Beulah Land is the place for rejoicing and the gathering of new courage, for victory is in sight. In this land the "air was very sweet and pleasant." Every day the "flowers smiled in their beauty and ladened the atmosphere with their fragrance." "The singing of birds" and "the voice of the turtle" were heard in the land. Those who had journeyed thus far, left the Valley of the Shadow of Death, Vanity Fair, Giant Despair, Doubting Castle, and the Enchanted Ground, all in the rear. The traveller there experienced the joy which comes to the one who sees the goal as he approaches the end of a long, rugged and dangerous journey. Here he can relax a little. He is so thankful that the end is near. He could not have endured much longer.

A Topic for Youth?

At first thought one would hardly select this as a lesson for the young. Youth is so ambitious, so confident, so expectant, and so eager, it does not care to think of the end of life. It rather yearns for the conflict in life, confident of victory. The youth leaps to his feet at the sounding of the bugle, and martial music thrills him to his finger tips, but the stories around the old campfires hardly appeal to him yet. But as a matter of fact, do we not need just such a lesson as this? Early in our lives we should look to the very end of life, if possible. This calls for an imagination which all do not possess in high degree. But Bunyan's fertile imagination is able to transport us, as it were, and set us down at the consummation of a righteous purpose, that we may anticipate something of the joy of a life well spent.

A Topic for Our Time

If our lives be prompted by good and holy impulses, as the lives of all true Christians are, such a work as Bunyan's will give us a goal toward which to work. In this day, when the temptation to worship the god of pleasure was never so strong; in a generation which is notoriously frivolous and giddy, in a time when the joy of physical thrill tends to close our eyes to moral ideals and to stop our ears against all spiritual appeal, such a service cannot readily be overestimated. Oh, that this young life of America might be anchored to a serious and righteous purpose! One need study only the nature of the amusements of today, as presented by the cheap theaters (they are in every village) and the amusement parks and gardens, and observe the almost incredible percentage of the American youth which patronize them, to have forced upon him the conviction that they are on life's high seas with neither chart nor compass. We do well, then, in the very morning of life to look far into the dusky shades of evening to see the goal we seek, and anticipate the joyous success of fidelity to a righteous cause.

The Way of Escape

To do so is to be spared many sorrows, to escape many snares, and to avoid many pitfalls. It was probably that hazy, hurried glance at the Celestial City which Christian and Hopeful gained from the Delectable Mountains that saved them from utter ruin by the way. We cannot glance over a daily paper from any city that we do not see where some young person to whom the city and its ways are strange, is spotted and trapped because he did not know definitely where he was going nor the way. And who would deny that this is a parallel of our life's work on a large scale? Examples all too numerous come within the range of our own observation of young men and women who, with no moral purposes or spiritual ideals, have, by chance, fallen in with companions of loose morals and have drifted from bad to worse until their lives are shipwrecked. The young person who takes seriously his moral ideals and chooses his companions to fit into them rather than to make his morality to conform with the crowd he chances to meet, will reach his Beulah Land and rejoice in his victory.

Our Flitting Moods

We are all seized with good impulses at times. Yes, we even resolve that we will strive to reach high ends. But impulses pass and the resolutions so lightly formed soon appear to have weight, their demands and restraints then even become burdensome, and finally they seem intolerable. Christian also had an impulse and resolved to go to the Celestial City. He arrived in Beulah Land and was in sight of his goal. But between his resolution and success there were disappointments and sorrows, heartaches and tragedies. He left family and friends; he faced lions on the way; he fought with Apollyon; he passed through the Valley of the Shadow of Death; he withstood the ridicule of evil doers, and saw innocent Faithful go to his death. All these make up the price of forming and keeping a good resolution. But he did not feel that he gave too much. He rejoiced that he was true. We also must have a goal and we must resolve to reach it, but, like Christian, we must pay the price in sacrifice and self-denial, in moral heroism and whole-hearted service.

A Sunset Song

Fade not yet, O summer day,
For my love has answered "Yea."
Keep us from the coming Night,
Lest our blossom suffer blight.

"Fear you not: if love be true,
Closer will it cleave to you;
'Tis the darkened hours that prove Faith or faithlessness in love."

—John B. Tabb, in Harper's Magazine.

Church Life

The editors of the Christian Century have received many letters commending especially some of the recent issues of the paper.

The offerings for state missions now claim the attention of the churches. These first offerings of the new century should accord with the high resolve of the Centennial convention.

Several of the regular deparments of the Christian Century have been crowded out the last two or three weeks, to make space for the report of the convention. But they will appear regularly again after this issue.

"The Coign of Vantage," the new serial which we shall begin in our columns next week will be found of vital interest to a large class of readers. It is a study of modern social and industrial conditions. Our new readers will secure the papers containing the initial chapters.

Those who have recently joined the Christian Century family will, we hope, be a little patient if they do not receive their papers as early as they expected; it is requiring long hours in the office to get the names correctly placed upon the mailing list. We shall be glad to be informed of anyone's failure to receive the paper regularly.

Great crowds are attending the meetings of the Christian Church at Niantic, Ill., where O. C. Bolman is preaching each evening. There have been sixty-seven acessions to the church.

It is the custom of the [illegible]morial Church, Chicago, to hold the communion service one Sunday evening each month, omitting the communion service at the morning hour of that day.

Dr. I. N. McCash, recently elected secretary of the A. C. M. S. to succeed W. J. Wright, spent a few hours at Niantic, Ill., recently and gave a helpful talk at an afternoon men's meeting.

Miss Mattie Hedges of Canton, Mo., will assist J. H. Bryan in building up the Adult Work in North East Missouri. Miss Hedges has already accomplished some very successful work in this direction.

The announcement is made that Homer T. Wilson, Chancellor of Oklahoma Christian University, at Enid, has resigned and will take up evangelistic work again. He will be succeeded by O. N. Roth, of Wichita, Kansas.

A. N. Glover, recently pastor of the church at Delta, Col., has accepted a call to the church at Roswell, New Mexico. This is one of the best churches in that whole region of country. It is aggressive, and bids fair to become a great church.

Dr. Paul Wakefield will give an illustrated lecture at the Evanston, Ill., church, November 5. No admission will be charged. The policy of this church to interest itself in whatever gives promise of helpfulness to mankind is commendable indeed.

Dr. Paul Wakefield of China, delivered a lecture on "The New Orient," under the auspices of the Men's Club of the Memorial Church, Chicago, Monday evening, November 1. The lecture was illustrated by stereopticon and moving pictures.

The corner stone of a new church building has been laid at Winfield, Kansas, where Albert Nichols is the minister. The day of ceremony proved an unfavorable one, but the people were enthusiastic, and came to the service with raised umbrellas.

A meeting recently held by the church at St. Joseph, Ill., where J. T. Davis is pastor is felt to have been an unusual help to the church, though there were but five additions. The preaching was done by the pastor, and J. W. Hanger, of Armington, Ill., lead the singing.

The West Side Church, Springfield, Ill., has voted to enlarge their building at a cost of $9,000. They are especially desirous of more and better equipped Sunday-school rooms, [illegible] their present plan will also double the [illegible] their auditorium. J. R. Golden is the minister.

G. H. Steed is closing his work at Moundsville, W. Va. During his two years of work there over 200 persons were received into membership and the church brought into great missionary activity. The current expense fund was nearly doubled and all other departments of the work were correspondingly benefited.

A COMPREHENSIVE HISTORY OF THE Disciples of Christ

BY WILLIAM T. MOORE, L. L. D.

At last every member of the Disciples Church may rejoice over an authoritative history which will make his church and its teaching better and more generally understood.

The facts, regarding its genesis, spirit, progress, are presented by a man of unquestionable authority, long association and wide reading.

Everyone who has the interest of the church at heart, cannot afford to withhold his heartiest effort to extend the circulation of this most important work.

FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY NEW YORK: 158 Fifth Ave. CHICAGO: 80 Wabash Ave.

Walter Martin, who has been pastor of the University Heights Church, San Diego, Cal., closed his work there in time to attend the Centennial, and then go on to Fredonia, N. Y., Mr. Martin received 56 people into the fellowship of the church at San Diego, the last year of his ministry there, and did a commendable work in the Sunday School. He is available for another pastorate.

J. H. Wright is leaving the work at Lovington, Ill., for the church at Arthur, where a new building is to be dedicated about the first of January. Mr. Wright has acomplished a good work in Lovington, and as a token of the esteem in which she is held, Mrs. Wright was given a ticket to Pittsburg, that she might accompany her husband to the convention.

F. H. Reed, a graduate of Hiram College, with the B. D. degree from Oberlin, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Norman, Okla. This is the seat of the state university, and it is the purpose of the church to measure up to the full measure of their opportunity and responsibility. They feel that this should be the best church in the state. Mr. Reed is most highly commended to the church.

J. T. Riddell has resigned his church at Quaker City, Iowa, and has entered Yale University, where he will spend two years in post-graduate work. Mr. Riddell has been minister at Quaker City only a little more than three months, and while he regretted to sever the relationship with the people, the thirst for knowledge was stronger than the desire to remain with the church.

A lady, a member of one of our churches in Chicago, living in Auburn Park and close to excellent transportation, wishes to rent her furnished home to a small family with the privilege of occupying a room and boarding with them. This will be an excellent opportunity for a man and his wife who wish a home in one of the pleasantest suburbs of Chicago. Inquiry may be addressed to Mrs. Mattie J. Smith, 7722 Union Avenue.

Edward Scribner Ames, pastor of the Hyde Park Church, preached last Sunday on the subject, "Why I Am Not a Unitarian." Those who know Mr. Ames at all intimately, know that this does not require any juggling with words, and that he would not find himself hard put to it for argument in discussing such a subject. Mr. Ames is positive and constructive in the whole program of his life.

Mr. D. J. McCanne, of the South Broadway Church, Denver, has made the congregation a generous offer. As a memorial to his sainted wife who was a great lover of music he proposed to give toward the paying the $1700.00 debt on the pipe organ of the church, one dollar for every dollar the congregation will raise. Mrs. McCanne was held in high esteem by all members of the church, and they will gladly contribute to this memorial to her name.

Dr. Herbert L. Willett is printing in pamphlet form his morning sermons at Memorial Church. Copies of the following sermons may be had for five cents each by application to the office of the Christian Century:—"The Church of the Future," "The Uplifted Cross," (preached in Pittsburg, October 17) "Knowing in Part," "The Opening of the Books," "The Losing and Gaining of Life," "Value of Discontent," "Resignation."

One hundred and twenty-six are enrolled in the Standard Teacher Training classes of the church at Tipton, Indiana. The First Year class numbers 102 and is taught by W. N. McGraw, an experienced high school teacher. The Advanced class is taught by Prof. C. F. Patterson, the superintendent of the city schools, and numbers twenty-four. The pastor, G. I. Hoover, is the associate teacher of each class.

The corner stone of the new building for the Rowland Street Church, Syracuse, N. Y., marks a new era for that church. The pastor, C. R. Stauffer, had charge of the services, and Joseph A. Serena, of the Central Church, made the address. Parts were taken in the service by the pastor of the Christian Church at Pompey, and the Methodist preacher in Syracuse. The church is to be entirely fire proof, and will cost about $12,000.

F. M. Rains will dedicate the new building of the church at Manhattan, Kansas, the first Sunday in November. The pastor, W. T. McLain, urges the attendance of the pastors of neighboring churches, and assures them that they will all be well provided for. The dedication will be followed immediatey by a revival meeting, in which George E. Lyon will do the preaching and V. E. Ridenour will have charge of the music. At the close of the meeting a Sunday School Institute will be held, in charge of Myron E. Settle and wife.

Hermon P. Williams preached at the University Place Church, Des Moines, Iowa, the fourth Sunday in October. There are four Philippine boys there at the University and they gathered around Mr. Williams at the close of the service as if he were a father, as, indeed, he has been to them. Mr. Williams is, on account of his health, now living at Lumberton, N. M., but as soon as he has regained his health he will return to his chosen work in the Philippines.

A. W. Conner recently spent two weeks in a campaign for boys at Spartanburg, Ind. The lecture room of the church was filled each afternoon with boys from eight to eighteen years of age. Each evening Mr. Conner addressed large audiences in the church auditorium. E. K. Van Winkle the pastor, is enthusiastic in his praise of the work of Mr. Conner, and declares that people of all communions and of none, were delighted with the work Mr. Conner was able to accomplish in this short time. This pastor further adds that this is the sort of evangelism which we need at the present time. Can any one doubt it?

The fate of the unfortunate little child and the poor, homeless, aged disciple has ever found sympathy in the hearts of our good brother and sister, Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Bunker, of Exline, Iowa. They have recently given themselves the joy of helping to relieve their distresses, and at the same time adding to the Centennial Thank-offering of the National Benevolent Association. Their last good gift to the Association is $1,000.

There never were as many applications for admission into our Homes for the Aged as right now. Many of them are extremely sad and it is heart-rending to have to say to them "there is no room now." We should have more Homes for these needy, worthy ones. Can the Christian Church afford to see its worthy veterans end their days in a poor-house?

The demands upon the National Benevolent Association to enlarge its work for the needy children of the Southeast is increasing all the time. It has been decided to give up its part of the public school work and devote all the energies of the local board at Baldwin, Ga., to the work of the Home.

The Benevolent Association is closing one of the best years in its history. It needs, however, the final support of every friend of its holy ministry in order to reach some of its most coveted aims.

Chicago

A Report of the First General Meeting of the Disciples Since the Summer

By Orvis F. Jordan

The spirit of co-operation is now one of the most apparent tendencies of the Chicago churches. This is making itself manifest in the brotherly relation of the ministers and in the ways in which the churches are taking counsel together in the common work. One of the most significant outward tokens of this unity is the attendance at the quarterly rallies held by the Chicago Christian Missionary Society. On the Sunday following the national convention our last rally was held, and in point of attendance was the greatest rally ever held in Chicago in recent years.

The Two Speakers

The two speakers of the day were Dr. Willett and Dr. Edgar P. Hill. The former is so well-known to Chicago Disciples and so much the recipient of our good will that he helped much in making the rally. The latter is superintendent of Presbyterian Missions in Chicago and is sufficiently eminent in his denomination that he came near being elected moderator of the last Assembly of the Presbyterian church. He is the missionary statesman of the Chicago situation and heads a great society that is raising and spending sixty-five thousands of dollars on Chicago missions.

Dr. Hill's Address

Dr. Hill spoke first and his address developed two ideas, one that the church was under fire these days as never before, and the other that only the co-operation of the various religious bodies would make the church ready to meet these attacks. The magazines are now spending their muck-raking activities on the churches. It is charged that the churches are doing nothing to meet the great social needs of the times. Dr. Hill pointed out that nearly all of the real philanthropic work of the day is being done by professed Christians, even though they are working in secular organizations. Many organizations that the man of the street thinks are secular, such as the Y. M. C. A., the Anti-Saloon League, and the settlements, are really the churches organized to work at a special task without putting a cross over the door. It is because the church is modest that the people think the church is not relating itself to the problems of the time. Were it not for the church, there would soon be no philanthropic work, just as there is none today in countries where Christianity is not the current religion.

Favors Federation

Dr. Hill's great message was that the churches should federate, or even unite more closely, in order that they might meet the attacks of the enemy and that they might do their work more effectively. He said the argument for church unity in Chicago was especially strong, for the field was greater than all the churches working together could possibly reach. He pledged Presbyterians to a faithful co-operation with the present Co-operative Council of City Missions. This Council has already eliminated many of the duplications in territory that came about through the old haphazard way of doing mission work. Committees are invited into different communities to adjust questions of territory between the various denominations. Dr. Hill insisted that the first task of his board was to make Christians and not Presbyterians.

His outline of the difficulties in the way of the federation idea was a very thoughtful one. He showed how the larger bodies would be more cordial to the federation idea than the smaller ones, since they were already established in the desirable territory. The smaller bodies would always have the temptation to independent action. He felt there was no remedy for this other than the spirit of Jesus in the hearts of the people and beautifully said that Christian union must come at the foot of the cross.

Dr. Willett's Address

Dr. Willett spoke on the great convention in Pittsburg. In mentioning Dr. Hill's address with great appreciation, he showed how fitting it was that a Presbyterian should speak on this day when the reports of the centennial were being received, since all of the fathers were Presbyterians. He said if the Presbyterians of a hundred years ago had been of the spirit of Dr. Hill, there would never have been any division. His report of the convention covered the things of the greatest significance. His whole attitude was that of deep appreciation of the spirit of the Disciples as it was revealed in Pittsburg. He passed in rapid review the various sessions of the conventions, mentioning with appreciation many of the addresses that seemed to him to have special significance.

The Roll Call

After the addresses, it is the custom in our rallies to call the roster of the churches. The representative character of the gathering is seen by the fact that no mission or church in Cook County was without representation. Some came thirty miles, as the brethren from Chicago Heights to the south. Some came from Maywood, twelve miles to the west. Some came from Evanston, twelve miles to the north. Altogether, about four hundred of the picked workers of the cause in Chicago came together.

Money from the Churches

A part of the program was to report the money actually turned in to the society for city missions. The largest amount was that raised by the Englewood church, five hundred dollars. The next largest amount was that given by the Jackson Boulevard church, two hundred dollars. By the time the returns are all in, it seems probable that every church will have some representation, for all our churches are in a spirit to co-operate with the organized work of the brotherhood in the city.

One of the unique features of the rally was the music. While two selections of special music were rendered, the interest probably centered in the chorus choir made up of the ministers of the city. A number of the ministers brought choir members who sang for them by proxy, though they sat in the chorus. The great hymns were sung with spirit. The people, while they sang, had a chance to see the leaders of the work in Chicago all together on one platform.

Our rally has revealed us to ourselves. We are not shouting as loudly as we once did, but we have an enthusiasm that does not need to be continually inflated by emotional appeals, an enthusiasm of the deeper sort that will not abate until we achieve the task we have set ourselves in Chicago.

Chicago Church Notes

J. K. Arnot was sent by his church to the Pittsburg convention. He reports progress at Armitage avenue.

F. C. Cothran has received a call from the Armour Avenue congregation for another year.

The roof is now on the Austin church and there seems to be every prospect that the church can be dedicated before Christmas, as was planned.

The Chicago Heights congregation cleared about three hundred dollars on their Merchants' Carnival and have cleared off the remainder of the indebtedness on their property.

Vaughn Dabney has been called to be pastor of the Douglas Park church, and he is now busy in undertaking to reduce the Church Extension debt on the property out there.

C. E. Winston, of the Settlement at Ada and Sixty-first streets, gave an entertainment at the Evanston church last Friday night. He and his wife rendered the plantation songs and the poetry of Paul Laurence Dunbar in a most entertaining manner.

C. M. Kreidler has resigned at the West End and is going immediately to his new field at Elmira, New York. The congregation at the West End voted a call recently to Mead Dutt of Las Vegas, New Mexico.

The annual meeting of the general board of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society will be held on Monday evening, November 8, in the lecture room of the First Methodist church. Each self-supporting church is entitled to two delegates, and each mission church to one.

Dr. Ames is receiving the recognition that his scholarly attainments deserve in the journals this fall. The International Journal of Ethics has an article from his pen. Another article appears in the American Journal of Theology. He has won a place among the foremost thinkers of the country in the field of his specialty.

Nevada, Mo., Oct. 31. Twenty-five first week. Heavy rain today. W. W. Burks, pastor; Arthur Haley, singing. O. E. Hamilton.

Wapello, Iowa, Oct. 31.—Thompson the Egyptian and workers closed tonight a successful meeting. Out of apparent defeat, we have snatched victory; only one week good weather yet forty-five were added; forty adults. Thompson is truly a marvelous man. He has some open time. Write him at Mason, Ill.—Alden Lee Hill, pastor.

THE DIFFERENCE
Coffee Usually Means Sickness But Postum Always Means Health.

Those who have never tried the experiment of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum in its place and in this way regaining health and happiness can learn much from the experience of others who have made the trial.

One who knows says: "I drank Coffee for breakfast every morning until I had terrible attacks of indigestion, producing days of discomfort and nights of sleeplessness. I tried to give up the use of coffee entirely but found it hard to go from hot coffee to a glass of water. Then I tried Postum.

"It was good and the effect was so pleasant that I soon learned to love it and have used it for several years. I improved immediately after I left off coffee and took on Postum and am now entirely cured of my indigestion and other troubles, all of which were due to coffee. I am now well and contented and all because I changed from coffee to Postum.

"Postum is much easier to make right every time than coffee for it is so even and always reliable. We never use coffe now in our family. We use Postum and are always well."

"There's a reason" and it is proved by trial.

Our Reader's Opinions

Dear Brother Morrison: I write to say how pleased I am with your report of the convention. It is splendid, and I know the succeeding issues will equal this week's high standard. You size up Samuel Harden Church correctly. Prof. Willett did nobly, and the expected panic did not appear. His was a great speech, and everybody enjoyed it. I should like to suggest that you mention the fact that the brethren who have spoken at the conventions from the days of Noah until the present be retired in favor of the younger generation. This does not mean the old men, necessarily, but those who speak on all occasions. They are good convention speakers, but there are other men who would add variety to the program. I heard several mention this in Pittsburg. Some of our men have spoken so often that the people are tired of hearing them. The convention was too big for the auditorium facilities of Pittsburg. E. B. BARNES.

Editors Christian Century: I want to thank you for the appearance in your paper of the correspondence between Prof. Willett and Z. T. Sweeney.

I was not quite able to state clearly the opinion I held heretofore in regard to miracles, because I could not satisfactorily define "miracle," but I did believe essentially, like I understand Prof. Willett to believe. It has been clear to me for some time that there is not a dual universe. The employment of the word "supernatural" is unfortunate.

This correspondence shows clearly the futility of the old school thought and its champions, to stand against the position of modern science. I did think, however, that the champions of the old could make a better showing. Brother Sweeney did as well, perhaps, as any could do, who holds his nebulous, mysterious belief, but he made a very weak argument. I was disappointed, not to say disgusted, at his gusto, and the splendid generalities he displayed for argument. He simply showed the weakness of his position. If he was able to meet the argument of Prof. Willett, he did not do it, and I believe he could not appreciate it. Enough. I simply wanted to tell you I find myself essentially in harmony with Prof. Willett on the subject. I have often said, if we are ever able to reproduce the miracles of Christ, and we may be, it will in no way detract from his glory, that he was able to do it when he was in the flesh. Sincerely,

Colusa, Calif. J. K. BALLOU.

Dear Bro. Morrison: I congratulate you on your account of the Pittsburg Convention in The Christian Century. It is the most satisfactory account that I have seen. I am enjoying the Convention without the expense and discomfort of those who were present in the great assembly in person. Willett's address measures up to a high standard as literature, and has a fine ring. I heartily congratulate you. Fraternally,

Denver, Oct. 26.. B. B. TYLER.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement

By Judge F. A. Henry, Cleveland O.

(The following letter from Judge Henry of the Circuit Court of Ohio seems to us to demand more than casual attention from our readers. This laymen's movement for missions is so big and audacious in its purpose as to at once challenge the interest of the best men in the church.—Editors.)

Letter to the Editors.

"Editors Christian Century:

It seems to me of the utmost importance that all Christian people, and certainly the Disciples of Christ everywhere, should be put in possession at the earliest possible moment of the facts in relation to the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and the campaign which is now under way to enlist laymen in the cause of foreign missions, to the end that the supreme, united effort for world evangelization in this generation, which is the avowed object of this movement, may have the largest possible success.

Three of the seventy-five conventions projected for the United States during the next few months, have already been held, namely those at Buffalo, Cleveland and at Richmond, Va. I was chairman of the executive committee of the Cleveland convention, and the success of the meeting here was equal to our most sanguine expectations. Mr. J. Campbell White declared that the banquet with which the convention here began, was the most impressive event of the sort that he had ever witnessed.

I have also just returned from Richmond, Va., whither I went in pursuance of a resolution adopted by the Cleveland convention to bear greetings to the Richmond convention. Although my stay in Richmond was necessarily brief, I was impressed with the magnitude and success of the like undertaking in that city. To my mind nothing so significant has been successfully undertaken in the history of religious effort in modern times.

The committee is pressing into service as speakers at these conventions, the very best talent they can obtain, and if our people would put forward their own best men for this work, their services would be gladly welcomed. As yet, the Disciples have not been represented to any extent among the speakers, although their delegates have had an important and gratifying part in all the conventions held thus far. There should be, and there is so far as I know, not the slightest vestige of sectarian rivalry or jealousy in this movement. The advantages reaped by the movement flow exclusively into the already established channels of missionary effort. There is no purpose whatever to set up any new organization in competition with the missionary societies already in existence.

The Report of the Great Meeting.

Northeastern Ohio has just experienced a most remarkable religious demonstration. In order that Christian people in other sections may not fail to appreciate and take advantage of the similar opportunities that will shortly come to them, I submit a somewhat detailed account of the Cleveland convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in session here October 21—24. The convention opened with a dinner of 1360 covers in the Central Armory. This number exhausted the capacity of the largest assembly room in the city, so that the rest of the 1442 delegates had to be seated in part at a neighboring hotel and in part at a second table in the rear of the Armory. Practically every Protestant congregation in Cleveland was represented by a delegation of laymen. Registered delegates paying a fee of two dollars each were admitted on the maximum basis of three to every hundred of the membership. About one-fifth of all the delegates were from out of town, and represented the churches which are nearer Cleveland than any other of the seventy-five convention cities in the present campaign schedule of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in the United States. Preparation for this event had been under way for five or six months. An executive committe of about fifty laymen, representing eighteen different communions, was appointed at a preliminary meeting last Spring. Five sub-committees on Deputations, Dinner, Statistics, Publicity, and Finance were at once organized.

The Deputations Committee through its individual members and others, explained the movement at preliminary men's meetings, which were convened for the purpose, both in and out of town; and it also had charge of the registration of delegates.

The Statistics committee collected and tabulated the number of communicants in each of the eighteen denominations participating: the annual congregational expense of all kinds; the annual offerings for home missions and charities; the same for foreign missions; and the per capita foreign mission offering. These figures were tabulated in five columns and printed on cards, and on a huge wall chart.

The convention was addressed by about two dozen men and missionaries, all of the first rank, and many of world-wide renown. It is doubtful if the cause of Foreign Missions was ever before presented so brilliantly and exhaustively or before so novel and responsive an assemblage. I have never heard of so large a banquet of any kind indoors before; and certainly no religious banquet of laymen anywhere ever equalled it. The delegates were moreover picked men, of high intelligence and ability, and included many of Cleveland's richest and most successful men of affairs.

But of far more significance than this is

THE WAY OUT

Change of Food Brought Success and

An ambitious but delicate girl, after failing to go through school on account of nervousness and hysteria, found in Grape-Nuts the only thing that seemed to build her up and furnish her the peace of health.

"From infancy," she says, "I have not been strong. Being ambitious to learn at any cost I finally got to the High School but soon had to abandon my studies on account of nervous prostration and hysteria.

"My food did not agree with me, I grew thin and despondent. I could not enjoy the simplest social affair for I suffered constantly from nervousness in spite of all sorts of medicines.

"This wretched condition continued until I was twenty-five, when I became interested in the letters of those who had cases like mine and who were being cured by eating Grape-Nuts.

"I had little faith, but procured a box and after the first dish I experienced a peculiar satisfied feeling that I had never gained from ordinary food. I slept and rested better that night and in a few days began to grow stronger.

"I had a new feeling of peace and restfulness. In a few weeks, to my great joy, the headaches and nervousness left me and life became more bright and hopeful. I resumed my studies and later taught ten months with ease—of course using Grape-Nuts every day. It is now four years since I began to use Grape-Nuts, I am the mistress of a happy home and the old weakness has never returned."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

the new plane into which the cause of foreign missions is projected. The laity constitute an enormous and virtually untapped reservoir of available energy for this work. Business men as a rule have not been interested in the subject. They now appreciate, in Cleveland at least, how vital it is to the life of the church, in both direct and reflex influence, and how necessary also to the world's work. Natural science of every sort, exploration, diplomacy, commerce—almost all phases of human interest and effort, are large debtors to foreign missions and missionaries.

Still more important is Mr. J. Campbell White's mathematical demonstration that the preaching of the gospel to every creature in this generation is a perfectly practicable undertaking—stupendous indeed, like the digging of the Panama Canal, but entirely feasible and quite within the capacity of the laity of the church. This was a veritable revalation, captivating and convincing.

But most important of all is the distinct subsidence of denominational lines among orthodox Protestant churches. The delegates, in brotherly love, actually forgot that they came from different communions, subjecting themselves unconsciously to Christ's own test: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."

Cleveland's per capita foreign mission offering is $0.887. That of the Cleveland Disciples of Christ is $0.87. The range is from $2.07 for the Presbyterians, to $0.05 for the German-American Synod of North America.

The convention resolved (the churches in separate meetings concurring) to treble Cleveland's annual foreign missionary offering this year. A permanent organization has been perfected to see that this is actuallly done.

This is a natural and welcome reflex of the well-known tendency of interdenominational missionary relations on the foreign field to become non-denominational wherever the stress is great. As Campbell White well says: "You can't talk close communion to people that worship a cow."

The Hub of the Empire State

By Joseph A. Serena.

Our churches were well represented at the Centennial convention. Of the thirty-eight preachers now located in the state, twenty-eight were in attendance, while nearly every congregation was represented by a number of delegates. This, too, in spite of the fact that the railraods were unfair in their rates and restrictions in the territory of the Eastern Trunk Line Association. From Buffalo a special vestibuled train was run to Pittsburg which contained delegates from Buffalo, Tonawanda, Niagara Falls, Toronto, central New York, one hundred and thirty-two in all. A series of vesper services were held in the different cars and the fellowship of the party was fine.

Two of our churches are calling as pastors brethren who have had charges in this state before. C. M. Kreidler comes to Elmira and D. H. Patterson to Gloversville. Both of these fields are promising with the right man at the helm.

Bro. W. C. Bower has resigned from the Tabernacle Church of North Tonawanda, the resignation to take effect February 1, at which time he enters Columbia University to pursue special work on his Doctor's degree. He has been pastor of this church since it met in a store building, in 1900. In 1902 the Bible-school portion of the new building, costing $20,000, was erected. It is a very compact and complete plant for school work, with a seating capacity of 700, and will form the rear of the completed building of the church plant. The growth of this church during the nine years of Bro. Bower's pastorate has been steady and substantial. There are now 338 members in the church and 458 in the Bible-school. We hope a good, strong man may be secured to take up this important work.

Dunkirk is yet without a minister, but we understand that a man may soon enter upon this field. The church felt the influence of the depression in business, but now that the large locomotive works are running under full capacity the entire city will be influenced.

November 1 is the date of the important offering for State missions. In such an important field as the Empire state we consider it of paramount importance. Here are cities of first class growing with greater rapidity than entire states in the west; cities which will have a marked influence on the development of America in years to come. If the Disciples would only confine their missionary activity to growing suburbs of these cities they would have their hands full. These settlements must be churched and we have abundant opportunity in this direction. Then our State society should have a dozen men doing work among the foreigners in our cities, men who speak their tongues and understand their customs. These people will be our clerks, teachers, merchants and politicians of the next generation, and it behooves the Protestant church to reach them in the formative period of their lives. Those churches which do work among them bear testimony to the worth of this effort and our people should not be behind in this regard. At present our activity as a missionary society is expended in aiding mission churches in nine of our cities. We hope to enter others as soon as possible. The offering this year should be the best in our history.

Last Sunday there was opened here another mission in a rapidly growing section of our city. For some time we have had it in view, and since no other church is at work on the field we have entered. Sunday-school will be held each Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, after which Bro. Stauffer and myself will preach on alternate Sunday afternoons. For the present the meetings will be held in a school house.

Complete Address on "Christian Progress, by
SAMUEL HARDEN CHURCH
Before the Christian Centennial Convention at Pittsburgh.

"Colonel Church is the descendant of one of the founders of this distinctly American church. The utter wisdom of his position was splendidly correct. But right here you have a concrete proof of the difficulty of religious progress. The majority of the people in that, as in all other, churches, are too apt to hold fast to little forms and lose sight of great substances. It requires a single, easily grasped idea to hold them. So, when Colonel Church seemed to brush aside their cherished tenets and proffer them a set of great, vital principles as broad as the world and as deep as the mind of God, he knocked them off their feet, and there was no mistaking the hissing.
"Now, this sort of thing is no more characteristic of the best blood of the Disciples Church than it is of any other church. The leading people know the needs, and they feel how noble is the service which leads the sects out of their littleness up to greatness. To suggest that such persons should retire if they cannot agree with the established beliefs of their denomination is as silly as to propose that those statesmen should get out of the land who are striving for improvements in the body politic."

A Progressive Religious Weekly For Christian Homes

-- Editors --

Herbert L. Willett,

Thoroughly Up-to-Date The Christian Century is a progressive religious paper. It is abreast of the times. It stands for those growing ideals which are fast taking possession of the minds of modern men and women. It is not alarmed at scholarship. It believes in education. It gives a vision of things as they are to be. It places the reader in touch with those great lives the country over which are being spent for the welfare of humanity. It strives to develop in its readers the open mind, a broad outlook and the habit and passion of service.

Devoted to Christian Union Thoroughly up-to-date, The Christian Century is no free lance. It rides no hobby. It loves free discussion but hates the contraversial spirit. Its Editors devoutly believe in the plea for the unity of all Christians proclaimed by Thomas and Alexander Campbell and by the Disciples of Christ for almost a century. The Fathers were the most progressive thinkers of their time. Were they living today they would be leading the procession of religious and social progress.

The Staff of Contributors The Editors are re-inforced by a staff of the best equipped and most brilliant writers among the Disciples. Our pages are full of rich and interesting writing.

George A. Campbell conducts a page entitled "Views of Life" that has been styled by hundreds of our readers as the finest piece of literature produced among the Disciples today.

Errett Gates conducts a page on Christian Union. Dr. Gates is a specialist in this field and writes with authority.

Alva W. Taylor interprets the Trend of the World's Events with illuminating insight.

Professor Silas Jones writes the most helpful prayer-meeting message that appears in current literature.

Professor H. L. Willett conducts a page of Biblical Problems, answering all sorts of questions on the Bible, and presenting an exposition of the Book of Acts (the Sunday-school lesson) which is itself worth the price of the paper.

W. D. Endres conducts a Christian Endeavor meeting each week.

Orvis F. Jordan keeps our readers in touch with Chicago, that mysterious, fascinating and strategic field of Christian work.

John R. Ewers conducts a department in which are presented ideals and practical methods of work for Our Church Men.

An Inspiration in the Home The whole round of life is ours. The Christian Century is an assistant pastor in every home into which it goes. Pastors will find the readers of our paper among the most useful and intelligent workers they have. Its pages are adapted to every member of the family. The department especially for children is conducted by Richard W. Gentry. Our splendid news service is edited by Harry F. Burns. Continued stories of the highest grade are running almost constantly.

A Word to our Friends

The work you did for the Christian Century at Pittsburg has yielded results beyond our plans. We will be unable, we regret to say, to send the first two issues following the convention to more than half of the new subscribers, so much larger is the list than our calculations. A great body of sentiment is organizing itself in behalf of the Christian Century as an exponent of those ideals for which the Disciples must strive in the new century. Our true friends are not content to merely stand by and watch and applaud but they want to help. Many are asking what they can do.

The best thing you can do for The Christian Century is to get new subscribers for the paper. The following is a facsimile of a letter by Dr. B. B. Tyler, sent to nearly two hundred homes of his church members in Denver. It was a practical way of showing his appreciation.

My Dear Friend.

If you are not a subscriber to, and reader of a Christian Church paper I desire to call your attention to and commend the Christian Century. This is a first class paper. It is up-to-date in its news and discussions. Its editorials are above the average. The notes on the Sunday School lessons, and Christian Endeavor topics, are helpful. The department entitled: "Home and the Children" is interesting. The "Book World" department is alone worth many times the Subscription price of the paper.

I am persuaded that if you will read the Christian Century weekly you will thank me for this note of Commendation

Mrs Packwood, will honor to me and highly esteemed, for her character, will call on you for your Subscription.

You will, I am sure, receive her as your Spiritual Minister who is engaged in the Master's business.

Re-Opening the Baptism Question

Shall the Disciples Practice Sprinkling Alongside of Immersion

COLONEL Samuel Hardin Church, a distinguished citizen of Pittsburg, and a grandson of Walter Scott, one of the Fathers of the Disciples' brotherhood, says the baptism question must be reopened and that the unbroken practice of the Disciples since his grandfather's day must be revised.

Mr. Church says the Methodist way of leaving it optional for the candidate to choose his own form of baptism is much nearer the mark of a free church than the Disciples' practice.

More radical yet, he says that the Scriptures do not give unequivocal sanction to immersion as has been claimed by the prevailing Baptist interpretation of the New Testament. "It is scarcely imaginable that the jailor and his household were immersed in the jail at Philippi," is one of his allusions to Scriptural precedents.

He therefore proposes that the minister advise immersion in the case of adult applicants, "and stop there, being governed thereafter by the declared conscience of the convert."

Disciples of Christ versed in the way of thinking peculiar to their brotherhood will experience a profound shock at being told that these sentences were spoken at their Centennial convention.

Those who heard the address in Carnegie Institute were intensely conscious that a strange note had found its way into the harmony of the great convention, and they responded to it with contradictory reactions. Some hissed, some applauded, the largest number sat frozen in their seats and wondered what it could portend.

After that hour the address of Colonel Church became the talk of the convention. And since the convention it has found its way into print farther than any other addresses have penetrated. The Disciples' own press is now engaged in characterizing it as a "malodorous address," and "miserable, second-hand infidelity."

The outside press regards it as an indication of an inevitable change of policy with respect to baptism. The Outlook calls it "the most significant single feature of the Convention."

Another paper says, "it is possible that in a short time candidates for entrance into the Christian church will be allowed to choose the form of baptism which their consciences dictate."

The Disciples have supposed that the baptism question was settled. On no specific theme has their preaching been characterized by greater uniformity and unanimity since Alexander Campbell became a Baptist than on this. On no subject has the brotherhood's sentiment crystalized into such pat formulas as on the form, design and proper subjects of baptism.

Now to be told that their practice of immersion exclusively is sectarian, that it is not necessarily scriptural and that the optional basis is both more scriptural and more catholic, touches the Disciples in the most sensitive area of their consciousness.

How deep Colonel Church's probe has gone remains yet to be seen. If he shall have stirred the brotherhood to examine anew the foundations of the immersion dogma the charge of bad taste in presenting his views on the occasion he chose will not have elbow room in history.

On account of our hope that this re-examination will result from the episode at Pittsburg The Christian Century finds it very difficult to wax hot at Colonel Church, even though it finds itself in opposition to many if not all of the points he made relating to the plea of the Disciples.

We had no impulse to join with those who hissed the speaker, although he seemed to us to surrender some of the fundamental assets of our position, and to set forth certain other views, commonly held by modern scholars, in such inexpert fashion as to leave them subject to ridicule and caricature.

The Disciples by all the traditions of their first hundred years welcome any honest thinker who makes them think. And they accept the challenge of Mr. Church or any other thinker to discuss anew any item of faith or practice, howsoever fundamental it may be in their program.

The immersion dogma is one of the items which the Disciples have regarded as settled. If now it be reopened for discussion in the light of the modern conception of salvation, the modern conception of the church and the modern conception of the Scriptures what modification, if any, is it likely to undergo?

The Christian Century's answer is that the exclusive practice of immersion as the proper form of baptism will remain unchanged, but the dogma may pass into disuse or altogether disappear.

The practice of immersion only is one thing, and the dogma by which this exclusive practice has been upheld is another thing.

It is of primary importance to distinguish between the two and to discern that the disuse of the dogma does not necessarily carry with it the overthrow of the practice. Having rid ourselves of the dogma, it may fall out that there are other more cogent and persuasive reasons for maintaining the practice.

The dogmatic argument for immersion only starts with the definition of the word "baptize." In the Greek this word means to dip, to immerse, to plunge, or their equivalents. The array of scholarship supporting this definition is without exception. No scholar of rank translates the word "baptize" by any of the equivalents of "sprinkle" or "pour."

A further item entering into the dogma is the historic fact that in the early church every baptism was by immersion. There is no indication that any other practice was employed. Jesus was immersed. John was baptizing in Jordan. The Ethiopian eunuch was immersed. Paul speaks of being buried in baptism. Moreover, church history discloses just when and where and why the change was made from immersion to affusion.

And finally there stands the commission of the Lord himself, "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."

Out of these data the baptismal argument has been constructed and the immersionist-believing section of the church has made the acceptance of its interpretation of these data a test of fellowship in its various communions.

Steadfastly the pedobaptist section of the church has refused to accept the interpretation of these data made by their immersionist brethren.

On the basis of the older view of the Bible the argument is in a deadlock. There are no convincing signs that the immersionist doctrine is depleting the ranks of the supporters of affusion.

On the contrary, there is a fast growing indifference to all attempts to "prove" things as the immersion dogma is proved. Even by Baptist and Disciple preachers the subject of baptism is not discussed as in former times.

With the fast increasing acceptance of the view of the Scriptures now prevailing everywhere in circles of scholarship there is good reason to believe that the ground is being cut from beneath the feet of both combatants.

The contest will not be decided on the terms which Colonel Church suggests, however, namely, a return to the practice of three forms of baptism, but will be, we believe, a return to the apostolic precedent of immersion only.

This will be accomplished by lifting the whole subject out of the realm of dogma and considering baptism for just what it is, and what it is worth, in the personal life of the Christian and the organized life of the church.

As a people seeking a basis of Christian unity the Disciples are on the right ground when they practice immersion only. No other basis of union is possible.

The optional basis is not a unifying but a divisive basis. The immersionist's conscience cannot tolerate the practice of affusion and could not be expected to rest comfortably in a church which practiced it. The fact that he was himself immersed would not lift from him the responsibility for his church's act in practicing for baptism what he believes is not baptism at all.

Moreover, every baptism involves not one conscience only, but two —the candidate's and the administrator's. How can a minister with an immersionist conscience practice affusion? Yet this is Mr. Church's solution: for the minister to advise immersion and stop there, being governed afterward by the conscience of the candidate.

No, apart from all dogmatic considerations, the exigencies of their program for Christian union call for the continued practice of immersion only by the Disciples of Christ according to the precedents of the Fathers and the early church.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

Does Union Labor Indorse the Saloon?

The daily press tells us that the Illinois Federation of Labor went on record against local option in its recent meeting. This is something all Federations, even that of the city of Chicago, have persistently refused to do heretofore. The national meeting peremptorilly bludgeoned such an effort. Samuel Gompers and all the great leaders are on record against the saloon. This resolution against local option in the Illinois Federation was a characteristic saloon trick. It was the same sort of a trick that put both the democratic and republican conventions for choosing delegates to the national presidential convention on record against local option in Illinois one year and a half ago. The liquor agents waited silently until the sessions were about over and the larger number of delegates already out of the hall, then they sprung their resolution, being sure their crowd had quietly remained behind, and it was carried by some forty votes. Labor is everywhere on record for the Referendum. It cannot consistently therefore be against local option.

No Longer Lese Majesty to Criticise Judges

Judge Cutting of Chicago arraigned judges severely in a recent address. He is evidently not one of those gentlemen who think a halo of divinity surrounds the erstwhile attorney as soon as he mounts the bench. Hands of holy horror were held aloft when Theodore Roosevelt first dared speak his gentle opinion of certain decisions that seemed to him to be partial to the point of notorisourness. Recently we have the governors of both Alabama and Nebraska severely arraigning federal judges for interference with state law and a perfect chorus of denunciation has gone up against Judge Tuthill for his recent injunction restraining the states attorney from bringing violators of the woman's ten hour law to trial. We are recognizing that the judge becomes in a large measure law maker in "interpreting" the law and that he always has a large margin of personal discretion in his rulings, and that, being human, he is very liable to do as other humans and rule according to his prejudices.

The Shot That Was Heard Around the World

In ages that are past we find the martyrdoms that inspire the lips of poets and light the fires of freedom. Such a martyrdom has just taken place in Spain. Perhaps like the crowning of the memory of Dr. Rizal in Manilla with a statue so soon after he was shot for his love of his people, Professor Ferrer's memory may be honored ere long with a memorial tomb that will immortalize his humble grave in the criminals ditch in Barcelona. With Bruno of Italy he is now immortalized and his ideal of a new state in old Spain has been hastened a generation. Professor Ferrer was the founder of modern schools in Spain. He devoted himself with untiring energy and courage to the task. The clerical party has long conspired against him. He has been accused of every overt act that has taken place in the revolution now going on in that medieval kingdom. But he never taught violence. He believed in the revolution of ideas by the arts of peace and has thus been called "the Tolstoi of Spain." But such a revolution is more to be feared by clericals and monarchists than one of blood. Yet being men of blood the minions of depotism never learn that the blood of martyrs is the seed of freedom. Professor Ferrer, like Socrates of old, founded a school and was accused of corrupting the youth. He sowed ideas and tyranny has beaten them into the ground where they will bear dragon's teeth. He was tried by court martial; it is said none appeared against him in person and that there was not a solitary direct accusation of complicity in the riots, but depositions only from prisoners in the fortress that were regarded as circumstantial but have not been published and he was given no witnesses nor a chance to defend himself but summarily pronounced guilty and quickly shot. He died like a hero with the cry "Aim straight. Long live the schools." One volley sufficed and his body was denied decent burial but flung in the criminal's ditch, and now the spot is guarded by soldiers for it will be sacred ground over which armies may contend and Weyler, "The Butcher," knows that a crusade to rescue his poor clay would light the smouldering fires of the nation. A woman left him a half million and he used it all for his schools and died penniless, his only daughter being now compelled to work in a factory for a living. His schools were simply those of modern science and democracy, such as all Spain must soon have. His ideas were those of a Jefferson but he lived before his time. His offense was to love truth and freedom and to have the courage to teach them. The shot that killed him rang round the world and in every land lovers of liberty, equality, and fraternity have arisen to acclaim his worth and deplore his death and condemn the guilty government that killed him. In Europe socialists and liberals have united in the demonstrations with officers of cities to address them. In America all but a few of the papers join in the prophecy that the outlook has been made ominous for the present regime in Spain. In Madrid the weak, though amiable young monarch trembles for his life and his crown. The Ministry has fallen, bombs are being thrown in Barcelona, monasteries and convents are in terror of the people, and a powder train has been laid that may ignite popular discontent into a revolution. Spain has offended the universal conscience of civilization and the wrath of the Lord is laid upon her.

Roosevelt Defeated

One of the late president's most excellent qualities was not patience. He was tremendously in earnest and stood not upon the delays of the codes of procedure. He was more reformer than statesman, perhaps, and the quality that did things was not always willing to abide the times for their doing. Like all impulsive men he stood hard by his friends and his own pet designs. When certain editors criticised certain transactions involved in Panama affairs he demanded their immediate punishment and in his wrath sought to hale them before a court in Washington while the offensive matter had been published in New York and Indianapolis. This would mean that a man who published a paper could be tried at any point where his paper might circulate and be denied justice in the harassing proceedure of being hauled about the country on pretext as well as for good cause. Judge Anderson of the United States courts, has ruled that the case cannot be taken to Washington. He also rules that the publications of things found to be false cannot be called libelous unless malicious intent is proven. There can be no centralized courts nor a censorized press in this countrry. The judge was not even sure the accusations were all untrue.

The Cossack in Finland Again

None of the multitudinous tragedies of imperialism touch the chord of universal sympathy more than that of Finland. Here is one of the most worthy, liberty-loving, and able people on the earth, made the subjects of a government their inferiors in every respect. Loving freedom and capable of building one of the most democratic of modern governments, they are subjected to the tyrannical rule of a despotism. After the sympathy of a world had compelled their conquerors to give them governmental autonomy, they enacted some of the most enlightened and progressive laws on the statue books of any nation. Now they are seeing their cities filled with the brutal Cossacks, their senate made the personal appointees of the autocratic governor sent by Russian bureaucrats to coerce them by means fair or foul, and thus are to be reduced once more to the place of a common dependency. The word conqueror once had a glorious sound to the ears of men, but that was before men learned the doctrine of human rights. Wherever they have learned that doctrine and learned that if they deserve its benefits, they must be willing to extend it to all mankind, the word "conqueror" spells barbarism. Finland loses her autonomy because she protested against paying $4,000,000 for the support of Russian arms. To do so would be to deny her own protestations against tyranny.

Clinics for the Cattlemen

Wisconsin is one of the most progressive states in the union. Its state university has been pronounced the most serviceable and efficient of all American educational institutions. One of the latest innovations adopted at that splendid educational center is a bureau for giving expert advice to cities on all municipal problems. One of the most conspicuous and successful of its movements for public education was that adopted by the university and the agricultural experiment stations for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis.

The state had been conducting the usual "campaign of education" for some years and with the usual results that the more intelligent and public spirited of the farmers had been reached and some good effected. Other states had adopted drastic laws, compelling certain regulations, and had won the enmity of a public that did not see all things as the experts did. Wisconsin, having tried education so thoroughly and being so democratic in her ways, resolved to try education as a means of regulation. Dean Russell arranged for clinical demonstrations at county fairs and at farmers' institutes. The reaction test for determining the presence of tuberculosis would be tried on several animals and those showing the disease would be brought into the arena and the clinic would show the most ignorant the results of the disease on the animal, while the demonstrator would explain how it was spread and what dangers its spreading held to the welfare of the herds and to the large dairy interests of the state.

The results very very gratifying. Within the year some 5,000 were called for, more than for the five years of bulletin issuing previously. The next year 11,000 tests were made and last year more than 30,000, until today more than one-third of all the cattle of the state have been submitted to the "tuberculin test." Public opinion has been put on the side of the precautionary measures and made aware of the dangers. The percentage of affected animals has decreased from 17 per cent to 4 per cent, and a law compelling the pasteurization of the creamery milk fed to calves will doubtless be enacted and regulations made that will prevent the sale of any animal until it has a clean bill of health. Education must precede regulation.

A Speech That Shook a Nation

Lloyd-George recently made a speech at Newcastle that fairly shook the nation. It shook with laughter at his wit and with surprise at his courage and its dukes shook with rage and apprehension. It was a terriffic indictment of the dukes. The Russian government censored the address before they would allow it to be printed in that realm of the aristocrat. The sentence that called out extra editions of the papers in the night, a rare thing to happen in old England was this: "Who made ten thousand people owners of this soil and the rest of us trespassers in the land of our birth?" Lloyd-George and Winston Churchill seem determined that the opportunity for curtailing the prestige and power of the Lords shall not be lost. They desire that no passing opportunities shall deprive the people of the constitutional progress now within reach—that of depriving the Lords of the power to vote. The Lords are an anachronism in the affairs of Britain but like old wolves driven to the forest they will fight with all the abandon of those who have all to lose and nothing to gain but what they save from the foray upon them. To many a Tory traditionalist the doughty Chancellor's words must have sounded like sacrilege. Speaking of the charge that the budget would destroy prosperity he pointed out the general increase in trade and said: "Only one stock has gone down badly. There has been a great slump in dukes. (Laughter and cheers). They have been making speeches lately. One especially expensive duke made a speech, and all the Tory press said: "Well, now, really, is that the sort of a thing we have been spending 250,000 pounds a year upon?" because a fully equipped duke costs us as much as two Dreadnaughts (laughter)—and they last longer. (More laughter.) As long as they are contented to be mere idols on their own pedestals preserving the silence that became their rank and their intelligence (laughter)—all went well. * * * They have been scolding like omnibus drivers because the Budget cart has knocked a little of the gilt off their old stage coach." This seemed very audacious and will be unpardonable to the Tory conscience.

The Chancellor pushed his indictments to the issue. He added: "Let them realize what they are doing (cheers). They are forcing a revolution—(hear hear). But they decree a revolutoin which the people will direct. The question will be asked why five hundred men ordinary men—(laughter)—chosen accidentally from among the unemployed—(laughter)—should override the judgment of the millions of people who are engaged in the industry which makes the wealth of the country. (Hear hear).

"Who is responsible for the scheme of things whereby one man is engaged through life in grinding labor to win a bare and precarious subsistence for himself and when at the end of his days he claims at the hands of the community he served a poor pension of eightpence a day, he can only get it through a revolution; and another man who does not toil receives every hour of the day, every hour of the night, whilst he slumbers, more than his poor neighbor receives in a whole year of toil?—(Shame).

"Where did the table of that law come from? Whose finger inscribed it? These are the questions that will be asked. The answers are charged with peril for the order of things the Peers represent, but they are fraught with rare and refreshing fruit for the parched lips of the multitude who have been treading the dusty road along which the people have marched through the dark ages which are now emerging into the light."

Bad Politics Wins in the Cities

The earliest news from the city elections throughout the country is not encouraging to the "uplifters." There are some victories for reform and clean civic administration but many appalling defeats. In Cincinnati George B. Cox is again in power. In Philadelphia the independent and reform campaign was in vain. In San Francisco Heney was defeated and the crowd that prefers corruption to the exposure that prosecution brings, was victorious.

There are two shiningly bright spots according to the reports. One in Toledo where Brand Whitlock won a hard fought battle for independency and the people against the public utility corporations. The other is Indianapolis where Tom Taggart suffered defeat when the democratic ticket went down on account of the support the saloon crowd gave it.

Only time can tell whether it was a victory or defeat in New York. Tammany was defeated in the election of the Board of Estimate—the thing of chief interest to them. Gaynor was elected. He had Tammany's endorsement, but only after he had fought them for years and had been nominated on an independent ticket. He was not Tammany's man, but accepted because it was thought "good politics" and with the hope of pulling through the Board of Estimate, the real holders of the means of graft for the "Tiger."

Bannard was on the fusion ticket but was the nominee of the Woodruff machine. Woodruff is little better than Pat McCarren was and in the battle between the followers of the two in Brooklyn was defeated by the McCarren crowd. Bannard was the favored candidate of "Big Business," which all too often means crooked business when mixed with politics and city contracts. Hearst was the willing tool of the Woodruff crowd, it seems, and only ran because it was thought his following would divide the Gaynor vote and pull Bannard through.

Gaynor has a good record. He put McKane in the penitentiary years ago and thus cleaned out one of the worst gangs that ever infested the metropolis. He defeated a plan of the Hugh McLaughlin ring to sell a water company to Brooklyn with a million for the graft. He brought a suit that received another million in back taxes from the Brooklyn elevated. His entire career has been of the same quality. He was once police commissioner and made war upon illicit liquor selling. Several times he has declined nominations for office from mayor to governor and was elected to the Supreme Court in 1907 by the nomination of three parties. No one thinks Tammany can control him and with the exception of his "personal liberty" speeches his campaign was one that challenged the consideration of independency and anti-corruption. That he received a large independent vote is patent on the face of the returns.

In Cleveland Tom Johnson was defeated. His eight years as mayor demands more than a passing consideration and will receive a paragraph later. His defeat does not necessarily spell corruption's victory. The man who does as many things as "the best mayor in America" has done will make many enemies in doing them and meet defeat sooner or later. Cleveland can never return to the regime of the street railway or any other public service corporation and Johnson's many victories are not in the least lost by his defeat for the fifth term.

The Wide Open Eye-Gate

Why have educated men seemed to look askance upon the method of auricular demonstration as a means of teaching the public? Because the show utilizes the picture and the picturesque is no reason for the teacher of the public despising the wide open eye-gate. But the pictorial method is coming into its own. It is establishing its own pedagogical worth. The magazines are popularizing it and the public lecturer is adopting it, less if he is a mere entertainer, more if he is an educator. The missionaries are learning its value and putting even moving pictures of mission scenes before the public, the scientist considers the stereopticon an indispensable part of his demonstrating apparatus, the Sunday-school leader is finding its value for his pupils, and the departments of public health may well learn the usefulness of the pictures in all efforts to forward sanitation and hygienic living. The Department of Health could well copy Wisconsin's clinical methods as a part of their method for regulating health conditions in the city. The people only need to be shown in a manner sufficiently impressive and they will co-operate with efforts for their welfare.

Editorial

LAST week McCormick Theological Seminary, the Presbyterian divinity school of Chicago, celebrated the anniversaries of its founding and of the birth of Mr. Cyrus McCormick, its most conspicuous benefactor. Addresses were delivered in appreciation of Mr. McCormick's life and work, and two notable symposiums were conducted. One was on theological education—"What should be the ideals for theological education?"—and the papers were by President A. H. Strong of Rochester, Professor R. W. Rogers of Madison, N. J., and Professor Williston Walker of Yale. The second was on ministerial leadership, discussed by Rev. Charles L. Thompson of New York, Rev. J. Ross Stevenson of Baltimore, and Rev. E. Y. Hill of Philadelphia. Special features were the addresses by the Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and by President Woodrow Wilson of Princeton. McCormick Theological Seminary has done fifty years of most honorable and important service as a divinity school of the Presbyterian church. Its attendance has been reduced from year to year, both by the decrease of ministerial candidates, and by the greater attractiveness of those Presbyterian seminaries like Princeton and Union, which are connected with universities. But it has a very liberal endowment and its standards of educational work have always been of high character.

FOR the first time in our hundred years of history the statistics of the Disciples of Christ show a loss in number of communicants. At the convention last year our statistical secretary placed our membership at 1,330,980. This year it is given out as 1.327.559—a loss of 3,421. On their face these figures will be an occasion of embarrassment to the brotherhood, especially in view of the fact that the government's statistics on religious bodies, published only two months ago, give the Disciples first place among all Protestant denominations for percentage of increase during the past sixteen years. This precedence has been commented upon in most of the papers, religious and secular, of the country. The inevitable inference from the figures for 1909 will be that the sensational increase of the Disciples has been rudely checked. The embarrassment will not be eased either by the more careful scrutiny given the Disciples by the outside world in this Centennial year.

But the discomfiture amounts almost to exasperation when one reads the marvelous story told in our papers from week to week of the great ingatherings through revival meetings. No single denomination reports such meetings as take place in our churches. Not many union meetings exhibit larger numbers of conversions than result from certain of our evangelists' efforts in co-operation with single congregations. Why do not our statistics register this growth? Last year and the year before our reported gain was only about 30,000 in each case, and this year a loss of 3,000. For ten years and more the figures have been hovering below and above the million and a quarter mark.

What is the explanation? We cannot find comfort in the fact that 100,000 "antis" are omitted from this year's figures for the same omission was made in last year's table. Are our figures totally unreliable? Or do the later figures correspond more nearly to the facts while the earlier were inflated estimates? Or are we in a period of revision of our membership lists when pastors and clerks refuse to count the inactive or absent or physically dead people whose names may be on the roll?

Or is the fault not with the figures but with the facts? Have the Disciples really ceased to grow at their erstwhile rate? Are the spectacular meetings with hundreds of additions merely isolated cases of success unmatched by a proportionate increase on the part of the rank and file of the churches? Or is there a great leak somewhere? Are we losing by backsliding as fast as we gain by evangelizing? Are our methods of conserving and disciplining our forces less efficient than our methods of recruiting them? Or is our evangelism, our method of recruiting converts, superficial, artificial and overwrought? making a temporary appearance of success and increase, rather than a real and permanent success and increase.

These questions are among the most vital to which the statesmen of our church can address themselves today. Certain we are that not one of these questions is vain. Every one points to a relevant fact. Whether any one points to a single fact large and significant enough to solve our problem, we do not say. There may be an explanation lying wholly outside the suggestions implied in these questions. But certain it is that our denominational statistics either do not now or did not formerly or never did register the facts, or else the facts are such as to give us solemn pause in our Centennial jubilation.

IT HAS now been definitely determined that there shall be an effort made to vote the saloons out of Chicago at next spring's election. Tremendous as this may seem, the men who are leading the forces in the campaign against the saloon are determined that it shall be an effort worthy of the cause and productive of the best results. The temper of the saloon people has shown itself in many recent demonstrations. Huge parades, organized under saloon influence but masquerading as national and patriotic organizations, have attempted to produce the impression that Chicago is so strongly intrenched as a wide open town that only fanatics and fools would attempt to disturb the saloon traffic. But the sweeping victories which have been gained by the Anti-Saloon League and other temperance forces in different sections of Illinois and throughout the country, notably in the South, have encouraged the temperance people to a united effort, and certainly very great educational value will be gained from the effort, and it may actually result in the enactment of prohibition laws for this great town. Even those who are most timid and fainthearted must recognize the fact that whether the fight is won or lost, so far as the immediate results are concerned, it will be a winning fight because the very best effort will educate the minds of the people as to the real nature of the saloon and will enlist the enthusiastic support of all who believe in righteousness and a clean city. The only defeat possible is the failure to fight. There is just a certain amount of work which every member of the church can do. In conversation he can back the effort with every ounce of his influence; by financial contributions to the campaign he can supply the sinews of war; and by his ballot and all the ballots he can influence, he may register that decision which makes the will of right minded people effective. We are in for a big campaign. The Church of Christ expects every man to do his duty.

State Missions

NOVEMBER is the month consecrated in the calendars of nearly all our churches to offerings for state missions. This is an interest which has been too likely to be forgotten in the more impressive agitation of home and foreign missions and the other nation-wide causes that appeal to us for missionary and philanthropic offerings.

But state missions make their imperative demand upon all the churches, and in the measure of their nearness to each local church the interest in them should be correspondingly increased.

For it is apparent that in all the states there are many places of importance that ought to be reached by the Disciples of Christ. In carrying on this work it is perfectly possible to bear in mind the local conditions of the places so considered, in order that none of them may have inflicted upon it a new and struggling organization which it does not mean to help, when there are so many that stand in urgent need of missionary work.

It is no part of the program of the Disciples to rush in indiscriminately merely because there is a possibility of organizing one of our churches in a particular town or city. The very significance of our plea indicates that we are willing to study the religious situation in every place which offers us the opportunity for entrance, and see whether it is really the place where a new congregation ought to be established.

If the missionary secretaries of all the Christian bodies were consulted regarding the needs of a state like Illinois, Ohio or Kentucky, doubtless they would reach a practically unanimous conclusion regarding the need of missionary work at some particular points which are not sufficiently churched at present. It is this problem that our state mission forces need to face, as well as the general desire to spread the message of the Disciples of Christ regarding Christian unity.

With the dawn of our second century it is time we made our plea effective in state missions as well as in our more general propaganda. We need to plant more churches and to strengthen those that we have. The new churches that we plant ought to be put where they will do the most good, not merely for the Disciples but for the kingdom of God in general. The churches that we have and which need strengthening should be made to understand that their paramount duty is the interpretation of the message which historically is the only excuse for our separate organization.

Meantime, the great work that has been done by our state boards in the past is a justification for an urgent plea in behalf of liberal offerings at this season of the year when the state work is called to our regard. Let no church fail to observe one of the Sundays in November as state mission day, unless in some other adequate manner it provides for this ministry.

The New Standard of Giving

A NEW and astonishing mark has been set in the field of benevolences by the will of Mr. John Stewart Kennedy, a wealthy business man of New York, who, in addition to ample legacies to his immediate family and other relatives, has divided $30,000,000 among the objects of benevolence suggested by his denominational relationships and his interests in wider philanthropy. His chief gifts are to the missionary and educational enterprises of the Presbyterian church. To the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, the Board of Home Missions, the Church Extension Fund and the Presbyterian Hospital in New York he gives amounts of two millions and a quarter each.

To New York public institutions such as the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the New York Public Library, and Columbia University he gives similar amounts; to the Robert College at Constantinople, one million and a half; to the Presbyterian Board of Aid for Colleges, three quarters of a million; to the Charities Organization of New York, three quarters of a million; to the American Bible Society three quarters of a million.

Smaller bequests of $100,000 each are made to Yale, Amherst, Williams, Bowdoin, the University of Glasgow, Tuskogee Institute and Hampton Institute. Sums of $50,000 each are given to such educational institutions as Lafayette, Oberlin, Wellesley, Barnard, the Teachers' College of Columbia University, Elmira College for Women, Northfield Seminary, Mt. Hermon Boys' School and the Mission College at Marsovan, Turkey, while the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, Syria, receives $25,000, the American School at Smyrna, $20,000, Lake Forest University, Illinois, and Central University at Danville, Kentucky, $25,000 each, Berea College, Kentucky, $50,000, and the Presbyterian Board of Relief for Disabled Ministers, $30,000. Such a series of bequests as this is an encouraging sign of the times. Mr. Carnegie said a few months ago that it had come to be a disgrace for a man to die rich, and his own generous contributions to education and religion have indicated that he was serious in this statement.

In striking contrast with this will of Mr. Kennedy's was the disposal of Mr. Harriman's great estate of nearly $100,000,000, of which not a penny, so far as has been announced, was left to religion or charity. A man with a fortune of that size can no more use it for his own benefit alone or the care of his family than he can eat the food or wear the clothing of a hundred men. He is at best but a trustee or steward of property that really belongs to the community and is sure to go back to the community within a generation or two.

To have, therefore, the joy of its wise bestowal upon the causes that can promote righteousness and social uplift is one of the ways in which a successful life may be made still more successful in death. Mr. Kennedy's will has pointed out this method of continuing good long after one has finished with his money. It ought to be exemplary for thousands of other wealthy men. To be sure, Mr. Kennedy has done no more with his fifty odd millions of dollars than many a man, modestly circumstanced, has done with ten or fifty thousand. But the size to which the figures run calls fresh attention to a duty that is becoming recognized and impressive, and to certain illustrations of it which our modern times have afforded. The man who has more property than is needed for the actual comfort and care of his family needs to ponder the growing sense of public approval of such legacies as carry on the work of religion and benevolence after his death.

The era of great gifts for these holy causes is upon us. Education and religion have long halted at the half-way step of partial support. The signs of the times indicate that we have come to the day of larger things in financial support of the work of the kingdom.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

Will you please give your estimate of the article, "The New Development in Old Testament Criticisms," by Professor B. D. Eerdmans in the July number of the Hibbert Journal? J. W. S.

The article refered to is an interesting illustration of the anxiety of students to throw new light on the problems presented by Old Testament literature and history. The keen interest with which the modern and generally accepted views of Old Testament criticism have been reviewed, analyzed, attacked and amplified reveals the vast importance of the subject and the substantial character of the results obtained. Where there are so many careful students examining every angle of evidence and subjecting accepted views to the most rigorous criticism, no theory can long survive that fails to meet the tests. Particularly is this true when every fresh investigator is keenly anxious to devise some new and different explanation of the phenomena which may bring to him credit as well as assist in the complete interpretation of the Old Testament records.

Professor Eerdmans starts with an attack upon the accepted views of Old Testament literary analysis which, by attempting to discredit the generally accepted results of the process, prepares the way for his own suggestions. He recognizes the phenomena as requiring explanation. The differences in the linguistic usage he acknowledges as clear proofs that some adequate interpretation must be given, and he attempts to overthrow the usual explanation of the development of prophecy, ritual, law and social ideals in Israel by the review of a number of points on which there is always freedom for differences of opinion.

But the explanation he offers is so inadequate that his criticisms only tend to strengthen the reader's feeling that until something more convincing can be presented, the prevailing views of the Old Testament accepted by critics of the modern school, will stand. His explanation resolves itself into the claim that the variation in the use of the divine name between Jahve and Elohim are not proofs of different authors, but result from the fact that Elohim, the plural word for deity in general, was used in the earlier sections of the Old Testament as referring to the "protectors of the house." The Elohim were the gods who were conceived to be the guardian spirits of the place. This polytheism was later corrected into monotheistic terms. The plural form of Elohim is made by him the proof of the fact that it represents a stage in the process of Hebrew religious development toward the time when Jahve became the one God of the Hebrew people.

This suggestion is so commonplace in its historical significance, and so inadequate as an explanation of the literary facts of the Old Testament that Professor Eerdmans "new development" turns out to be only a fresh examination of the same phenomena with the result that one sees all the more strongly the facts which have led most Bible students of the present generation to accept the documentary theory as it has been so fully developed and vindicated.

What is the meaning of the expression in the report of the spies (Num. 13:32), "It is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof?" I. J. S.

Canaan was the most fertile and desirable portion of the Arabian peninsula. It was common custom of the tribes of the desert to rush in upon this land, gain possession of such of it as they could, and if possible root themselves there. Failing in this attempt, they tried to carry off as much of its produce as they were able. For centuries this had been the practice of the desert dwellers and the result was that waves of invasion had swept in and over the land, leaving their remains in the form of fragmentary groups of different clans and desert tribes. But the land had absorbed all these so that they seemed to disappear in the complex of its inhabitants. So it seemed literally to devour those successive invaders.

What is there of interest or profit for us in the study of the Old Testament, particularly those records of events that must have taken place in very remote ages? L. F.

The value of biblical narratives does not lie in the facts presented. To be sure, the Old Testament is our valuable source book for information regarding the history of the Hebrews. But the prophets who gathered these narratives from their national treasury of remembrance and secured their preservation for us by using them constantly in their preaching which was finally recorded in the prophetic books, realized that such narratives were the best means by which the story of God's dealings with mankind and the ideals which had developed from their experience could be impresed on their own and future generations. The Old Testament is the record of the religious education of one people of antiquity. That people had impressive influence upon the religious thought of the world preceding the days of Jesus. Anything, therefore, that pertains to their experiences, whether it is verifiable as a fact of history, or is valuable for its disclosures of the ideals and hopes of the prophets, is worth preserving and studying by the student who is anxious to know something of the manner in which the Spirit of God has worked in human history to bring man to a competent understanding of the divine will.

Down Where the Chagrin River Flows

Garfield's Birthplace—The Two First Mormon Apostles and Earliest Temple

By George B. Evans

"Down the valley where the Chagrin River flows" are found many historic landmarks, interesting to Disciples of Christ in this Centennial year.

Here in Chagrin Falls are found the tombs of two of the pioneer preachers who served as chief aid-de-camps to Walter Scott in his evangelization of the Western Reserve. I refer to William Hayden and Adamson Bentley. Both names are indelibly written into the early history of scores of our staunchest churches throughout northern Ohio.

The Birthplace of President James A. Garfield.

Birthplace of Garfield

Three miles from the town to the west in the township of Orange is the birthplace of James A. Garfield, the second of our martyr presidents.

The old log house in which the illustrious Garfield was born has long since fallen in ruin and been completely razed. The orchard, however, in which it stood still bears fragrance in spring and fruit in summer.

To the left of the orchard and across the road from it is the old homestead of the Boyntons, in whose possession the farm was for a full century. Only ten years ago the Jacksons secured the place from the Boynton family. Mrs. Jackson's people were lifelong friends of the Garfields, being early acquaintances at Bedford.

Soon after his birth Garfield was taken by his parents to Bedford, a few miles distant from Orange. At the age of ten he returned to the home at Orange, but resided with Mr. Boynton, his uncle.

This house, which young Garfield helped to erect, still stands as does also the barn which has stood across the road from the log cabin birthplace prior to the erection of the Boynton residence.

Description of the Building

The house is a neat, frame, two-story structure built T-shape. With Puritan precision the door is exactly in the middle of the front with two windows on each side exactly balanced. Fine maples and some evergreens make inviting shade about the house. The sod has been taken up from the lawn and stacked in piles to kill myrtle which was planted there years ago.

The place is on crossroads. The sign boards read "14 miles to Cleveland" pointing west, "3 miles to Chagrin Falls," pointing east, "4 miles to Solon," pointing south, and "1½ miles to Orange Center" pointing north.

Garfield lived in this home while attending the Geonga Academy in Chester township in the adjoining county of Geonga. This Academy still exists. It has recently been remodeled, but the half tone is a reproduction of a photo taken before it was remodeled, showing it as it was when Garfield studied in its halls.

Garfield Starts to Hiram College

He still lived in the home of his uncle out in Orange when he started to school at Hiram. Mrs. Jackson informed me that the neighbor who drove him over to Hiram on his first trip thither had just recently died. I saw his home as I went down the road to catch the Eastern Ohio Electric car for Chagrin Falls. This line passes within less than a mile of the birthplace of Garfield.

Following his college career, Mentor became the family home of James A. Garfield, and speaking of Mentor brings up two other historic personages who wrought and taught "down where the Chagrin River flows."

These two were the leading apostles of the Mormon church —Joseph Smith and Sydney Rigdon. They left a lasting impression upon this immediate neighborhood.

South of here Rigdon preached as a pioneer among village of Bainbridge, and later to the north of the Falls at Mentor and Kirtland.

While at Mentor he apostacized from the primitive faith under the spell of the preaching of a traveling Mormon elder, Parley P. Pratt.

First Mormon Temple

Rigdon and Smith soon yoked up, and the book of Mormon was published at Palmyra, N. Y., in 1830. A church was established at Fayette, N. Y., but the Western Reserve was the prophetic land of promise.

The first Mormon temple was erected at Kirtland, Ohio, near to both Willoughby and Mentor. It was dedicated in 1836.

The building still stands, and is much of a curiosity. It is quite imposing with its high tower and mingling of Greek and Egyptian architecture. It cost some fifty thousand dollars and at one time was the shrine for over three thousand worshippers. Today mostly sight-seeing strangers, "gentiles," answer the call of its vesper bell.

Within are three tiers of pulpits of four each, which served one day as spiritual thrones for "the twelve apostles." The seats for "the Israelites" were reversible, so either end of the auditorium could be used for platform purposes.

Hiram and Mormonism

Not only did the church at Kirtland go over to Mormonism, but for a time even Hiram was very nearly won to the faith of the Latter Day Saints.

Symonds Ryder, of Hiram, for years senior elder of that historic church, became a convert of Joseph Smith. Ryder was informed by special revelation that he had been appointed an elder of the Mormon Church. But in his commission his name was misspelled. His eyes were opened, and he rightly reasoned that the Holy Spirit was not so fallible as to fail to spell correctly.

The Hiramites forsook Mormonism faster than they had ever joined the movement, once they saw its deceptive tendency. A band of men who had been made dupes by Smith and Rigdon in March, 1832, went to these apostles' headquarters at Hiram and in the darkness of night took the twain from their beds and tarred and feathered them good, and turned them loose the wiser for their wear and tear.

This was discontinued after it was learned that most of it was spent for arms and ammunition. The ex-queen has become impoverished in attempts to recover crown lands that have reverted to the federal government, and which were never a part of the personal estate of the sovereigns of Hawaii, but belonged to the realm.

The Disciples and Christian Scholarship

The most unseemly and humiliating chapter in the recent history of the Disciples has been the assault made upon modern Christian scholarship and higher educational institutions by a certain newspaper, led by a college professor. It is entirely unaccountable how reasonable and enlightened men could enter into such a crusade of wholesale villification of sober and scientific learning, in view of the ultimate dependence of Protestant Christianity upon Christian scholarship. It is like the folly of undermining the foundations of the house in which one lives, or burning the bridge across a chasm, as worthless or evil, after one has crossed it.

Dependence Upon Scholarship

Protestantism is the religion of a Book, an historic literature. The common man and the multitude are always dependent upon the scholar for access to it. How many Christians have any first-hand acquaintance with the original Greek and Hebrew manuscripts of the Scriptures. What could the average church member do with an autograph copy of the gospel of Mark, if it could be put into his hands? What would the ordinary preacher have done with those priceless bits of parchment discovered by Tischendorf in the Monastery library on Mt. Sinai in 1859? Probably just what the monks were doing with them—using them to kindle fires. But the scholar's trained eye recognized their possible worth, and rescued them from the burning. The result was the preservation to sacred learning and the Christian Church of the Codex Sinaiticus, the second oldest Greek manuscript of the Old and New Testaments.

Yet it was a much hated and calumniated University that trained Tischendorf and made him possible, and with him, the priceless manuscript. This same newspaper and professor, who for nearly a quarter of a century have poured out their vials of hatred and suspicion upon universities, would probably thank God for the discovery of the Codex Sinaiticus, and in the same breath curse the University of Leipsic that trained the discoverer. In one who did not know, such conduct would be excusable; but in a college professor who is supposed to know, such conduct is indefensible.

This is but a slight intimation of the dependence of the simplest believer upon the scholar and the university for the possession and enjoyment of the text of Holy Scripture. But besides the primary task of identification and translation of the manuscripts of the Bible there is the task of interpretation, requiring an even more proficient and learned training of mind, as well as discipline of moral character. Spiritual things are spiritually discerned. For who among men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of the man, which is in him? Even so the things of God none knoweth, save the spirit of God.

Private Interpretation a Failure

The much proclaimed protestant principle of the right of private interpretation of Scripture, has justified itself in Protestant history only when it has been exercised by the exceptionally endowed in mind or spirit; that is, by the few, and not by the many. It may be the right of all to interpret Scripture, but it is the duty and profitable function of only a few. Witness the fantastic absurdities and the more than amusing vagaries of private interpretation in the history of the church from the early Gnostics to the Mormons and Dowieites, and then ask if private interpretation is always sane and profitable. As a right in the abstract we will all all grant it to every man, but in the concrete we will have respect only for the interpretations of competent scholars, or those that agree with the collective wisdom of the whole church. No interpreter of Scripture can safely or reasonably set at naught the concensus of Christian scholarship, or that which has been believed always, everywhere, and by all Christians.

New Testament Must be Interpreted

All this has the most direct bearing upon the chosen task of the Disciples—the restoration of primitive Christianity.

This task sends the Disciples at once to a Book, a literary, historic document. No writer in this Book has, in so many words, answered the question, What is primitive Christianity? What it is must be inferred from many teachings and incidents, by a process of interpretation.

That is the way every great religious teacher and leader, including Alexander Campbell, has obtained his view of Christianity. There have been many interpretations, in many ages and lands, agreeing in the main, but differing in enough important respects, to warrant the establishment of separate parties—so their leaders and founders have thought. Each new religious leader, as he arose, thought the rest of the Christian world in error, and himself alone correct, in his interpretation of primitive Christianity; and each has been willing to disfellowship all others on the basis of his new interpretations. The Campbells and the Disciples have been no exception to the rule.

Whose Christianity?

As the Disciples are brought again face to face with their historic mission, they have to ask themselves the question, Whose interpretation of primitive Christianity are we proposing to restore? Shall it be Luther's, or Swedenborg's, or Wesley's, or Campbell's? If Campbell's, shall it be Campbell's of the Christian Baptist, or of the later Millennial Harbinger? Shall it be the primitive Christianity of Campbell or of Jacob Creath; of Isaac Errett, or of Benjamin Franklin? Each of these teachers went to the same New Testament, but each derived a somewhat different Christianity. So different was the restored Christianity of Isaac Errett from that of Benjamin Franklin that the latter advised his followers to have no fellowship with the followers of the former. The process of separation began in the lifetime of these leaders, and has developed into a permanent division. At least two different kinds of primitive Christianity have been propagated among the Disciples, with the probability that a third or fourth will follow. Whose Christianity shall the Disciples permanently restore?

Elements of Primitive Christianity

The question is constantly being opened anew, What was primitive Christianity; what belonged essentially to it? The following elements have been declared at one time or another by leaders among the Disciples, to be essential and permanent parts of primitive Christianity:

1. A confession of faith;
2. A form and doctrine of baptism;
3. A manner of life;
4. A form of church organization;
5. An order of worship;
6. A method of missionary work;
7. A time and place of communion;
8. A form of appellation.

These are but the more familiar forms of apostolic custom urged as perpetually binding upon the church by leaders of the Disciples during the course of their history. In the early days there were not wanting efforts to introduce feet-washing and the holy kiss as essential parts of primitive Christianity, and a few churches were disturbed by serious debate over the attitude of prayer, the hour of the day for eating the Lord's Supper, the chemical nature of the wine to be used, the propriety of a sermon, or even a benediction, after the supper, the necessity of the loud amen to all the public prayers, the number of deacons in a congregation, the holy kiss, etc."

It was the influence of two or three of the great leaders that turned the mind of the churches against such practices as feet-washing, the holy kiss, and mutual exhortations, as essential elements of primitive Christianity. The churches finally arrived at a general agreement in practice through earnest inquiry and debate. It is safe to say that all serious internal controversy has been waged upon this one question: What are the essentials and what are the non-essentials of primitive Christianity? This was the question at issue in the organ and missionary society controversy, and of all recent controversies within the ranks of the Disciples—the federation, higher criticism, and centennial program controversies.

Problem Not Settled

The Disciples have not yet finally settled the problem. They have generally agreed not to regard a form of church organization, an order of public worship, a method of missionary work, a time and place of the communion, as necessary elements of primitive Christianity. But they still hold quite generally to a confession of faith, a form of baptism, a frequency of communion, a congregational name, and a manner of life, as essential parts of a true Christianity. They have gradually given up every other primitive Christian custom, as non-essential.

Two things are increasing the sharpness of this inquiry; the new feeling of obligation for the unity of the church, and the answer of Christian scholarship to the fundamental question of the Disciples, What is primitive Christianity?

Concerning the first men are saying: If alienation and separation among Christians is sinful, how can the Disciples justify their persistent growth and organization in separation from other Christians? Just how much doctrinal or ceremonial error in other Christians can justify the Disciples in excluding them from fellowship in their churches?

Inquiry of Modern Scholarship

Concerning the second, it is to be noted as an interesting and important fact that one of the leading occupations of Christian scholarship during the last century has been with respect to the sources and nature of primitive Christianity. Have the inquiries of English and German scholarship had no bearings upon the cherished mission of the Disciples? Can they ignore what the great books have been steadily saying for fifty years concerning the essence of Christianity? Where their message has confirmed the faith and practice of the Disciples they have been quick to cite them and recommend their reading. What shall they do with the conclusions that run counter to their position?

The concensus of Christian scholarship as it is appearing in libraries from the presses of the great publishing houses, is gradually forming the mind of Christendom. These are the books being sold in the book stores, and placed in the public libraries. The rising generation of young ministers and church members are reading them. It is of no little concern to the Disciples what they are saying about primitive Christianity. It is to audiences prepared by such books that their ministers are delivering their sermons. Can the world's scholarship be entirely mistaken in its interpretation of primitive Christianity?

The Veteran's Campfire in Pittsburgh

The Old Guard Reviewing the Days of Yore

The Address of President L. L. Carpenter

This is a camp-fire of the veterans of the great Restoration movement, now one hundred years old. The fact that we are veterans, and this is a camp-fire, indicates that we are all soldiers, and this is true with regard to all of us.

Many long years ago, when most of us were young we heard the trumpet-call of the fathers calling for men to enlist as soldiers in the army of our God. We listened to the call, and with faith in the great Captain, and love and devotion to the cause, we enlisted in the army of the King. We enlisted to fight, not with carnal weapons to fight in a carnal war; but to fight the good fight that we might help to beat back the armies of the aliens, to win souls to Christ, to capture the world for the King, and to help hasten the day when the kingdoms of this world should become the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ and the whole earth shall be filled with his glory.

We believed then, and we believe yet, that if that happy day shall ever come, that it will be when the pure, sweet, simple gospel, once revealed by the Holy Spirit and preached by men whose tongues were fired with the inspiration of the living God, shall be lovingly preached to every kindred and nation and tribe and tongue in all the wide, wide world.

The Soldier's Oath.

As soldiers we took a solemn oath to be true to our divine Captain, and faithful in the work he called us to do.

First, he clothed us with the divine armor. Our loins were girt about with truth, the truth as it is in Jesus Christ, our Lord. And then he placed upon us the breastplate of righteousness, and shod our feet with the preparation of the gospel of peace. He gave us the shield of faith, and the helmet of salvation. Thus we were clothed with the divine armor, with the exception of our backs. No provision at all was made to clothe our backs, which indicated that we were never to turn our backs on the enemy. Then he gave us weapons of warfare with which to fight. Not a sword of steel or a musket or rifle, but the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints.

Thus clothed, and with these weapons, most of us more than fifty years ago went out into the world to fight this good fight of faith, that we might lay hold on eternal life.

What They Believed.

Fifty years ago there was but a small constituency back of these veterans. But fifty years ago the veterans believed that the Bible was the word of God. They believed that all the Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the men of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

They believed that the word of God is and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword. They believe that it revealed the gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation, and that in that gospel is revealed the righteousness of God from faith to faith; as it is written, "The just shall live by faith."

They believed this fifty years ago; they have believed it during all these years; they believe it now. And so they went forth to conquer the world for Christ. They have passed through many a hard conflict; they have made great sacrifices, but their faith has never failed them. They have never faltered in the good work that the Master has called them to do. Christ strengthening them, they have gained wonderful victories; they have come off than conquerors.

Their constituency has increased from a little handful to more than a million and a quarter. They are sending the gospel from sea to sea; they will send it from the rivers to the end of the earth. For

"Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Does his successive journeys run.
His kingdom stretch from shore to shore,
Till sun shall rise and set no more."

The highest honor that God ever conferred upon the veterans here assembled was in permitting them to be soldiers in this splendid army, and to battle for the right; to beat back the powers of sin and darkness, and to hasten the day when the knowledge of God shall cover the earth as the waters cover the great deep.

The Note of Hope.

Comrades, we come here to-day, not to lay our armor down, not to ask a discharge from the army, not to pass the good work over entirely to others, but we come together to greet each other in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ our Lord; to tell of our conflict, our sacrifices and of our work; to rejoice in the victories that God has given us.

We come to lay our hands together, and to lay them all in the hand of the great Captain, and to pledge him that in the future, as in the past, we will be loyal to him, and that we will in the future, as we have in the past, do what we can to help win the world to Christ.

We all greatly rejoice that a great army of young soldiers have enlisted to continue the good work that we are engaged in. God bless the young preachers, and may they do a much greater work than we have done.

Fifty years from now, if God shall spare their lives, they will be veterans and will come together to greet each other, and to tell of battles fought and victories won. It will be a greater meeting than ours to-day.

Let us pray that in the next fifty years the old, old story may be told to all the people in all the nations of the globe; and that kings and queens and emperors and presidents shall have bowed the knee before Jesus Christ:

"Jesus the name high over all,
In hell or earth or sky;
Angels and men before it fall,
And devils fear and fly."

A Picture of the Veteran's Campfire Mee

Then,

"Soldiers of Christ arise,
And put your armor on,
Strong in the strength that God supplies
Through his beloved Son."

It will be but a little while and each one of us will receive our final discharge, and from soldiers we will become kings and priests to God and to the Lamb forever.

God grant, when we have fought our last battle, and come to the end of the journey, and our feet shall dip in the cold river, that each one of us may be able to say "that I am now ready to be offered; that I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give to me at that day, and not to me only, but to all them also that love his appearing."

And may we all hear the Captain say, Well done, good and faithful soldiers. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

The Address of J. W. McGarvey

Fathers and mothers in Israel: No words that I have been able to command can fully express my thoughts and emotions on this occasion. I am awed by the fact that my days have been prolonged to eighty years, not by reason of strength, as said the palmist, for I have never been strong, but by reason of manifold favors at the hand of my God and Father I am further awed by this great gathering of the faithful, reminding me of that other of which we sing:

"At the sounding of the trumpet when the saints shall gather home,
And greet each other by the Crystal Sea.
With our friends and all our loved ones there awaiting us to come,
What a gathering of the faithful that will be!"

And now that I stand here, by the favor of your venerable president, to make a somewhat formal address to an assembly of travel-worn pilgrims, every one of whom has rounded out the allotted thereescore years and ten, how shall I address you? If such an assembly ever convened before, the fact has escaped my knowledge.

Before Ripened Years.

I can not addres you as I have many hundreds of other congregations, with warnings and entreaties respecting the perils of an untried way stretching before unsteady feet, for all these lie now in the past of your experience. You have been fighting the good fight of faith for, lo these many years, and the victor's crown is now almost in sight. You have passed through many deep waters, but the rivers of sorrow have not overwhelmed you. In your fiery trials the flames have not hurt you, "their only design, your dross to consume, and your gold to refine." When you and I were yet young, we learned to sing:

"Through many dangers, toils and snares
We have already come;
"Tis grace has brought us safe thus far,
And grace shall lead us home."

We sang these lines then with little knowledge of their meaning. Now we know it all, and we trust as never before their gracious assurance. The grace that has lead us through our short future; and have we not sung a thousand times:

"The soul that on Jesus has leaned for repose,
I will not, I can not desert to his foes;
That soul, though all hell should endeaver to shake,
I'll never, no never, no never forsake."

Cannot Surrender.

It has become a custom to style you, and others like you, "The Old Guard," taking the figure, like some of Paul's metaphors, from military phraseology. When Napoleon's Old Guard were being slaughtered, and almost annihilated, at Waterloo, a generous British officer cried out to their commander, "Surrender and save the lives of your brave men." But the answer came back, "The Old Guard can die, but they can not surrender." So it is with you. You can die, and you are dying rapidly, but the word "surrender" is not in your vocabulary. Your foes are the world, the flesh and the devil. The world is losing its hold on you; the flesh is growing weak, and you will soon have your heels on the head of that old serpent, the devil.

"For, oh, we stand on Jordan's strand;
Our friends are passing over;
And just before, the shining shore
We may almost discover."

We are growing old. We are already old; but we are not like leafless trees standing here and there in an old field whence all their early companions have been cut away. We are not like the Irish poet who so sadly sang:

"When I remember all the friends so linked together
I've seen around me fall like leaves in wintry weather,
I feel like one who treads along some banquet hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled, whose garlands dead, and all but me departed."

No, though all of us are older than that poet was, and have seen failing around us many more friends than he did, and they are still falling faster than ever, none of us is alone; for we are members of a great, growing family, and younger brothers and sisters have constantly sprung up to take the places of the older, and we are daily drawing nearer to the hour when all the worthy whom we have lost, will be restored to us to remain with us forever:

"One army of the living God,
To his command we bow;
Part of the host have crossed the flood,
And part are crossing now."

Did you ever sing in the olden time, at the close of some happy and successful meeting, while every hand in the audience was clasped in another,

"How sweet the hours have passed away
Since we met here to sing and pray!
But, pilgrims in a foreign land,
We oft must take the parting hand."
"O blessed day, O glorious hope!
My soul exulteth at the thought
When in that holy, happy land,
We'll take no more the parting hand."

When I was a boy, and lying sick on a pallet in my mother's room one summer day, I heard two Christian women who were on a visit to my mother, teaching her a new hymn which I have never seen in print. I remember none of it except the chorus, and that I can never forget. It ran thus:

"What! never part again! No! never part again!
There, we shall meet at Jesus' feet,
And never, never part again."

Those three women have long since met at Jesus' feet, and I fondly hope, after a little while, to hear them sing that song again.

You all know something of Uncle Sammy Rogers, one of the most heroic, both living and dying, of our Kentucky pioneers. After he was eighty-four years of age, he made a

The world, it seems, must be a place of rush and madd'ning strife,
Where selfish war and violence, and brutal strength gain precedence,
And he is but a dreaming fool who leads a simple life.
If jostling be the price of gain, and pomp and glare the prize,
I'd rather be a dreamer then, and leave that goal for other men
Who, having ears refuse to hear and see not, having eyes.
I may be held incompetent and pointed to with scorn,
For pausing in the hurried rush, to feel the breath of nature's hush,
And hear the call of life more real, that is from heaven born.
Though they have gained material wealth, when life is almost through They'll understand at last that men gain peace from God alone, and then Each one, I think, will wish that he had been a dreamer, too.

Buck

PAUL TRIEM.

Larry had snapped the last tug that bound his four-horse team to the great construction van, and had buckled the lines and looped them around the whip socket, when a boy touched his elbow.

"Mr. Stevens wants to see you in the office before you go out," the youngster said. He paused and looked curiously at Larry. "It's about Buck," he added. Even through the muffling of his heavy mackinaw coat, sudden rigid lines showed how the cords and muscles in the driver's arms drew tense in response to this fragment of news. Larry's eyes grew hard, and a film of moisture stood out over his chin and forehead.

Mr. Stevens nodded to him as he clumped across the office in his high topped shoes. Something of the driver's uneasiness seemed to have communicated itself to this man at the desk, and he cleared his throat a couple of times before he spoke.

"The inspectors went through the stable last night," he began abruptly. "And—Buck's got to go. They say he's outlived his usefulness and isn't in shape to stand the work any longer. He'll probably be auctioned off the first of the month." Larry nodded. There wasn't much to say, and he was rather surprised that the superintendent should be so much disturbed over the incident—surely it was nothing to him. He had not driven Buck three hundred days a year for the past eight years.

Silently he turned to leave the office, but Mr. Stevens' voice followed him. "If you care to try your luck with the directors?" he suggested. "There's nothing that I could say that would help matters any—but you—you know the horse better than I do. I've just got what you'd call a speaking acquaintance." Larry turned back. "I suppose that's all talk about auctioning him," he said dully. "After the trouble he's been through here, the only thing left to do is to kill him. "That's about the size of it, isn't it?" Mr. Stevens remained silent, but his eyes admitted the truth. "Well, there's nothing I could say that would change it any. You know them as well as I do—better of course. I just know—Buck."

Larry walked abruptly out of the office. It was no place for a man of his age, with gray hair already showing about his temples, to make a show of himself. He went down to where the van was standing and climbed up to his seat. The square columns of structural iron which he was to take around the point on the lake to where a club house was being built, had been loaded the evening before. As Larry drove slowly along the planked alley that led out to the main thoroughfare, the stable boss called after him.

"Look out for the Grant street bridge, Larry—there've been log booms washed under it so many times during the rains, that they say it isn't very safe."

Larry cracked his whip, and the lead team settled into the collar. Buck and his fellow wheel horse were already straining ahead and working for a footing—there was half a block of rather steep grade before the van would be on a level street. Larry sat back and watched the big yellow-brown horse below him. That was Buck, every time. He had brains—he took advantage of each crevice and depression, carrying himself forward steadily, like the experienced old warrior he was. But—his side of the double tree sagged occasionally, in spite of him, and once or twice Larry had to speak to him. You never had to strike Buck, old and worn though he was. Larry came back to the superintendent's suggestion. Was there anything he could say to the stockholders of the company, in whose hands the life of Buck now lay? Anything—anything—he would be willing to give up his right hand if that would save the old horse. No. He knew the men who controlled the company—brisk, sharp-eyed, merciless toward men and beast, there one question was, "How will this effect dividends?" That was the balance in which Buck had been placed—and he had weighed light. Larry was glad the wheeling was so bad. It made him keep his wits on the road ahead, made him figure and scheme lest he be caught with his load in one of the bottomless mud pockets which lay in the unpaved street along which he was now traveling. He zigzagged back and forth, giving his attention mostly to the lead team; the wheelers he could count on. He had left the straggling outskirts of the city, and ahead stretched the Grant street bridge. He wondered who had spoken to him of this particular spot, lately. Then the barn foreman's warning came to him, and at the foot of the approach he pulled up to reconnoiter. The Grant street bridge was really a half mile section of Grant street, built over the lake, boarded and piled and apparently as solid as the beach itself. It lay out from the shore some hundred and fifty yards, running parallel with it. Larry stooped far over the low railing on the shore side and peered under. Everything seemed all right—there was a formidable array of stout posts and criss-cross timbers. "Ought to hold up a locomotive," the driver muttered. "Anyhow, here goes—we've got to get across, and I don't exactly see how we are to fly."

He climbed back to his seat and clicked at the horses. The approach was planked and rather slippery, but they made it after a few seconds of scrambling. Larry noticed that Buck was puffing when they got up the planked road above the water. He didn't think much about the boss' warning. Starr was always telling him to look out for dangers that never materialized—and anyhow he had to go ahead. The thick planks echoed under the horses' hoofs with a reassuring distinctness and resistance. No fear of their giving way.

He was half way across and had come just opposite a fisherman's cabin, on the beach, when there came to him the impression that the ground and the lake and the flat surface of the bridge were heaving up toward the level on which he was sitting. There was a crash of splintered timbers, the shrill whinnies of terrified horses—and Larry bumped the top of the hooded van as the water settled about him and bobbed him up, like a floating cork. He hadn't realized that he and his rig and horses were really going through the bridge, but there was something grimly convincing about the icy clutch of the water. Strangling, choking, coughing, striving to spit the fiery fluid he had sucked into his lungs out again, he hauled himself from the van by catching the forward end of the hood.

Next moment he was above the water. His eyes cleared after a few seconds and he saw one of the wheel horses splashing away toward the shore—by some freak of luck it had been torn free from the rig and its companions. The lead team fought and strained at the straps that bound them; and Buck—at first Larry thought the old horse had gone down; then he saw him, his wide-set eyes and soft muzzle just above the surface. Larry let down and found that he could stand on the submerged hood and still keep his head above water. He stripped off his coat, then dropped foreward and paddled close to the lead team. It took him perhaps three minutes to free them—they lashed out frantically, but the straps that held them were close to the surface. With Buck it was different. his head was just out of water, and evidently he was bound still to the douole tree at the base of the tongue. Larry paddled helplessly about for a moment, then turned his face toward shore and was soon pounding over the hard beach in the direction of the cabin. A man within sat mending a net when Larry threw open the door. you! Come down to the beach as quick as you know how—get your boat out and help me. It's a case of life or death!"

He saw that he had made an impression, even before he turned to race back. At the edge of the water he paused just long enough to unlace and kick off his soggy shoes. Buck's head was still above the surface, but his nostrils were stretched wide and the foam that came bubbling and seething up showed how frantic was the effort that sustained him.

"Hold on, old boy," cried Larry, as he swam up alongside and paddled about, just out of reach.

The fisherman and his boat came to within twenty-five yards before the man stopped rowing and checked the progress of his craft with a deft back sweep of his oars. "Thought you said this was a matter of life or death," he shouted.

"Don't stop to talk—throw me that rope. Don't stop, I say—this is life or death, all right, and don't you make any mistake!"

The fellow paddled closer, then stood up and swung a coil of water stained rope about his head. It struck close to Larry, and the teamster had it in his knotty hands without an instant's delay. He wanted to slip it under the work collar which Buck wore, and then, with the assistance of the fisherman, to try to pull the horse out. He approached carefully, sank for an instant, then came up, his face rigid with despair; the collar was drawn so close to the horse's swelling neck that he could not find space enough to pass a pack thread under it; he could not even work his fingers under. The man in the boat was leaning on his boat hook. "Give me that," cried Larry. He had it, five seconds later, and was prodding down beside the almost exhausted horse, trying to locate the cockeyes, and so release the tugs. He could find them—but the straps were tight as bow strings, and refused to budge. Larry let the boat hook float away from him, handle up, while he trod water and tried to think. He had thrust his open knife into a side pocket of his shirt. There was only one chance, and if that failed, he would probably go down with Buck. He swam around in front of the horse, steadied himself for an instant, and dove beneath and to the side. Once he touched the horse's flank; then he caught a strap and slashed at it. It parted and Buck swung away from him, half freed. The water was seething up, carrying with it so much mud and litter that Larry didn't venture to open his eyes. He reached frantically before him, swinging his arm in a wide circle—and catching in his groping hand the second tug.

A moment later he came up, puffing and dizzy, with a thousand muffled drums beating in his ears. Buck was striking out slowly and painfully for the shore, and the man with the boat condescended to come to Larry's assistance. Larry didn't wait to catch the three horses that had made their escape first. He walked up to Buck, where the big fellow stood dripping and shivering, and took the drooping head between his hands. "We made it, old boy," he sobbed.

He had blanketed the horse and was rubbing him down, throwing the covering back from one flank at a time, when the superintendent hurried out. Mr. Stevens was pale, and his little gray eyes peered from his bushy whiskers like fire built in the brush. "Larry," he said, He touched the driver's shoulder. "Why, man, you're wet to the skin!"

"The water was wet," Larry admitted. "Say, Mr. Stevens, there was a reporter in here a few minutes ago, wanting to know all about Buck and how I happened to think so much of him. I didn't tell him anything, but he's coming back this afternoon. Do you think the directors might be induced to change their minds about Buck? It wouldn't make good reading, his story wouldn't—leastwise, not the way they want to finish it."

Mr. Stevens nodded absently. Then his eyes snapped and he spoke. "When they shoot Buck, they can close down this factory," said he. "People would burn them out—and I'd lead the mob!"

He turned to stroke the old horse's nose, so that he might not see Larry rubbing his eyes with the cloth with which he had been scouring Buck.

tour of the places at which he had preached, to bid his converts a final farewell. On his return home, he wrote the closing paragraph of his autobiography, which read as follows: "I have now well-nigh spoken all my farewells on earth, and shall soon begin shaking hands with the loved ones gone before. And though I know not where those greetings shall end, yet I do knew where they shall begin. I shall first of all greet my Father whose hand has led me all the journey through and my Saviour whose grace has been sufficient for me in every day of trial and suffering. And next, I shall look around for her whose love and goodness have imposed on me a debt of gratitude to God I can never repay. When we meet, shall we not gather up the children and grandchildren and sit down in the shadow of the throne, and rest?"

When the old hero finally came to his last night on earth, his son, John, from whose lips I learned the story aroused him from a deep stupor, and said: "Father, the doctor asks me to tell you that he thinks you will die before morning." The father who was quite deaf, demanded in a loud voice, "What is that, John?" "The doctor thinks you will die before morning." "What! that soon? That is soner than I expected. John, shall I really see your mother before morning?" "So the doctor thinks." "Then glory be to God." And these were his last words.

When you and I were young, we learned to admire the closing line of Thanatopsis, which was then a new poem:

"So live that when thy summons comes
To join the innumerable caravan
Which moves to that mysterious realm
Where each takes up his chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not as a galley slave at night, cowered to his dungeon,
But, sustained and soothed by an unfaltering trust,
Approach thy grave as one who wraps the drapery of his couch around him
And lies down to pleasant dreams."

But we also learned and loved the more majestic lines of that now neglected hymn:

"You saints who once languished below,
But long since have entered your rest;
I pant to be glorified too
To lean on Emmanuel's breast.

"Though dreary the empire of night,
I soon shall emerge from its gloom
And see immortality's light
Arise from the shades of the tomb.

"Then welcome the last rending sighs,
When these aching heartstrings shall break;
When death shall extinguish these eyes,
And moisten with dew the pale cheek.

"No terror the prospect begets.
I'm not mortalit's slave;
The sunbeam of life, as it sets.
Leaves a halo of peace o'er the grave."

My beloved brethren and sisters, the most of us shall soon give one another the parting hand for the last time in all eternity; for when we meet again, it will be where parting is no more. "God be with you till we meet again."

The Duty of Abstinence*

The Epistle to the Romans is Paul's great document in vindication of the gospel of Christ, as over against the law of ceremonies by which the Jews had believed themselves able to obtain salvation. The theme of the epistle might well be given as "Justification by Faith," that is, faith in the personal Saviour, Jesus, whose leadership is to be accepted, whose life is to be imitated, whose atoning work is to be enjoyed. Paul had discovered in his own experiences that no acts of piety, such as fasting or the observance of the ritual of law, brought peace to his heart. It was only his acquaintance with Jesus, the divine friendship with that crucified and risen Lord whom he learned to adore, that could satisfy his heart.

He wrote the Epistle to the Romans during the three months of his stay in Corinth just previous to his departure on the last journey to Jerusalem. The letter seems to have been the most formal and carefully prepared document that Paul ever wrote. It has little of the appearance of haste and anxiety that marked others of his writings. It is very much like the Epistle to the Galatians in its theme; but is radically different from that document in its more restrained tone and the absence of those elements of personal anxiety that makes the style of the Galatians so vibrant and uneven.

Paul's Hope to Visit Rome

It is not unlikely that this epistle was actually sent to several other churches beside the one at Rome. The closing chapters seem to contain final words to at least three different churches, the most notable of which is apparently the church at Ephesus, many of whose members are named in Romans 16. But the first draft of the letter was almost certainly intended for the church at Rome, as Paul's record in 1:15 clearly shows. At the time he wrote it he was looking forward with eagerness to some subsequent journey to the Eternal City, and he hoped at that time that he might soon see the church which had already been founded there, and which neither he nor Peter had as yet visited. The Roman tradition that Peter was the founder of the church in Rome is baseless, but it is probably true that both Peter and Paul visited the church at some period later in their lives. This the almost unanimous traditions of the church affirm.

The Epistle to Rome

The Roman epistle, so logical and progressive in its emphasis upon the great truths of the gospel, need not be analyzed in this study. It has occupied the greatest minds of the church throughout the centuries. Augustine and Calvin both reveled in his majestic truths. Its argument is that all men rest under the condemnation of sin because their hearts are estranged from the love of God; that in this regard the Jews have no advantages over the Gentiles; and that both alike must depend upon the saving work of Jesus if they are to attain the new life of happiness and peace. The glory of the Christian life then becomes the apostle's theme, and in the close of the epistle the practical duties which grow out of this relationship to the Lord are discussed.

Our lesson is a temperance study: not that Paul was concerned in his Epistle to the Romans with the problem which now confronts us, of driving the saloon out of business, but because the principle which he states is universal in its application. In that age there was no such thing as a legalized saloon. To be sure, there were men who sold wine; that was considered one of the common trades in the Roman empire, and drunkenness was one of the sins of which men were guilty at times. Of this fact there are many indications in the New Testament. But it was no organized, consolidated, aggressive, unscrupulous traffic in intoxicating liquors. If a man drank to excess, it was his own fault and the consequences fell upon himself and his immediate kindred. But there was no force that was urging him downward by inciting him to further and further indulgence.

The Liquor Traffic

It is this condition of an organized liquor traffic, remorseless and defiant, that confronts the Christian world today. The result is that a large company of our fellowmen are victims to this traffic. Their health is ruined, their natures are brutalized, their homes are destroyed, and in one way or another they become charges to the state either as incompetents or criminals. Even where men indulge to what is called a moderate degree, a vast amount of unhappiness is produced. And the conscience of Christendom has been greatly aroused, until today the battle is on along the whole line.

The Higher Principle

It is clear that Paul's principle of abstinence for the sake of others needs fresh emphasis in the church and in society today. There are many people who insist that they can partake to a moderate degree of wine, beer or other intoxicants and neither be harmed themselves nor cause other people trouble. This is no doubt true in many instances. But there is a larger principle involved. It seems to be impossible for the nation to permit the sale of intoxicants and not pay the penalty which the abuse of the system inevitably entails. Those who are strong, therefore, have a duty to those who are weak. One is responsible not only for his own conduct, but in large degree for the conduct of those who are influenced by his life. To put a stumbling block in the way of another by insisting upon privileges which that other one cannot face without falling, is to invite such a condemnation of one's own life as can find no compensation in the indulgence which is sought.

Idol Meats

Paul speaks in this lesson particularly of the custom of eating meats that had been offered to idols in the heathen temples. Many of the Jews regarded this as a grievous sin. There were some of the Christians who thought it a matter of indifference and pleaded with Paul that they ought not to be held down by the weak consciences of others. Paul recognized the fact that neither eating nor refusing to eat certain kinds of food was a mark of Christian character, but he insisted that there were those who would be distinctly scandalized by any such indulgence on the part of others, and for their sakes he pleaded that the strong might not disturb the peace of their brethren.

How much more true this is of the matter of drink every one today knows very well. The complete parallel fails at the very point where the ruin and distress which strong drink works in the world become evident. If a man ought to abandon the use of certain kinds of food which are obnoxious to his neighbors, how much more ought he to give up the use of that which is a deadly enemy to the entire community, even though it did him no harm!

The Duty of the Hour

But this is only the first consideration. The second is more important. The community as a whole must deal with this evil, the drink traffic. It is only by taking strong measures that the Christian conscience can assert itself and the ruin which has threatened the republic through the invasion of the products of breweries and distilleries can be avoided. If the men who are in this business have no concern for public welfare, it is time the Christian forces unite to insist upon it. And the wave of temperance sentiment which is now sweeping over the country is nothing less than magnificent. Many of the states have enacted compulsory prohibition laws and are enforcing them with success. Wherever this is accomplished a new day dawns for every kind of business and every grade of society.

The Campaign in Chicago

Those parts of the country which have not yet gained this victory are struggling toward it with all the powers at their command. Even great cities are rousing themselves to a life and death struggle to crush out the saloon. Chicago is now planning for such a campaign in the spring. It seems nothing less than magnificently audacious to attempt to overthrow the liquor traffic in a city that is perhaps its greatest stronghold. Yet there can only be one issue in the end: the saloon must go. If it can be destroyed by one campaign, so much the better; if it requires further effort, it will still be the means of training the forces of righteousness in unity and aggressiveness. The only defeat that can come to those who love law, order and sobriety is the shame of failing to fight.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

TOPIC FOR NOVEMBER 17.
OUR DUTY TO THE POOR.

Ps. 41:1; Prov. 14:21; Acts 6:1; II Cor. 8:9; Jas. 2:1-6; 5:4.

One of our first and most important duties to the poor is to discover the causes of their poverty. We cannot entertain the view that the poor man is necessarily an object of the divine displeasure and that his poverty is the result of his sin. In the table of causes of poverty given in "The Encyclopedia of Social Reform" those indicating misconduct average only 21.3 per cent of the total number. Other causes are "orphans abandoned, neglect by relatives, no male support, lack of employment, insufficient employment, poorly-paid employment, unhealthy or dangerous employment, ignorance of English, accident, sickness or death in the family, physical defect, insanity, and old age." Mr. Charles Booth counts twenty principal causes of pauperism: "Crime vice, drink, laziness, mental disease, temper, incapacity, early marriage, large family, extravagance, lack of work, trade misfortune, restlessness, no relations, death of husband, desertion, death of father or mother, sickness, accident, ill luck, old age. As causes, old age stands first, sickness next, then comes drink." Correct diagnosis precedes the scientific treatment of disease.

Poor Relief.

As citizens and as members of the church we ought to be informed concerning the methods employed by the state and the church to relieve the destitute. The interest we show when we have a friend whom we wish to have put in charge of the country farm or a neighbor whose poverty and misery compel us to take measures for his relief in order to save the good name of the community is not the sort of interest that is worthy of patriotic citizens and intelligent Christians. We ought to know how the counties care for the poor and we ought to be ready for suggestions as to improved methods of conducting institutions of charity. The low grade politician is always on the lookout for sources of revenue and he steals from the fund for public charity if the people are off their guard for a moment. The fact that a private institution appeals to us for financial support on the ground that it is a refuge for the poor does not do away with the necessity for inquiring whether it is properly conducted and whether there is any real need for it. Our help should be the expression of enlightened sympathy. As long as the amount we give depends almost wholly upon the ability of an institution's representative to describe the woes of orphans and unprotected old people our contributions to the relief of poverty cannot be put under the head of deeds fully moral.

The Church and the Poor.

Has the time come for the church to confine its efforts in behalf of the poor to the teaching of the gospel of service to the needy? It has been proposed that the responsibility of providing food, shelter, clothing, and medical treatment shall be left entirely to the state. The state has its institutions for the dependent, defective, and delinquent classes. All the people of the state assist in the support of these institutions. Why should some of the people burden themselves to provide for the wards of all the people? Now it may well be that in the evolution of society the state will assume all responsibility for the care of the poor. Christian people who fear that the church will lose influence if it does not have its system of poor relief are needlessly alarmed. The success of the church in education led to its abandoning to the state its schools for the training of children. The church has not lost power because it no longer controls the schools. Nor will it have reason to regret the passing away of its orphanages and its homes for the aged if society as a whole undertakes, in the spirit of Jesus, to educate the orphan and to minister to helpless old age. But at the present the church has much to do for the relief of poverty. Every congregation has some whom it is under obligation to help. The institutions supported by the church have abundant reasons for their existence. We can leave to the future the matter of their permanent usefulness. Their present usefulness is evident and our present duty with reference to them is equally evident.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

"THE BLESSINGS OF A GRATEFUL HEART."

Topic November 21. Neb. 8:8-12.

Gratitude is a grace to be acquired, and not an endowment with which we are born. It is an attitude of heart which may be assumed and should be maintained. It is an unmistakable mark of a genial soul. The man with a grateful heart possesses to a greater or less degree, the kindred graces of sympathy and kindness, patience and long suffering, forgiveness and love. Men with such souls move the world upward and onward. Nehemiah and the prophets who lived and wrought before him were of this type. Our Good Shepherd gave his life for us because of his compassion. Paul so loved his Jewish brethren that he was willing to become accursed for them. William Carey would hear no protests from his friends nor be worn out by the indifference of his day. John Williams gave his life in an attempt to shed light upon the islands of the sea which were lost in darkness. Our own Brother Wharton of India, died alone on the field to save the companionship of a fellow missionary. Dr. Macklin, a giant in his profession, has bestowed it all upon China. H. H. Guy one of the brightest and best men in all that Empire stayed in Japan until the sickness of his family drove him home. Royal Dye, the statesman missionary to Africa, did not count it too much to leave his wife and dear ones at home, while he declares in letters of living light his message to the perishing Bantu. Think you these choice spirits could ever have performed such tasks but for hearts made grateful by God's undeserved love to them expressed by the kindly minister of His servants? These men themselves would say that their efforts were but feeble attempts to pay something of a debt of gratitude for the Father's benevolence to them.

Sympathy and Gratitude.

Moreover the grateful heart is always sympathetic. Sympathy is essential to gratitude. We cannot think of them apart. We do not speak kindly of the person or thing for which we have no sympathy. But where it abounds nothing is impossible. It has sent Maude Ballington Booth all over this broad land like an angel of mercy to the prisoners of our jails and penitentiaries with her words of sympathy and gifts of love, and then out on the lecture platform to teach us that self-evident but neglected truth, that criminals are not to be punished but reformed. It has sent rescue workers into the slums and missions of the great cities who with their strong arms lift up the fallen and speak words of healing as they point them to a better way. Who are those people who labor for reform measure—better conditions of labor, shorter hours, sanitary environment at homes and in the shop; urge the protection of children; insist upon food and adequate wages? Are they not those whose hearts beat strong with human sympathy? Oh, for the time to come when men who sit in council chambers and directors' meetings, in committee rooms and legislative hall, in executive chairs and on the bench, shall have the same human motives. Then will much sorrow be turned to joy and the reformer can make his contribution to human progress by working at a constructive task.

Finds Joy Everywhere.

The grateful heart constantly interprets his environment; his native land, the protection of his government, its liberty and its opportunity, are occasions for thanksgiving. The home—the place of his birth, the shelter of his childhood, the early instruction and the old but true ideals which have become the chart and compass of his life are objects of profound gratitude. Again he rejoices that he has friends. Their patience with him, willingness to forgive and forget, their loyalty in times of need, and his helplessness without them—all this moves him deeply. In spite of its hardships his life is joyous and he sings:

"Whene'er I take my walks abroad
How many poor I see;
What shall I render to My God
For all His gifts to me?"

Gratitude Saves From Bitterness.

We have all seen souls grow bitter in rebellion at inevitable calamities. Temperamentally and by practice such hearts are not grateful. They are their own sorest affliction. Gratitude helps us to endure hardships. J. Z. Tyler has been an invalid for years but if you step into his room and ask him how he is, he will reply, "Oh, I'm all right, How are you?" Henry Drummond suffered a long time with a cancer but he made it a practice to anticipate the expressed sympathy of his friends, when they called, with a good lively story. N. J. Aylesworth was an intense sufferer from rheumatism. He could not sit up in bed and his fingers were so drawn that he could scarcely use a pencil. But his brain was clear and active, and during this time he blessed the brotherhood with some of its best literature. He often said that his affliction might have been worse and that he never could have written as he did had he remained in the active ministry. He had reached the point where:

"Sometimes there comes an hour of calm;
Grief turns to blessings, pain to balm;
A power that works above my will Leads me onward upwards still;
To thank Thee for the things I miss."
Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

—Edwin Ginn, the big Boston publisher, will contribute $50,000 annually to the peace cause during the rest of his life. After his death $1,000,000 of his fortune will become available for that of universal peace.

—Dr. J. V. N. Standish, of Galesburg, Ill., who was for many years President of Lombard College, was presented with a loving cup by the people of Galesburg on October 13. Dr. Standish is in his eighty-fifth year. He recently bequeathed all of his money to Knox College.

Church Life

State Missions have right of way this month.

The responsibility for the missionary offering rests with the pastor. The church's record is the pastor's record.

All our rejoicing over the great convention at Pittsburg will loose its meaning for us unless it makes us more faithful in every missionary obligation of the church.

These days sandwiched in between the Centennial Convention and the winter holidays are precious ones in the work of the church. Soon, very soon, the attention of our churches will be directed to the holiday festivities, and the work of the church can not be pushed with the same vigor as during these autumn days.

The preacher who enjoys hearing from his brethren in the ministry through the news columns of the church papers, sometimes forgets that other men are just as interested to hear from him. How can we give it to them except you send it? Do it now. A one cent stamped envelope will bring the church calendar each week. Don't forget it.

The Christian Century is careful in its selection of news, and seeks to print only those things that will be of interest to the majority of our readers. It will help you to reach your brethren, if only you will tell us what you are doing. Send in the news; on a postal card, in a news letter, or if you do not have time for that, then mail to the office a copy of your church bulletin. Modesty does not forbid this.

The Lenox Ave. Church, New York, is arranging for a service of dedication of their newly purchased building and of installation of their new pastor, William Bayard Craig.

The first of November B. W. Tate, for two years pastor at Newton, Ill., began work with the church at Homer, Ill. He is greatly encouraged with the prospects for growth.

Evangelists W. Mark Sexson and C. F. Shaul are in a meeting at Cherokee, Okla., where the audiences have been so large that they have been compelled to move into the opera house.

W. C. Bower, for seven years efficient pastor of the Tabernacle Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., will close his work about the first of the year and enter Columbia University for a post graduate course.

Walter Renner, of Winfield, Ill., has been holding a meeting at McQueen Chapel. The meeting was successful, but did not reach far beyond the borders of the church on account of the rain, which fell almost every day of the meeting.

The church at Tipton, Ind., is in a meeting, with the pastor, Guy I. Hoover, doing the preaching, and the entire work being done by home forces. There were eleven additions to the church the first day of the meeting.

A temporary organization of the men has been formed at Centerville, Ia., and immediate steps will be taken to form a permanent organization affiliated with the national Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ. John H. Booth is the pastor of the church at Centerville.

H. A. Morgan, who has been pastor of the church at Fowler, California, for two years, has accepted a call to the University Heights Church San Diego, California. He will be succeeded at Fowler by J. H. McCartney of Fullerton.

President Crossfield, of Transylvania University, has recently visited Miami, Rochester and Western Reserve universities, giving addresses at each of them. At Rochester he gave an evening lecture in the Christian church on Christian Education.

Professor K. Ishikawa of Drake College, Tokyo, Jaapn, spent Saturday and Sunday, October 30 and 31, in Chicago visiting the University and some of the Chicago men. He returns to Japan almost immediately. He came to America about two months ago to visit the Centennial Convention.

At the dedication of the new Y. M. C. A. building at the University of Missouri, on Sunday, October 31, Dr. Theodore Gerald Soares, Professor of Homiletics and Religious Education and Head of the Department of Practical Theology at the University of Chicago, delivered the principal address.

Under the leadership of Evangelist J. B. Holmes, a meeting has been held at Klamath Falls, Oregon, which has already resulted in the organization of a Christian Endeavor Society, a Sunday-school, and a church. The church will be ready to call a pastor within a few weeks.

The Young People's Christian Endeavor Society at Lewistown, Ill., which disbanded a year ago or more, has just been reorganized by the new pastor, B. H. Cleaver, who is pushing the work at Lewistown with vigor. There is strong hope of a successful work by these young people.

Grenville Snell is closing his work at Mound City, Mo., and C. W. Comstock, of Kansas City, has been secured to succeed him. Mr. Snell, we are informed, will hold several meetings before locating again. He has some open dates just before Christmas.

Edward A. Henry, who is writing the interesting articles on travels in Palestine being published in the Christian Century, is supplying the pulpit of the church at Gurnee, Ill., where the Christian Church is the only church in the community and has a great opportunity for service.

The pastors of the churches at Danville, Ill., are holding meetings in the outlying parts of the city. They are led in this by the veteran pastor of the city, S. S. Jones, pastor of the Third Church. The meetings are proving very successful.

A. J. Adams has gone from Wenatchee, Washington, where he has accomplished a fine work, to Hood, Oregon. The members of the church at Wenatchee gave their retiring pastor a reception, showering upon him their good wishes and presenting to him some gifts which will be a delight to his dining room and study.

The Chicago Ministerial Association, at its meeting the first day of November, passed a resolution pledging its heartiest support to the Federation of Labor, in its effort to keep the ten-hour day for women (the law now being tested), and appointed Alva W. Taylor, the president, to act for the Association in any way he finds he can assist the Federation.

For two years the Central Church at Centerville, Ia., has followed the plan of taking but two missionary offerings during the year. The offering the first Sunday in March is for Foreign Missions, and the November offering for all the home missionary interests. The plan works successfully and the church is a Living-Link in three of the societies.

A large number of missionaries under the Foreign Christian Missionary Society sailed from San Francisco, Tuesday, November 2. On behalf of the churches about the bay the First Church gave them a reception Monday evening. It has become the habit with this aggressive church to tender such a reception to the outgoing missionaries of the church.

Edgar DeWitt Jones, pastor of the First Church, Bloomington, Ill., is preaching the following series of Sunday evening sermons: General heading "Questions About Jesus." The series of six sermon topics are: "Did Jesus Ever Laugh?"; "Was Jesus Effeminate?"; "Was Jesus Narrow?"; "Was Jesus Reasonable?"; "Was Jesus Original?"; "Will Jesus Ever be Surpassed?"

W. J. Wright, who has served the American Christian Missionary Society so faithfully for the past few years, and who is now succeeded by I. N. McCash, will hold evangelistic meetings until he decides upon his future location as pastor. Mr. Wright's recognized ability in this field, as well as his knowledge of the work of the church, will make him much in demand by the better churches.

The church at Little Rock, Ark., where J. N. Jessup is the pastor, dedicated their new house of worship the seventh of November. The service was in charge of Z. T. Sweeney. The property, when complete, will be worth about $75,000. Much credit is due Mr. Jessup, who has through several years lived close up to his task with this church, and brought it through to this gratifying consummation.

J. B. Hunley of Neosho, Mo., was sent by his church as a delegate to Pittsburg, but was compelled to spend the entire time of the convention in the hospital, and could not attend a single session. There, almost within sound of the music and the addresses, it was a singular disappointment not to be able to hear some of the good things. But it was sweet to be remembered, as he was, by a large number of his friends, who learned of his condition and made cheerful the weary hours by their visits to his room.

W. H. Bagby, pastor of the church at Missoula, Montana, on a recent Sunday preached a sermon on "The Call of Christ to Men," which was generously quoted in the local paper of the following day. The sermon is marked by strength and directness of appeal. It is the kind of a sermon that should be more often heard in our churches, and which if heard would help to answer the query, Why are not the men in the churches? They would be there.

L. E. Murray changes his address from Middletown, Ind., to Washington, D. C., where he goes to assist Frederick D. Power, who has, since the National Convention, suffered a nervous breakdown. Mr. Power has been working very hard, and Mrs. Power has been ill, having to undergo a serious operation. They are both recovering and hope to be about their work again after a brief rest.

An attractive bulletin of Christian University, Canton, Mo., has just been issued. There is the picture of the new building, interior and exterior views, the faculty, and groups of the students. This school is steadily strengthening its teaching force, which now includes the following names: C. W. Buckner, A. M.; W. H. Trainum, A. M., B. D.; Byron Ingold, A. M.; T. F. Reavis A. M.; Mrs. C. C. F. Rush; C. A. Lockhart, A. M., B. D.; Carl Johann, A. M., LL. D.; Miss Dot. Bradshaw, A. B.; Mrs. M. P. Buckner, A. M; H. M. Garn. A. M., B. D.; J. R. Muse, A. B.; Miss Helen Johann, A. M.

The church at Woodland, California, celebrated its fifty-fifth anniversary the evening of October 22. The church was beautifully decorated in red and green, with the dates "1854" and "1909" worked with red carnations. The present pastor of the church, W. E. Bobbitt, read a history of the church, which was organized in 1854, under a great oak tree in "the Beamer field just north of the city." There are now 350 members, and they have a fine house of worship. It is greatly to the credit of the present pastor that the church is now doing an aggressive work surpassed at no time in its history.

Lewis P. Kopp, Living-Link missionary of the church at Centerville, Ia., working at Ft. Dodge, Ia., reports that the old lot of the church has been sold and preparations are being made for the erection of a new building. One thousand dollars worth of material is on the ground, and over $1,700 more is in the building fund. The church is now holding its meetings in the opera house, pending the completion of the new building. The pastor has arranged for a lecture course to run through the year, upon which he expects to make one hundred dollars, which will be placed in the building fund.

E. T. McFarland preached his final sermons for the Fourth Church, St. Louis, Mo., the last Sunday in November. On the following evening he and his family were given a farewell reception by the members of the church, who also presented him with a fine gold watch, while the members of the Berean Sunday-school class of which he was teacher, presented him with a beautiful watch chain. It is under the protest of his church that Mr. McFarland leaves for the work at Rock Island, Ill. He has accomplished a great work in St. Louis during the ten years of his stay there, and he leaves with the heartiest endorsement of the churches and preachers of that city.

It brings shame to the face of a Disciple when he reads such accounts as that recently published in "The Christian Messenger," published at Owen Sound, Ontario. It is an account of the failure of a union between the Baptists and Disciples at Kenora, Ont. The union had been effected, and was working along well, but the Disciples finally withdrew and in their published resolutions gave such reasons as: "We withdraw from this union, 1st, because the union church has retained a sectarian name and failed to change it for a scriptural and proper designation of a church professing to be Christian," etc. This was not the spirit of the fathers.

The following program of the Ministerial Association of Cleveland, Ohio, will commend itself to the aggressive men of the churches. Too often the program is left to chance; but here is a program, systematically presenting during the year various aspects of the life of a city. Under such leadership the churches of the city of Cleveland must occupy a position of real vital influence in the city's life.

The church at Ann Arbor, Michigan, observed the closing days of October with a series of services appropriate to the reopening of its house of worshop, which has recently been thoroughly repaired and redecorated and has been still further rendered beautiful by the installation of a nw pipe organ, one of the finest in the city. An organ recital was given on Friday evening, October 29. On Saturday evening, October 30, Dr. H. L. Willett gave an address, and on Sunday the services were taken by Dr. Garrison of St. Louis and Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, President of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, which has long been a supporter of the church and Bible Chair work in Ann Arbor. Rev. F. P. Arthur of Grand Rapids, the State Misionary Secretary, was also present. The church has had a number of strong men in its ministry, but none who promises more effective service than O. E. Tomes, the present pastor. A. E. Jennings, a loyal Ann Arbor man and one of the organizers of the Student's Christian Association many years ago, is now residing in Ann Arbor although his business is in Detroit. He is of great assistance in the work of the church. The list of students that have passed through the classes of the Bible Chairs and the Sunday School of the church is very long, and the influence of these two organizations has been most helpful.

C. A. Freer of Millersburg, Ohio, is preaching in a meeting at Killbuck where W. R. Walker has so faithfully ministered for some seven years.

Secretary H. N. Miller preached for the church at Uhrichsville, Ohio, on Sunday night, November 7. Of course he plead for Ohio missions.

Miss Mills, the C. W. B. M. living link for Iowa, to India, is at home visiting some friends in Iowa before returning to her work in the Orient.

Frank Maples leaves the work at Audubon, Iowa for Montana where he has accepted a call. The Audobon Church has not chosen a successor to Mr. Maples.

Percy H. Wilson began a meeting with home forces at Wabash Ave., Akron, Ohio, October 31. He is already agitating the building of a new building in a new location.

L. O. Thompson has left the church at Londonville, Ohio. He was given a farewell banquet by the ministers and official boards of the churches of the place and the Lutheran preacher and his congregation attended Bro. Thompson's last service in a body.

J. R. Perkins, pastor of the West End Church, San Francisco, spent an evening with the church at Paris, Mo., during the latter part of October. In his honor a banquet was given by the members of the church.

Guy W. Sarvis, who is now studying in the University of Chicago gave his lecture, "Through the Heart of Africa" at the Hyde Park Y. M. C. A. last Sunday afternoon. Mr. Sarvis has given this lecture on several occasions in Iowa and Illinois and has always delighted his audience, as well as rendering them an educational service.

W. B. Clemmer, until recently pastor of the church at Rock Island, Ill., has just concluded a meeting at Franklin, Ill., which lasted twenty-three days. There were twelve additions. The pastor L. W. Spayd commends unreservedly the work of Mr. Clemmer, and speaks of the pleasing impression his work made on the entire by his uniform courtesy, and well-informed, fluent sermons.

George W. Goffman and wife, of Rockwell City, Iowa, are planning to return to India. They hope to sail from New York the first of December. They will go out independently, not because they have any fault to find with the organized work, but because this seems the best way for them to go. Mrs. Coffman will now leave this conutry until her husband has located, and prepared for her coming.

Barton O. Aylesworth for five years president of the Colorado State Agricultural College, has resigned that position, and was in Chicago a few days last week on his way to New York, where he is entering upon his duties as lecturer for the National Equal Suffrage Association. Mr. Aylesworth will devote his entire energy to this significant work, traveling and lecturing in all parts of the United States.

Perry J. Rice, who has been pastor of the First Church, Minneapolis, for about four years and has accomplished a good work there, has accepted the call extended him by the First Church of ElPaso, Texas, and is already at work there, though, Mrs. Rice and the family have not yet left Minneapolis. Mr. Rice has always worked in the North, but we hope that he will enjoy this experience in the great state of Texas, and with this church in this educational center.

O. F. Jordan, pastor at Evanston, Illinois, proposes to organize a "fiction circle" in his church. The circle will be composed of twelve members, each of whom will contribute the price of a book of current fiction. The twelve volumes purchased will be for the exclusive use of the class for four months, and then given to the Sunday school library for general circulation. The young ladies of this church recently gave a supper to raise money for the building fund of the new church.

One of the pleasures that Chicago delegates to the Pittsburg Convention enjoyed was that of seeing E. W. Darst, who is very dear to the hearts of Chicago Disciples, and is just at the present time resting at his old home at Dayton, Ohio, after several years of hard work in California. Mr. Darst has been far from well for the past few months, and is beginning a period of rest which he hopes will be of advantage to him, in regaining his health. An interesting letter from him was read by Mr. Naramore at the recent Quarterly Rally of the Disciples. All who have

SOME HARD KNOCKS
Woman Gets Rid of "Coffee Heart."

The injurious action of Coffee on the heart of many persons is well known by physicians to be caused by caffeine. This is the drug found by chemists in coffee and tea.

A woman suffered a long time with severe heart trouble and finally her doctor told her she must give up coffee, as that was the principal cause of the trouble. She writes:

"My heart was so weak it could not do its work properly. My husband would sometimes have to carry me from the table, and it would seem that I would never breathe again.

"The doctor told me that coffee was causing the weakness of my heart. He said I must stop it, but it seemed I could not give it up until I was down in bed with nervous prostration.

"For eleven weeks I lay there and suffered. Finally Husband brought home some Postum and I quit coffee and started new and right. Slowly I got well. Now I do not have any headaches, nor those spells with weak heart. We know it is Postum that helped me. The Dr. said the other day, 'I never thought you would be what you are.' I used to weigh 92 pounds and now I weigh 158.

"Postum has done much for me and I would not go back to coffee again for any money, for I believe it would kill me if I kept at it. Postum must be well boiled according to directions on pkg., then it has a rich flavour and with cream is fine."

Read "The Road to Wellville," found in pkgs. "There's a Reason." fl any acquaintances with the city mission work in Chicago have ample reason for remembering Mr. Darst with affection and gratitude.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The Christian Century has steadily grown since Charles Clayton Morrison became its editor a little more than a year ago. The growth of the paper made heavier and heavier demands upon the editor in chief, until now he has been compelled to resign the pastorate of the Monroe Street Church, and devote his entire energy to the interests of the Christian Century. The Monroe Street Church was very unwilling to give up its pastor, for it was he who built the present house of worship, and who has been its leader almost from the first. But it seemed that the brotherhood could be best served by such a move. The Monroe Street Church will seek to at once find successor to Mr. Morrison. It is one of the most important situations among the Disciples of Chicago, and an effort will be made to find a man who is able to meet the demands of the situation, which are not at all light.

Pastors and readers of this paper generally will please note that the numbers for the remainder of the present year will be furnished free of charge to all new subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY for 1910. Any minister now taking the paper sending us $3.00 and two new subscribers will be credited on his own paper for one year and the new subscribers will be credited to January, 1911.. Any old subscriber sending us $4.50 and three new names will be credited for one year on his own paper and the new subscribers to January, 1911.

If our patrons will favor us by telling their friends of this offer, it should result in a large addition to our subscription list.

Dr. James M. Philputt Resigns

In a personal later to the editor of the Christian Century. Dr. James M. Philputt, pastor Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, states that he would present his resignation to the church, November 7 and will close his work there February 1. Dr. Philputt wanted to do this a year ago, but deferred to the judgment of his official board that the interests of the church demanded that he remain until after the centennial convention. On February 5 Mr. and Mrs. Philputt will sail by the Grosser Kuyfuerst for a trip to the Holy Land and Egypt. In June he will attend the World's Ecumenical Missionary Congress at Edinburgh, to which he is a delegate. Mr. Philputt has long been seeking a convenient time for rest and travel such as the present offers. He will remain abroad several months.

Dr. Philputt's work in St. Louis has been eminently successful. His purpose in going to the Union Ave. Church was to unite the two congregations just merging into one. This has now been done and the church is housed in its new building, and is thoroughly harmonious and organized in every department. During the five and one-half years of this ministry 650 persons have been received into the membership of the church, 300 of these by confession of faith, mostly at regular services. About $40,000 has been contributed to missions and benevolences; besides the sum raised for the new building The church supports three Living-Link missionaries. The congregation is in fine spirit, and it is not without regret that Mr. Philputt lays down the work.

Dr. Philputt is one of the strongest preachers in the brotherhood. He is scholarly, has marked administrative ability, is a preacher of power, and a faithful and lovable pastor. His standing with the other churches of the city, and his place in the entire municipal life have been such as to make his place a difficult one to fill. The Christian Century wishes this great pastor a pleasant trip abroad and will be pleased to know of his plans for the future upon his return to America.

As We Go to Press

Beatrice, Neb., November 7.—Pastor Davis very sick and diptheria prevalent, preventing strong campaign we had planned. Go right on to Lincoln. Buss continues musical directory.—Herbert Yeuell.

Canton, Ill., November 7.—William J. Lockhart and Lintt leading in wonderful revival. One hundred added in past six days, with total of 171 in fifteen days. Meetings deeply spiritual, and gospel being presented with power.—J. G. Waggoner.

Hastings, Neb., November 8. We are in splendid tabernacle meeting with Christian church; R. A. Schell, pastor. Twenty-six added yesterday; 162 in ten days of invitation. Schell is doing great work here. Will launch new building project at close of meeting.—Charles Reign Scoville.

Hastings, Neb. November 1. Scoville and his company are with us. Built fine tabernacle accommodating two thousand. Having great audiences; interest spreading and deepening; thirty-six adder at first invitation; seventy-two first four days not withstanding heaviest rain storm of years all Sunday afternoon and night.—R. A. Schell.

Poplar Bluffs, Mo.—Hundreds turned away from great church tonight; greatest audience ever in building; intense interest, growing daily. Four hundred and four in Sunday-school today; sixty-five additions so far, twenty-three today. Editor-in-Chief of bi-weekly paper, city editor of daily, and a Lutheran preacher baptized. Baker popular pastor.—Allen Wilson.

Children's Day for Home Missions

The Sunday-schools are now in the midst of their campaign for the annual Home Missionary offering which is to be presented November 21, the Lord's Day immediately preceding Thanksgiving. From all indications the offering this year will surpass the splendid offering of the Centennial Year which was almost $15,000, a gain of $3,386.98 over the offering of last year.

This year the American Home Missionary Society is asking the Sunday-schools to begin the work of a new century with an offering of $50,000. In this plea the State Secretaries of Kentucky, Illinois, Ohio, Kansas, Indiana, Missouri and Iowa have joined most heartily.

For two years the state of Kentucky has won the banner for the largest number of contributing schools and the largest total offering. This year both Illinois and Kansas have announced their intention of wresting the banner from Kentucky, and the contest is now at its height. The record for last year stood as follows:

Kentucky	247 contributing schools	$3,086.10
Illinois	155 contributing schools	1,700.00
Ohio	131 contributing schools	1,802.09
Kansas	116 contributing schools	774.88
Indiana	84 contributing schools	963.82
Missouri	57 contributing schools	841.73

Strenuous efforts are being made to line up every school in each of these state with the largest offering ever made for Home Missions.

Handsome new wooden banks have been sent out by the Home Missionary Board for the use of the teachers in gathering in the offering. This is a great improvement over the old method of entrusting to the children the imperfectly made cardboard banks which were speedily destroyed or lost. By leaving the banks in the hands of the teachers, the offering will be cared for and the teachers taught the proper attitude toward the offering.

Schools desiring special supplies for the day should write to their State Superintendents, or George B. Ranshaw, Superintendent Sunday-school Department American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Endowment for the Bible College of Missouri

The readers of the Century no doubt know that the Bible College of Missouri has for some time been engaged in an endowment campaign. Within the past few months, however, this movement has taken on added impetus because of the proposition made by R. A. Long of Kansas City, who is president of the Board of Trustees of the Bible College. This proposition was to the effect that he would personally give $50,000 to the Endowment Fund provided the brotherhood of the state would raise the same amount. This generous offer of Bro. Long's is the inspiration of the present strenuous campaign.

The justification of the campaign is not difficult to find. It is now a commonplace that there is a remarkable dearth of preachers. This presents a serious problem to each religious body. But, the problem in some sections of the country is more serious than in others. In Missouri there are 1,700 congregations, and more than a third of them pastorless. Disciples in Missouri have a larger membership than any other religious body in the state. There are more Disciples in Missouri than in any other state in the Union. The obligation of Missouri Disciples is, therefore, correspondingly greater. Yet, as a matter of fact, the number of pastorless churches in Missouri is astonishing, if not humiliating.

Now the most valuable and direct method of supplying preachers for these churches is to make them,—and they are made in our Bible Colleges. The Bible College of Missouri naturally owes much to the state. The state owes something to it, and is destined to owe much more. Forty young men have already been prepared for, and are now actively engaged in the work of the ministry. More than half this number are at present receiving preparation. The boys now in school are serving many churches in adjacent territory. Only praise is heard concerning their work. Continually the College is being appealed to for men. It is unable to supply the demand. Under such circumstances the college surely merits the enlargement and better equipment which the additional endowment will make possible.

The present endowment permits the employment of but two fully paid professors. The enrollment last year was one hundred and ninety-four. It is evident that two professors are not able adequately to supply the great needs of 194 students. In the Catalog of the Bible College five Departments are announced. There should be a fully paid professor in each of these. In order that increase in the number of the faculty may be realized additional endowment must be secured. This is why we are so urgent in this campaign.

Brethren, this is an opportunity we dare not pass by. Bro. Long is a man of splendid business judgment. He thoroughly understands the situation, and appreciates the need. He has faith in the College and is willing, yea, glad, to put $50,000 into its permanent endowment. May we have the same faith, and individually feel the same responsibility.

G. D. Edwards,
Representative of Bible College.
Columbia, Mo.

Centennial Information

Many were asking anxiously during the convention for the official count of the attendance. As was stated frequently before the convention, we were hoping to have an absolutely complete registration of all who were here. This we failed to get, but we did gather sufficient data in several ways to make a fairly accurate estimate of the attendance. The lowest possible figure is 42,000; 20,000 of whom were at the comunion service Sunday afternoon. A complete count would probably put the attendance at more than 50,00. But we wish to be conservative.

Regarding the stenographic report of the convention, we are frequently asked whether all the speeches will be printd in full. To do so would require three volumes, and the price would put the production out of the reach of a great many who should have it. Moreover, such a bulky work would contain much repetition and considerable matter that would not be of permanent interest. So for the sake of both economy and effectiveness, the material will be condensed so as to occupy just one large volume. This will contain the story of the campaign, and of the convention; the proceedings of all sessions of the nine days, and the best of all the addresses. Two hundred portraits of men and women prominent in the convention will appear in the book. This should prove the most valuable book issued since the inauguration of the Restoration Movement. We hope to have it ready about January 1, and not later than February 1.

The ordinary Convention Program after the adjournment is like the proverbial last year's bird's nest. The case is entirely different with the Centennial Hand Book. It was prepared to keep until the next Centennial. The actual program of the meetings occupies about one-sixth of its space. About one-fourth of the whole book is given to the History and Plea of the Restoration. Another fourth is taken up with the History and Description of the wonderful City of Pittsburgh, and still another by the splendid collection of Hymns used during the Convention. The whole is bound in full morocco, with gold side stamp and gold edges.

Even at $1.00 per copy large numbers were ordered by those who could not attend the convention, and as gift books for those who are interested, or should be interested in the Restoration Movement. Since the close of the convention, the committee offers a double opportunity to the Brotherhood by cutting the price half in two. This is done for two purposes. First, to get the books into circulation for the good they will do, and second, to bring in sufficient funds to close up all accounts without a deficit.

The total expense of the Centennial Convention was $26,000. Only a small amount of this is unprovided for, and so the books are offered at a sacrifice. The badges that remain are also put on the bargain counter at 10 cents each, or $1.00 0per dozen, and the flags that were carried in the men's parade at 75 cents per dozen. The committee pays express and postage on all these articles.

Since announcement was made of these Centennial bargains two weeks ago, orders have been coming in from all quarters. Those wha were here are laying up a number of the books as a most suitable Christmas present for their friends. Parents are providing a copy for each child. Bible School teachers are finding this the solution of the Christmas present problem. Generous and thoughtful friends of world-wide missions are ordering copies sent to the men and women at the front. Every missionary on the home field, as every one on the foreign field, should be provided with one of these historic vlumes. Every year that passes will find them more prcious.

An illustration of how highly the books are esteemed in Pittsburgh, is found in the fact, that one of the largest department stores in the city has taken over the exclusive sale for Greater Pittsburgh, and is advertising the book as a leader in its department.

Complete Address on "Christian Progress, by

SAMUEL HARDEN CHURCH

Before the Christian Centennial Convention at Pittsburgh.

"Colonel Church is the descendant of one of the founders of this distinctly American church. The utter wisdom of his position was splendidly correct. But right here you have a concrete proof of the difficulty of religious progress. The majority of the people in that, as in all other, churches, are too apt to hold fast to little forms and lose sight of great substances. It requires a single, easily grasped idea to hold them. So, when Colonel Church seemed to brush aside their cherished tenets and proffer them a set of great, vital principles as broad as the world and as deep as the mind of God, he knocked them off their feet, and there was no mistaking the hissing.

"Now, this sort of thing is no more characteristic of the best blood of the Disciples Church than it is of any other church. The leading people know the needs, and they feel how noble is the service which leads the sects out of their littleness up to greatness. To suggest that such persons should retire if they cannot agree with the established beliefs of their denomination is as silly as to propose that those statesmen should get out of the land who are striving for improvements in the body politic."

"A. C. D., A Minister," in Baltimore News."

A Progressive Religious Weekly For Christian Homes

-- Editors --

Herbert L. Willett,

Thoroughly Up-to-Date The Christian Century is a progressive religious paper. It is abreast of the times. It stands for those growing ideals which are fast taking possession of the minds of modern men and women. It is not alarmed at scholarship. It believes in education. It gives a vision of things as they are to be. It places the reader in touch with those great lives the country over which are being spent for the welfare of humanity. It strives to develop in its readers the open mind, a broad outlook and the habit and passion of service.

Devoted to Christian Union Thoroughly up-to-date, The Christian Century is no free lance. It rides no hobby. It loves free discussion but hates the contraversial spirit. Its Editors devoutly believe in the plea for the unity of all Christians proclaimed by Thomas and Alexander Campbell and by the Disciples of Christ for almost a century. The Fathers were the most progressive thinkers of their time. Were they living today they would be leading the procession of religious and social progress.

The Staff of Contributors The Editors are re-inforced by a staff of the best equipped and most brilliant writers among the Disciples. Our pages are full of rich and interesting writing.

Every Reader A Stockholder

The Christian Century is essentially a mutual concern. Every individual reader, no matter how remote nor how humble, is a stockholder in the enterprise, sharing with editors and business manager and office workers in the dividends of the company.

What are these dividends? The dividends of The Christian Century are the benefits the paper brings to your own life each week and the benefits it brings to the cause of Christ which both the makers of the paper and its readers love.

In producing these dividends and in increasing them every reader has a part. You have a part, primarily, of course, through the investment of the $1.50 a year which you made. This investment brought you immediate returns: within two weeks from the time you remitted the postal order you were receiving dividends. You were put in possession of the news from other congregations. You were given a serial story to read which, if you bought it in book form, would cost you as much as the year's subscription to The Christian Century. You were shown the events of the recent days interpreted not simply as a secular newspaper would interpret them but in the light of their relation to Christ's business in the world. You received fresh interpretation of life from brainy and spiritually minded writers whose contributions, together with the editorials, you read again and again.

When you stop to think of it that first dividend you received was worth your entire investment! And yet, regularly, fifty-one times more, that weekly dividend has been repeated; and somehow you felt that it was a bigger dividend each week, for you wrote in to the editors recently and said, "Your paper grows better and better all the time."

But this isn't the extent of your shareholding in The Christian Century. You are in deeper than when you made your first investment. As you have read your paper from week to week you have found your eyes and heart opening to perceive and to cherish certain great ideals and purposes which your paper espouses. You have learned that these ideals and purposes in the hearts of the men who make the paper are their reasons for making it. They talkand write not simply as if they wished to make the paper succeed but as if they wished to make these ideals and purposes succeed. Certain suggestions as to what these ideals and purposes are are found on the opposite side of the page which you are now reading.

The point we are now urging is that your investment in The Christian Century is more than that original $1.50. You have invested your Heart in The Christian Century, and along with your heart you wish to invest your Service. This is the temper we find prevailing everywhere among our readers. At the Pittsburgh Convention our readers took so many new subscriptions for us that our office has actually been embarrassed in the mechanical labor of listing the new names. We are gratified to be thus "embarrassed"!

Now what our mutual enterprise needs is that all our stockholders shall work together in a vigorous and systematic campaign for new subscribers. The makers of the paper are organizing for an especially active canvass on their part. They do not doubt that the readers of the paper will do their part. Every reader should consider himself an Agent for The Christian Century just because he is a Subscriber. A single subscriber in a local church should be a guarantee that that church will be thoroughly canvassed for new subscriptions. Two or three subscribers in a local church should make the guarantee that much more secure.

Many pastors will be glad to write letters similar to the one Dr. Tyler sent to his people, which was reproduced on this page last week.

Some pastors and laymen who read The Christian Century will be glad to take subscriptions without commission. We would much prefer our friends, ministers and laymen, to accept commissions on the new names they send in if they will write us for terms. We are making an extraordinary offer to agents for the next 60 days. It is an offer whereby any energetic person in the average church can make from $25 to $50 by the close of the holidays, without giving up his regular employment.

Observe: That all new yearly subscriptions received from now until December 31 are dated to January 1, 1910, thus giving the subscriber the balance of the year free.

Write for our commission rates and for a receipt book.

Mr. Church's Address

A Critique and An Appreciation

ACCORDING to our announcement last week we are this week presenting Colonel Church's address that our readers may have in their hands the full text of this much-discussed speech.

At the time it was delivered it was not our purpose to contribute anything to its especial publicity. But now that it has been made the theme of unrestrained denunciation in certain of the Disciple papers and has been seized upon by the outside press as one of the most significant features of the Centennial convention, it seems obvious to our editorial mind that our readers should be put in possession of it.

The fact that The Christian Century takes issue with many if not all of the speaker's points relating to the plea of the Disciples, instead of being a reason for not publishing the address is a sort of challenge to re-study and re-state the sanctions of our position and to consider afresh any problems or discrepancies that may be implicit in it. In this view we will freely open our pages to Mr. Church to make reply to our strictures as he may see fit.

The subject assigned the speaker by the committee was "The Progress and Achievements of One Hundred Years." In the five pages which the address covers in The Christian Century there are but two paragraphs which bear upon the theme, the second and the seventh. Looking at the program for that day it is evident that the makers of it intended Mr. Church's theme to be an examination and estimate of the things accomplished by the Disciples up to the present moment.

What of the present strength and resources of the brotherhood? What of the type of character our church life and our doctrinal ideas have produced? What of our literary contributions to thought and life? What of our permanent impression upon national life and civilization? What of our influence in quickening and directing the wonderful social movement of which our present generation and Mr. Church himself are so profoundly conscious? Above all, because so central a part of our purpose as a people, what of our part in bringing the scattered flock of Christ into one fold?

These are some of the questions which naturally belong to the subject assigned Mr. Church. They are all of them matters of history; his theme was a study and assessment of certain historical facts. No more important task is waiting to be done for our people. And with all respect to the other four splendid names to whom was assigned this same theme in the parallel sessions, not one of them is so well fitted to perform this service for the brotherhood as is the grandson of Walter Scott.

But Mr. Church, after a few felicitous summaries, passes from his theme into that assigned the speaker who was to follow him, viz., "Outlook and Appeal." This was the real title of Mr. Church's address. He was looking forward when the committee asked him to look backward, to the future when the committee asked him to look to the past and appraise it. No doubt the ill-mannered dissent with which the address was received was due to the audience's sense that the speaker was off his subject quite as much as to its pronounced disagreements with his declarations.

Another criticism of the address and a reason for its shockingly inhospitable reception is the fact that it bristles with inaccuracies.

The Disciples are habituated to exact speech, especially in matters of the scripture. Some might say that we are over-finical. But it is difficult for any speaker or writer to command the patience of a typical Disciple audience who is inexact in his references to the Bible. To say that Joseph was driven to the divorce court, or that it is scarcely imaginable that the jailor was immersed in the jail at Philippi, or that many thousands who were converted by the apostles were never baptized at all, simply closes the ears of informed Disciples to any message a speaker might have.

And to adopt Mr. Church's too-easy explanation of the longevity of Methuselah not only brings pronounced dissent upon the speaker's head, but brings the science to which he attributes the alleged explanation into undeserved contempt.

We are not trying to suggest that this address met its unhappy reception because of these mere technical considerations. Much of the conscious argument of the paper strikes at certain beliefs and practices of the Disciples which are the warp and woof of their typical thinking.

In our statement of last week we set forth our criticism of Mr. Church's utterances on the baptism question. His argument that the practice of both immersion or affusion according to the option of the candidate would bring us nearer the mark of a free church capable of including all Christians called forth our pronounced dissent. As a people seeking a basis of unity the Disciples are on the right ground in the practice of immersion only. So long as there is an immersionist conscience in Christendom there will be no union on an optional procedure in the practice of baptism.

Mr. Church's conception of Christian union seems to us to sacrifice the ideal the Disciples have ever held constantly before them. He says "The Christian union which our fathers hoped for, in one broad organization, will never come." Again, "All these churches today are needed in the progress of civilization, the only imperative thing being that they should disarm against each other."

In these statements Mr. Church puts himself not only out of line with Disciple tradition, but in opposition to many of the most prophetic voices of our day in other communions than our own. The trend toward unity in the church is one of the most manifest signs of the times, and the possibility of complete working union with denominational lines practically broken down is today easier to entertain than ever before.

It seems to The Christian Century that every Disciple of Christ should take high ground on this theme and hold it unflinchingly, heartened by the mighty reinforcements that are already at hand.

There are other criticisms of lesser or greater import that we might present upon Mr. Church's paper. But in making even these which we have set down both this week and last we are conscious that we are not touching the deeper meanings of the address.

Mr. Church is a layman. He is a man of business who takes time to write books and to promote philanthropies. His address is not to be judged from the standpoint of ecclesiastical technique. It is bigger than our little systems. Its author is a man of vision and the great thing in the address is its splendid sweep of vision.

It is evident to every reader of the essay that we are here reckoning with a man possessed of the soul of Thomas Campbell. If by blood he is of the line of Walter Scott, by spiritual consanguinity he is of the line of the author of the Declaration and Address.

Like his spiritual forbear he feels the problem humanly. It is not a question of church diplomacy or doctrinal correctness or party pride. It is a question of human life.

Like the Master, he lifts up his eyes upon the multitude of the unchurched and his heart is stirred with compassion. He looks in upon the church and finds its leaders, like the scribes of Jesus' day, contending about dogmas and forms which have utterly no relevancy to human salvation or welfare.

To judge such an address by its correctness of detail is like judging the sun by the spots on its face.

To protest against its inclusion in the published Proceedings of the Convention is to propose to publish a dishonest book. And to include it in the Proceedings with an undiscriminating protest attached is to betray to the world that the Disciples have fallen into the same bigotry and sectarianism from which their Fathers suffered one hundred years ago.

The big thing about the address is the truth in it. The little thing about it is its error. Its truth is vital and imperative. Its error is innocuous or self-corrective.

No finer chance to display the courtesy of strength and confident faith could be asked for than has come with the appearance, under so dramatic conditions, of Mr. Church's address.

The Trend of Events

Chicago's Turmoil

Chicago is in a pretty turmoil. Whatever may have been Mayor Dunne's shortcomings, he was honest. No man says less than that of him. But he demanded certain radical measures for the forefending of the city against possible future corruption. Among them were radical measures to prevent corporations and franchise grabbers from ever again instituting the footpad methods of the Yerkes' regime. "Big Business" took fright at this and by its respectability put into the mayor's office a man whose ideals none are so charitable as to defend. Of course no one thinks "Big Business" wanted an immoral man for mayor. But when the dollar is up against the difficulty it will wink at character for the sake of the cent-percent.

Cook County also had a clean State's Attorney. He was too clean, and by the general fight made upon him because of his probity a young man slipped into the office almost unbeknown except that he accepted, without making any definite pledges beyond the one that he would not engage in the "useless" task of trying to close the Sunday saloons, the support of those who opposed the man then in office. He no sooner comes into his office than he begins to take things seriously. There may be many interpretations of Mr. Wayman's motives, but the fact remains that he is overturning things and that the foul tribe revealed as he lifts the rotten planks has put the entire corrupt administration of the city into a cold sweat. He convicted "Skinny" Madden, the corrupt labor leader, and Inspector, McCann for taking bribes in his controlling of the "Red-light" and saloon business on the West side. He has now revealed the utter corruption of the Jury Commissioners' office by showing how cards were juggled and men who were approachable put on vital cases. He speaks out very frankly by telling the police that if they will coöperate with him he will put the gamblers in the penitentary and tells the public that the tax-dodger is a worse enemy of society than the thief and murderer.

The trial of McCann brings to light the utter corruption of the police department. "Big Business" is not for that sort of thing, and its mayor is compelled to seek salvation from public wrath and the fates by appointing a man to the head of the force that is upholding his reputation for fearlessness and honesty. This man, Chief Steward, finds himself handicapped, as above stated, but is determined that the light shall be let in and strikes with desperate energy at the evils before him. The mayor is dropped almost from public notice and Steward and Wayman hold the focus of attention. If Wayman will do for Chicago what Folk did for St. Louis he will be a strong candidate for governor.

Will the Senate Defy the Constitution?

The requisite two-thirds of the states have passed resolutions asking for the election of senators by direct vote of the people. Alabama's action brought the thirty-first state into line of petitioners and Senator Owen of Oklahoma proposes to make it his business to see what the senate will do about it. He was rebuked by Aldrich and Hale last winter for mentioning the matter and told that the majority would deal with the question in its own good time and way. Already the house has passed the necessary resolution four separate times. It is claimed that five of the states neglected to put their resolutions in technical form. If so, the necessary number can be supplemented within the next year for the passage of the tariff measure has greatly strengthened the demand that the senate should be made amenable to the direct demands of the popular will. The moral demand is just as good as if all the five had not overlooked the technical form, but the senate is not very amenable to "moral demands" from the body politic. It ought to cause the senate to join the house in a concurrent resolution, but it will not. Unfortunately the constitution makes no provision for compelling action by congress, even after the states have petitioned for the convention.

Senator Owen dares to prophesy that Aldrich would have the matter referred to a committee and held up, even if brought up under the most formal and technical manner. But the day of judgment cannot be forever delayed. The demands of the public will be enforced. The Senate was never meant to be an obstructor of the people's will. It was designed as a deliberate body in days when public intelligence was much lower than it is today. It was one of the necessary compromises with old forms of government, but democracy moves on to larger powers of the people as the people grow more intelligent.

A "Lemon" for the Lemon Grower

When tariffs are made, every special industry claims a "cut of the pie." Senator Flint labored and traded for a raise on lemons because California raises them. Senator Tillman forgot his raging against privilege long enough to ask a duty on tea because South Carolina has an infant tea industry. Democrats joined the general foray for protection to industries in "my state" and thus gave the lie to their fair protests against "special privilege" in many cases. Now Senator Flint is raging in a manner that would do credit to the stormy Tillman and declaring that the whole principle of protection may be destroyed—all because the railroads immediately raised the rate on lemon shipments just enough to absorb the new tax, and the poor lemon grower is handed a "lemon" in his quest of special privilege. Meanwhile, the people pay the bill just the same and it matters little to them whether one or another interest gets the benefit. It all helps in the determined war against all forms of special privilege and will aid the cause of a permanent and scientific tariff commission that will consider the benefit of the whole country rather than that of any part at the expense of the whole. Tariff making has become the art of the politician instead of the science of the statesman.

The Tariff Commission Wedge

The new General Tariff Board is at work. Its first duty will be to advise the president on or before March 31 next as to what countries do and what do not discriminate against American products in their tariff schedules. The Payne-Aldrich bill provides that the maximum rates of 25 per cent above the schedules named in the law shall obtain except where the president shall except countries that make no discrimination against us. This Board will investigate the tariff laws of all the nations and render a detailed report to the president in time for him to apply the maximum and minimum features by the date named.

It was a part of the president's program to have this Board appointed to do the work assigned it and to also make a thoroughgoing study of the relative cost of things at home and abroad, that a tariff on that basis might be enacted, but the "powers-that-be" prevented the broader powers being given the commission and confined them to the task in hand. It is hoped a way may be found to either enlarge their powers or that their work will compel the appointment of such a commission for investigation. The creating of such a board cannot but be the thin end of a wedge that will bring a clear division of sentiment on the question of a permanent commission on tariff rates. If we are to have a tariff based on the difference of cost at home and abroad and for the benefit of American labor, it must provide for a scientific body that can determine that difference and not leave the matter to a general scramble and trade among special and localized interests.

Is the Tariff a Workingman's Boon?

Fortunately the tariff is no longer a purely party problem. Democrats voted for many raises and Republicans proved the most effective advocates of lower rates in the recent special session of congress. True, the platforms may continue to call for differing principles, but politicians will keep the ear to the ground and vote as "their constituencies direct" (?) and statesmen will dare to think there may be a time for changes under changing conditions.

During the recent discussion in congress, Senator Newlands used a document that ought to be read by every student of public affairs in the land. It is the "Pittsburg Survey." Under the patronage of the Russell Sage Foundation an exhaustive investigation of Pittsburg and the "Industrial District" was made and the results issued in a series of reports known as the "Pittsburg Survey." It startled the country and has resulted in the organization in Pittsburg of a commission to better the conditions. The report is as far above criticism as the report of a medical commission on tuberculosis would be.

Senator Newlands made a summary of the report before the senate and said that general conditions among the workingmen in that city, where more wealth had been created by protectionism than in any other in the world, was worse than in any other place in the country; that men worked twelve hours per day, seven days per week, and that their wages were not enough to support a family under conditions common in America; that most of the laborers were found to come from Southern Europe, where the standards of living are very low and that the conditions under which they worked in Pittsburg made it impossible for them to improve the standards.

Editorials By Other Editors

What Representative Journals Say of the Disciples' Centennial

The Disciples of Christ are peculiarly sensitive to the way in which they are regarded by the Christian people of the various denominations. This is not a matter of overwrought self-consciousness or bumptious pride, but of sane purpose. Our distinctive business in the world is to effect certain results among the Christian people now organized in separate sects. With all these sects we share the great Christian ideals in common and stand shoulder to shoulder with them in every conflict against heathenism and alcoholism and civic unrighteousness and ignorance and sin of every sort. In missions, in evangelism, in social forward movement, in prayer, in communion, in evangelical thinking and temper we are in accord with Christendom. But after every battle for our common cause, when our hosts have fallen back into their separate camps and are talking over the conflict and preparing to renew the attack the Disciples feel the burden of a message to their fellow-soldiers of all the camps. This message they cannot help urging. Paul's "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel," is their Nemesis if they preach not Christian unity. Just because they feel themselves entrusted with a message to their brethren they are concerned constantly to know with what temper they are regarded by their brethren. They wish to know how persuasively their pleadings for unity are carried home to the Christian hearts of God's divided people. In making up the total of their achievements for their first one hundred years they are more concerned about the results outside their own body than the results inside their own body. It is not a matter of pride that they should have come to be numbered among the great denominations unless their testimony for unity is being taken seriously and becoming effective. At this Centennial time it is peculiarly important for the Disciples to be informed of the comments made by the religious press. The editors of The Christian Century take pleasure in yielding their customary space that the editorials of the most representative papers may be presented to our readers. In most cases we have given these in full, believing that there was often quite as much significance in the manner of reporting certain facts as in the pronouncement of opinions upon the facts.

The United Presbyterian

Especially interesting are the comments of the religious papers published in Pittsburg reflecting as they do the first hand impressions of the editors as contrasting with the comments of other papers whose data are furnished by newspapers and other reports. United Presbyterians in Pittsburg and vicinity showed every courtesy to the Disciples, throwing open their churches and sending a fraternal delegate in Dr. McCrory, who captivated his great audience in Duquesne Garden with his good humor and eloquence and sound sense. The United Presbyterian comments on "The Disciples Convention" as follows:

The Convention of the Disciples of Christ—known also as the Christian Church—in this city has been a notable event. Being the centennial anniversary of the organization of the church, every effort was made that it be the most imposing in their history. In this they were successful. The attendance was reported as nearing 30,000 enrolled delegates. The meetings were held at the Carnegie Library, the Duquesne Gardens and in some of the churches convenient thereto. They were all marked by great enthusiasm, sometimes taking somewhat the character of political meetings in their demonstrations.

The subjects of missions at home and abroad were discussed fully and with great ability. The several parts of their church work were presented in a manner that carried the audience with the speakers. The general effect on the members was an increase of interest in the denomination and its institutions, and of enthusiasm in their support. Very liberal gifts were made. There was much of the spectacular in the meetings, more so than in our judgment becomes a religious assembly, or than is favorable to abiding spiritual profit, but some apology may be made for this in the fact of the centennial meeting and the largeness of the attendance. It was a mass meeting rather than a deliberative body. They were given a cordial welcome by the churches and the people in general. The arrangements for the entertainment of the delegates and for the many meetings were so admirable that there was no confusion or ground of complaint.

The Disciples are congregational in their church government, and therefore do not have a central controlling body of delegates, but meet in general convention annually. They have district, state and national societies for missionary and benevolent work. The necessity of a closer and more compact and authoritative organization is felt by many. They are giving more attention to educational work, and the effect is seen in the rising ability of their ministers and leading members. They constitute a strong working force for earnest piety and evangelistic work. Their missions, both in America and in foreign lands, have been very successful. One interesting incident of the convention was the completion and equipment of a boat for the Congo. It was built and just finished at one of our establishments in the city at a cost of $10,000 furnished by the Oregon churches, and the money for its transportation and equipment, $6,000, was raised on the spot with shouts and songs.

The Disciples are evangelical, but being founded on the basis of the unity of all Christians and the condemnation of creeds and formal church organizations, they do not define their doctrinal beliefs clearly and closely. Their condition of membership is a declaration of faith in Jesus Christ and a heartfelt desire to give up sin and work righteousness. They condemn denominational organizations, but we do not know of any body more positive in their condemnation of others, or more active in the propagation of their own faith and in the prosecution of their own work. They have been very successful and are gaining a higher standing in the Christian world. We wish them the largest possible good from their convention, and prosperity in their work.

Two weeks later the same paper added the following under the title "The No-Creed Creed."

In their convention and everywhere and at all times the Disciples have much to say of their freedom from the shackles of creed, and declare they are organized on the basis laid down by Christ and built upon by the Apostolic Church. And yet when one of their appointed speakers said that to carry out their general principle of no creed they should not require immersion in order to gain admission into their communion, but should leave the form of baptism to the choice of the applicant, he was hissed, and a strong resolution of censure was adopted. The simple fact is that the no-creed creed is exceedingly narrow, and is built up largely with pride. The missionaries of other churches do not find the very broad faith people any easier to work with than those that are said to be bound and cramped by definite declarations of their faith. The Disciples have done great good, they are energetic and are increasing in number and influence, but we would like them to be more charitable.

The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate

Somewhat more analytic is the statement made by the Methodist paper published in Pittsburg, which incidentally is said to have the largest circulation of any of the "Advocates" of that denomination. The editor states frankly his judgment that the Disciples have "not appreciably promoted Christian union" in the one hundred years of their history, nor are they capable of doing so upon the basis proposed. Whatever views one may hold on the subject he must concede that the Advocate's editorial is presented in commendable spirit.

Not the original Twelve whom Jesus chose to be with him, nor the Seventy whom he sent forth on a special but representative mission, nor the "five hundred brethren" to whom he showed himself alive after his passion when he went into Galilee, nor yet the "one hundred and twenty" who tarried in the upper chamber in Jerusalem until the Holy Ghost came upon them; not the rapidly increasing multitude who in the first century were "called Christians first in Antioch;" not those of whom most of us naturally think when we hear the phrase spoken, are they who are referred to in the above title, but that large company who in this day are the followers of Alexander Campbell in his earnest endeavor to restore primitive Christianity as he conceived it, and to promote the union of Christian people in the way he deemed most feasible. These excellent people call themselves "Disciples of Christ," and desire to be known as such, because the movement was originally and is still in a large measure an attempt to return to the language, teaching and methods of the apostles. They also call themselves "Christians," and their churches "Christian" churches, and some of them prefer this name, not simply because it also is a New Testament title, but from the further fact that the Church of the Disciples was the result of a movement in the early part of the nineteenth century which was wider than the activity of the Campbells, and which resulted in the organization of the Christian Connection, the members of which were called "Christians." In 1831 the numerous followers of Barton W. Stone, a leader of the Christian Connection movement, in Kentucky, were united with the followers of Alexander Campbell, who were called "Disciples;" hence the two names.

The little band who at the beginning gathered about the leader of the movement to restore the faith in its primitive simplicity has become a multitude which now numbers over one million members, and which increased by over half a million during the sixteen years from 1890 to 1906.

Every year the Disciples hold an international convention, at which great numbers of them come together for fellowship, inspiration, consultation and the formation of plans of work. In 1904 at St. Louis the number of people who assembled in the city to attend the sessions of the convention was estimated at 23,000. For seven years preparation had been made for a great convention in Pittsburg to celebrate the centennial of the movement. The announcement of the centennial convention contained the following declaration: "We are celebrating, not the organization of the church, for that goes back to Jerusalem in the first century, nor the beginning of a church, for we have steadfastly refused to add another to the too numerous denominations, but the inauguration of a movement within the church of Christ for the restoration of apostolic unity, purity and power." The particular event which is regarded as the inauguration of the "movement" was the publication by Thomas Campbell of a "Declaration and Address" which was designed to set forth the object of "The Christian Association of Washington County," which Campbell had formed. This manifesto was issued in September, 1809, and declared the object of the Association to be "to come firmly and fairly to original ground, and to take up things as the apostles left them; to stand upon the same ground on which the church stood at the beginning." Alexander Campbell placed himself upon his father's platform, and became the acknowledged leader of the movement which assumed the stupendous task of persuading the Christian people of all denominations to give up their historic names and creeds and usages, and accept the interpretation which Campbell and those associated with him had placed upon the meaning of the New Testament, and upon the place, validity and meaning of the ordinances and customs of the apostolic church. It is evident that only those who could agree with Campbell in his interpretation could be persuaded to unite with him in the movement, and since controversy was one of the most common methods adopted for the furtherance of the cause of unity and purity, it is not surprising that the movement has failed to accomplish its primary purpose to any very great extent. That the task outlined above has not been accomplished is acknowledged in the further declaration of the announcement concerning the centennial, that Thomas Campbell's address "as a message of light and love is as badly needed now as a century ago." However, the spirit and addresses of the convention just closed have made it plain that the original purpose of the movement has not been given up. The mission of the Disciples of Christ is still to the churches, to the Christian people of the world, to persuade them to be one in the manner originally proposed. Moreover, it was made plain why Campbell did not succeed in what we may regard as the honest purpose and earnest endeavor of his life, and why the Disciples of Christ will not succeed in the effort to promote the unity of the Christian church after the method proposed. For the meaning which Alexander Campbell attached to the sacrament of baptism, and his strenuous insistence upon immersion as the one scriptural and valid mode of baptism, have not been, and are not now, acceptable to the great majority of those who adhere to evangelic and apostolic Christianity. But when Col. Samuel Harden Church in an address at one of the sessions of the convention advocated baptism "by that form which the conscience and intelligence of the candidate should indicate to be sufficient," instead of by immersion, his suggestion was regarded as a radical departure from a fundamental belief of Disciples, and provoked a storm of protest which was expressed in resolutions adopted at a subsequent session of the convention, and in an editorial printed in one of the leading dailies of Pittsburg whose proprietor is a prominent Disciple. So that the Disciples are in the same sense and to about the same extent followers of Alexander Campbell as the Methodists are followers of John Wesley, the Presbyterians of John Calvin, and the Lutherans of Martin Luther. These all undertook the restoration of a more primitive type of Christianity, though they all had a larger appreciation of the meaning of Christian history than had Campbell. The Disciples of Christ have not succeeded in converting the other denominations to their views of the teaching and usages of the apostolic age, nor have they appreciably promoted Christian unity. But they have become a large and influential body of Christians, and their centennial convention was a demonstration of their intense and practical interest in education, missions, reforms and the world's redemption. A unique and characteristic feature of it was the communion service on Forbes Field, where, according to the reports, 25,000 people broke the bread and shared the cup in remembrance of Christ's death. Though the number may have been overestimated, it was probably the largest communion service in the history of the Christian church.

The coming of the Disciples in so large numbers was a distinct uplift and inspiration to the Christian forces of this city, and all thoughtful Christian people not blinded by prejudice will join in the hope that when they come to celebrate the centennial of the date when they began to be organized as Disciples in 1827, they will have gone beyond the seventy-eight per cent of increase which marked their growth in the period covered by the Federal census of 1890 and that of 1906, the largest per cent of increase shown by any of the Protestant bodies in this country.

The Congregationalist

The Rev. Dr. J. H. Lucas, pastor of the First Congregational Church, Pittsburg, one of the meeting places of the convention near Carnegie Institute reported the convention to The Congregationalist (Boston) in terms of evident appreciation under the heading "A Great Centennial Convention."

The greatest religious gathering in point of numbers and enthusiasm ever assembled in Pittsburg was that of the Centennial convention of the Disciples of Christ, held October 11-19. Conventions are held annually, but this year, being the one hundredth since Thomas Campbell wrote the celebrated Declaration and Address which marked the beginning of the Restoration Movement, as the Disciples are pleased to call their denominational life, a special effort was put forth to make it a great occasion.

For four years, seven specific aims, each for the betterment of the individual, congregational, institutional and general life of the denomination, have been constantly kept before the people. Their response has been so general and hearty that many of these aims have been realized; and the Disciples as a body, have certainly taken advance ground. They have doubled their contributions for missions, developed an army of tithers and made marked progress in evangelism.

Their greatest achievements have been in Sunday-school work and in the training of young men and women for the ministry and missionary work. They report nearly 200,000 registered in teacher training classes, and the largest percentages of ministerial students of all the denominations.

The programs of the simultaneous meetings were alike as to character, but differed as to the personnel of the speakers. Most of the addresses were brilliant, inspiring and well calculated to arouse enthusiasm in the work of the kingdom as represented by the Christian denomination.

The heroes of the movement were lauded and its distinctive principles were emphasized. The two things that impressed the writer most as a possible explanation of the rapid growth of the Christian denomination were, first, their loyalty to their peculiar principles; and, second, their readiness to advertise both these and their movement. These, accompanied by an enthusiasm born of conviction of what they believe to be their twofold mission, that of bringing all Christians into one universal brotherhood and saving the world for Christ, seem to be the stimulant that sustains and impels their work.

A feature of the convention was the dedication, at the shipyards of James Rees and Sons Company, of the mission steamer, The Oregon, to be used on the Congo. Thousands shared in the exercises, and over $8,000 was raised for mission work on the river's brink.

Probably the most impressive meeting of all the series was that at Forbes Field, where 20,000 people, seated in the largest baseball pavilion on earth, solemnly and reverently partook of the Lord's Supper in commemoration of his death and passion. As the thousands of elders and deacons waited upon the immense company, I could not help contrasting the solemn silence that settled upon the throng with the tumultous confusion that usually attends the multitude which gathers in that place. It was, in all probability, the largest communion service ever held.

The attendants at these conventions numbered about 25,000 and represented nearly every country on the globe.

In the same issue the editor comments on the convention, agreeing with the Pittsburg Advocate that the Disciples have grown to be a great denomination but have "strengthened rather than loosened denominational ties" in the territory where they have succeeded. Their success has been mainly achieved "in a denominational spirit and has contradicted the central principle of their thought." The editorial follows:

The churches whose members call themselves the Disciples of Christ may well be gratified by the success of their Centennial convention in Pittsburg last week. We print elsewhere in this number a report of its memorable features. The mission of the denomination, as defined in the convention sermon, is "the restoration of the unity of the church to the end that the world may be won to Christ." The wide ingathering resulting in a membership of a million and a quarter at the end of less than a hundred years tells of the ceaseless activity and enthusiasm of the members and of the missionary spirit which has built up a large membership in foreign fields. Thomas Campbell came out of Ireland a Presbyterian of the straitest sect. He was censured by his presbytery in western Pennsylvania for laxity in admitting other Christians to the communion table. The disunion he found in the churches weighed heavily upon his heart. From his declaration of the existing unity of the church, which all should recognize, the Disciples' churches reckon their life. He was joined by his much more militant son, Alexander, and the latter became the fighting leader. Passing over to belief in the necessity of immersion and being rebaptized, they carried the church to Baptist ground and are often reckoned as a part of the Baptist movement. The testimony of these Disciple churches has gained a great multitude of followers, but seems rather to have strengthened than loosened denominational ties in the territory where it has won its way to prominence. Its people, so far as we know, have never hesitated to associate themselves in separation, even in communities already amply supplied with churches. Judged by that test, their large work has been done mainly in a denominational spirit, and has contradicted the central principle of their thought. But the principle itself is coming to be held valid by multitudes who have never come under the influence of the Campbells or their followers.

In a subsequent issue the same paper draws a parallel between the Disciples and an Episcopalian gathering and suggests halfsagely and half humorously a practical program for both bodies.

At the opening of the great assembly of Disciples in Pittsburg a powerful sermon was preached setting forth the supreme aim of this great body as "the restoration of the unity of the church." At the ordination of a bishop coadjutor of the Episcopal Church in Virginia about the same time the venerable Bishop Doane pleaded eloquently for the same thing, the reunion of Christendom. Both these organizations refuse to be called denominations of the Christian church. Each is the church. If for the next few years they twain should devote their whole energies to uniting themselves into one body, what an example they would set before "the sects!" If the Disciples could only immerse all the Episcopalians and the Episcopal bishops could ordain the Discilpe ministers, the union could be consummated.

The Interior (Presbyterian)

The Interior, published in Chicago, is probably as clear and potent a voice for Christian union as any organ among the Disciples. In a remarkable editorial published some months since on "The Presbyterian Church Catholic" the editor said:

If the church is catholic, then the upbuilding of a separate entity called Presbyterianism cannot be a worthy Christian purpose. The only Presbyterian effort which can also be Christian is such as is projected and executed with sole reference to the greatening of the universal church. Any congregation and any work for which it can be said only that it strengthens Presbyterianism ought to be discontinued forthwith.

And in a later issue this same paper said with almost prophetic voice, in an editorial on "How to Unite Churches,"—

What is required, therefore, for the uniting of churches is not a reduction of their respective theologies to a common agreement, but mutual consent to extend a little more widely that tolerance of differences, which they are all obliged to practice within their own boundaries. . . . When two churches are both clearly persuaded that their whole reason for being is comprehended in bringing Jesus Christ near to sinning men for salvation's sake, their unity of purpose should make it not only possible but easy to unite for that purpose in one organization, and their differences on lower doctrines of theology ought not to forbid the consolidation.

What a newspaper with such editorial convictions thinks of the Disciples and their convention will be read with much interest.

With extraordinary variety of meetings and addresses Disciples of Christ, not only from all over America but from distant parts of the world, commemorated in Pittsburg last week the hundredth anniversary of the first proclamation by Thomas and Alexander Campbell of those ideas of Christian union which the denomination is wont to characterize as its plea. It was not until much later that the Campbells separated their followers into a distinct religious body, but the body regards the primary impulses of its life as dating from 1809. There had been an expectation that the occasion would draw 50,000 delegates and visitors to Pittsburg, and although that expectation was not fully realized, the host of 30,000 or more who did appear astonished the city and made an immense popular impression. The delegation which traveled farthest to be present was the group of five men from Australia. The ceremonies of the week were directed by an influential committee of which the chairman was Dr. J. H. Garrison, editor of The Christian-Evangelist of St. Louis, who presided at the opening session. Rev. George H. Combs of Kansas City preached the convention sermon, which was chiefly devoted to bearing home on his hearers the feeling that the Disciples of Christ are not accomplishing their mission as they should. Said he, speaking of the other denominations: "We must find our way into their pulpits, their prayer meetings, their revivals and their conventions, crying 'Brethren, we entreat you that there may be no division among you.'" The foreign mission meetings were probably the most spirited of all the exercises of the week. The women of the church reported the collection of $200,000 as a special Centennial offering. Of this amount $75,000 was raised by the women of Indiana and will be devoted to the establishment of a missionary training school in Indianapolis. The regular foreign missionary gifts of Disciple churches amounted in the last year to $350,000—a gain of $75,000 over the year before.

In the issue of the week following that in which the above report was given appeared another notice, commenting upon the great communion service and reverting to Dr. Combs' sermon which the editor certainly misconceives. Dr. Combs would be the last men in the convention to sanction proselyting in an overt or a covert way. We shall not undertake to interpret the utterance to which the Interior refers, leaving to Dr. Combs himself the privilege, if he desires it, of reassuring our good neighbor on the point he raises. The later editorial is as follows:

The greatest communion service ever held in the history of Christendom was the administration of the Lord's Supper which closed the Centennial celebration of the Disciples of Christ at Pittsburg on the second Sunday afternoon of their eight days' meeting. The place chosen was the amphitheater of Forbes Field, Pittsburg's great baseball park, where 20,000 persons were seated together. The sacred tables were spread on the ball field at the foot of the tiers of seats. Notwithstanding the extreme wings of the audience were two city blocks apart the whole vast throng sang the hymns and repeated the responses in perfect unison. The crowd was as orderly as if it had been an ordinary congregation in church. There was no sermon—simply the distribution of the sacramental elements. It took nearly half an hour to administer each kind but the whole service occupied a few minutes less than one hour. The minister in charge was Rev. Wallace Tharp of Pittsburg. A corps of 600 lay officers—elders and deacons—bore the bread and wine to the people. The sight is said to have been beyond all description impressive and memorable. Although the convention was at times characterized by the proselyting spirit which was but thinly veiled in the opening sermon of Mr. Combs (from which quotation has been previously made in this column), more liberal utterances were common and appeared to be heartily received. Thus Colonel Samuel Harden Church, probably the most eminent layman of the denomination in Pittsburg, told the convention plainly that as long as the Disciples insist on immersion as the only form of baptism they stultify their plea for Christian union on the basis of the Bible's teachings. He said it was "scarcely imaginable" that all New Testament baptisms were by immersion, and it was evident that Jesus never said a word about baptism to the people to whom he preached. Said Colonel Church: "The Methodist policy which leaves it optional for the candidate to choose his own form of baptism is nearer the mark of a free church than ours. To adhere to compulsory immersion transforms this free church into pope and ecumenical council all in one."

The Journal and Messenger (Baptist)

This paper makes a quotation from Pittsburg local paper which has significance only on showing what in premium were received in the editorial office of this reactionary Baptist journal.

The "Disciples" Centennial, at Pittsburg, was a gigantic affair. It is claimed that 40,000 "delegates" were present, though it is probable that the most of them were from the city of Pittsburg, or its immediate vicinity. A local paper sums up the results as follows, probably under the guidance of a member of the body:

"In a century the Christian church has secured 1,300,000 communicants, 11,714 churches, 8,752 Bible-schools and 6,861 ministers. Nearly a million students are enrolled in the Bible-schools, and the total church valuation is $29,742,244. The steamer, "Oregon," built by the church in the local shipyards, was dedicated and then dismantled for shipment to the Congo River, where it enters the missionary field. Over $100,000 was contributed in open meeting for carrying on work at home and abroad. Scores of addresses were delivered by senators, congressmen and prominent business men of the country, while the crowning climax was reached last Sunday, when over 25,000 persons gathered at the baseball park here and partook of the Lord's Supper, which, it is said, was the most marvelous communion service ever attempted. The first wedge for a broad interpretation of the baptismal ceremony was driven in one of the speeches, and it is possible that in a short time candidates for entrance into the Christian Church will be allowed to choose the form of baptism which their own consciences dictate."

The World Today

An interesting comment in this wideawake monthly is that the general trend toward unity in the religious world has had its influence among Disciples, too! Certainly this is the most unkindest cut we could receive, but we do not believe the writer was conscious of the ironical character of his compliment.

The Disciples of Christ, in holding their Centennial celebration, October 11-17, have reason to feel gratified over their success and progress. In the United States they now rank as sixth, in point of numbers, of the Protestant bodies. In certain states they take the first place. At first meeting with much opposition in their endeavor to restore the conditions of the primitive church and avoid sectarianism, the Disciples are now on terms of sincere fellowship with other religious bodies. Keynotes of their plan of work are evangelism, missions and union. Prominent among their aims are "Daily worship in every home" and "Every home anti-saloon territory." An aggregate of a million dollars for missions was reached two years ago, and a fifty per cent increase on that was planned for 1909. They claim to have an enrollment of eighty thousand students of teacher-training and over one hundred thousand graduates in that study. The trend toward unity, which has been evident among other denominational bodies, has had its influence among the Disciples, several local congregations having united with the Baptists. A notable instance is that of the First Christian Church, of Chicago, with the Memorial Baptist of that city. In southern California the Congregationalists and the Disciples are jointly operating a college, and in western Canada provincial missionary organizations belonging to the Baptists and the Disciples or Christians have been combined.

The Outlook

A discriminating statement in connection with a report of the Centennial convention occurred in the Outlook's issue of November 6. Contrasting with most other editorial estimates the Outlook credits the Disciples with influence "in no small degree' making for the abatement of sectarian warfare. Its editorial follows:

Even in a land where big conventions and conferences are common the Centennial convention of the Christian church in Pittsburg, from the 11th to the 19th of October, was an impressive assemblage. It is estimated that it gathered together some fifty thousand people. When the communion service was held in the open air on Forbes Field, the people there numbered between twenty-five and thirty thousand. The convention was called to celebrate the origins of a denomination which today includes some two million adherents. Like many other denominations, this one arose from a movement which had as its object, not the creation of a new sect, but the reform or revivification of the existing organized church. Classic examples of similar movements resulting in a distinctive organization are those of Wesley and of the Unitas Fratrum, which resulted respectively in the Methodist and Moravian bodies. As the Methodist movement was for the purpose of vitalizing a torpid if not moribund church, and as the Moravian movement was for the purpose of arousing the missionary spirit in a self-centered and partly paganized church, so the movement led by Alexander Campbell was one for the purpose of softening the creedal rigidity and stringent sectarianism of the evangelical churches. We of today can hardly understand the animosity with which various denominations in America regarded one another a hundred years ago. The more clearly related the denominations, the more bitter seemed to be the spirit. When Alexander Campbell, a native of Ireland, came from Glasgow, where he had been studying, to America, he found that his father, who had preceded him, had been disciplined because, as minister of one brand of Presbyterian church, he had invited to the communion table Presbyterians of another brand. Alexander Campbell had already been animated with the intention of spreading the spirit of liberty among the churches, and he found his father ready to join him. Together these two Campbells urged among the Presbyterians the adoption of a platform accepting "the Word of God without note or comment" and the adoption of the name "Christian" without qualification. Because Alexander Campbell and his colleagues did not find in the New Testament any command establishing infant baptism, they insisted that the only valid baptism was adult immersion. Today this insistence on a particular rite seems inconsistent with the purposes that Campbell had in mind, but, under the circumstances in which he lived, it was significant of his breadth of mind; for it was based upon the idea that, since infant baptism and baptism by sprinkling were rejected by some Christians, whereas adult immersion was accepted as a valid form of baptism by all Christians, adult immersion could be made a common basis for all. As in other religious movements, the original purpose has been frequently forgotten by those who call themselves the followers of its founder. The term "Christian" or "Disciple," once adopted as a protest against sectarianism, has, by force of circumstances, become the name of a very distinct and powerful denomination, and immersion, adopted as a liberalizing practice, became in time a barrier against others who were equally entitled to the name Christian. In years past, contention marked by acerbity has characterized in certain localities the relations between churches of the Disciples, which believe in immersion, and Baptist churches, which also believe in immersion. Those days, however, are happily passing. It was not without significance that the final meeting of this convention of Disciples at Pittsburg was held in a Baptist church. The fact that the days of sectarian warfare are passing is due in no small degree to the influence which Campbell set in motion, and to the existence of the denomination which, tracing its descent from him, has existed for a hundred years without a formal creed and with remarkable freedom of organization combined with striking unity of feeling. The one address which aroused the greatest interest and called forth the most pronounced expressions of dissent at the convention was given by a layman, Colonel S. H. Church. He urged that the spirit of Alexander Campbell and his colleagues be given greater sway in dealing with the particular problems of today; that insistence upon immersion as a requisite for discipleship be frankly abandoned by the Disciples; that the principle of religious union be frankly acknowledged as including the Roman Catholic and the Jew; that the Disciples accept the knowledge that modern criticism of the Bible has brought, and that they cease to build churches in small communities already supplied with churches bearing other names. In spite of the fact that the convention by a large majority passed a resolution specifically disavowing the conclusions which Colonel Church reached, his address was the most significant single feature of the convention.

The Christian Courier on Professor Willett's Address

Disciples in Texas are a singularly fair-minded people if the spirit of their paper, The Christian Courier, represents them. Its editor, G. A. Faris, is a conservative believer, but a man of progress as well. The columns of the Courier have been open to any reasonable utterance of any honest thinker, even though he differs sharply with the editor. We know of no one who has struck a finer balance between liberty and loyalty than has Mr. Faris. In the issue of November 4, the Courier prints in full the address by Professor Willett at Pittsburg and takes occasion in an editorial on "Some of the Speakers at Pittsburg," to revive a bit of ancient history—almost a year old—and to make some pertinent observations.

We give our readers this week the address of Herbert L. Willett, delivered at the Centennial Convention at Pittsburg. We give it, not because Mr. Willett delivered it, but because we regard it as the best study of the life's aims and efforts of the great reformer that we have yet seen. In this address Mr. Willett brings out the real man whose memory we love to honor. It is not a review of the partial friend nor that of the captious critic, but a clear and honest, and, we think, a most thorough presentation of the man and his message. It is worthy a place in the permanent archives of any Disciple. We need to know first what were the aims and purposes of these men; the difficulties under which they labored, and what was the effect of former influences on their minds. We need to know just what it was that stirred their righteous souls, and the manner in which they tried to correct the evils. That this address unfolds many facts not familiar to the average Disciple is clear to all who read it. It is long, we admit, but the subject was a great one, and it was necessary to give emphasis to certain features of the theme, that some mistaken notions might be corrected. The address will bear a careful study, and we hope it will receive it from many.

It will be remembered that the mere fact that the committee named Mr. Willett as one of the speakers stirred up quite a "hornet's nest." There were those who felt that the cause was surrendered; that a compromise had been made with infidelity, and that great injustice had been done to the brotherhood. Mr. Willett was maligned, and all manner of accusations were brought against him—except that in no instance was his personal character attacked, only by implication. He was heralded as an infidel, one who would barter the cause of truth for a little fame; one who was unworthy of recognition by Christian people. So strong was this opposition that a special meeting of the committee was called and Mr. Willett was summoned before them and his orthodoxy was inquired into after the fashion of a century and a half ago. It was charged that Mr. Willett did not believe in the divinity of Jesus and that he held all sorts of heretical views. When the committee met, and Mr. Willett was before them, those who had been the loudest in their denunciations of Willett and their protestations of their own soundness, refused to question him. He was, however, asked if he believed in the divinity of Jesus, and his answer came unhesitatingly, "I not only believe in his divinity, but I believe in his deity." The press—that part of it which does not hesitate to publish things that will injure the standing and influence of a rival brother—was full for weeks and months of warnings against the dangerous heretic, and harsh accusations against the committee for giving him a place on the program.

The committee had no human built creed to which they would bind all men. They congratulated themselves that they were identified and aligned with a people whose boast was that they did not bind men to human interpretations, hence the committee was not moved by the calamity cry. Mr. Willett was retained on the program, and the address he delivered is a vindication of his orthodoxy. No honest man—and Mr. Willett's personal integrity has never been qestioned—could give utterance to such sentiments as abound in this address unless that man was a believer in God, and in his Christ, and in the great mission of the Redeemer. Unless his utterances falsify his heart, he is a man of strong faith. Not only faith in what was, but faith in what is. Not only does he believe that God was with the holy apostles and prophets, but that he is with the loyal and true men who consecrate their lives to him today. While Mr. Willett holds to some views which we do not share, the Courier is frank to say that it endorses the position taken by the speaker in this address that Thomas Campbell was called of God for the great work which he did.

But the Disciples are becoming so accustomed to these cries of warning that they fail to excite as they once did. Like the boy who cried "Wolf! Wolf!" when there was no wolf, the cry does not awaken the fear it did at first. Whenever one appoints himself as the special guardian of the truth, he is most sure to find enough heresy to get himself before the public and advertise his orthodoxy. It has been but a little while since A. B. (the Courier no doubt means J. M.) Philputt, of St. Louis, was written up as one whom the world needs to fear. True, the basis of the criticism was the utterances of one of the reporters for the daily papers of St. Louis. While these reporters may be very good sort of fellows, and may try to do that which is right, as a class they are not qualified to pass upon the theological soundness of preachers, and their well-known desire to get that which is sensational makes them rather poor authority upon which to assail a brother's religious integrity.

The Courier does not know Mr. Philputt, but if his utterances in his address at Pittsburg, published in last week's issue of the Courier, are to be taken as evidence, he has a faith that some of those who have been criticising him very much need. In this address Mr. Philputt said: "The central sun of the spiritual universe is Jesus Christ. The Bible is only a book, but it is the revelation of his life—the record of his deeds among men, the compendium of his sayings. Human doctrines and opinions we may receive or reject, but one clear word of Jesus Christ we may not reject. We are not capable of using such freedom. We start with the authority of Jesus Christ. If there is no authority of Jesus, there is no authority anywhere and every man is a law unto himself." We have given emphasis to those words which we think some of our critics need to study and apply. If the words of Jesus Christ teach us not to impugn the motives of a brother, the man who does so can not indorse the words emphasized above. Such words are strange utterances for an infidel, or even for a dangerous man. The cry of wolf in such cases falls upon listless ears.

Another one of the speakers at Pittsburg, while there has been no direct attack on his orthodoxy—at least we have seen none—yet he has been listed as a sympathizer of the heretics. We speak of H. O. Breeden. In his Pittsburg address he said: "The two-fold question framed by our Lord himself and put to the Pharisees (What think ye of Christ?) is the vital, the crucial and transcendant question of the Christian religion. The question enthrones a person—not a system, not a philosophy or an institution. Christ Himself is our song. It is not an abstraction we sing. It is not the church; institutions are His inspiring music. It is not even the Bible; that is only the score book. Christ himself is our song, concrete, vital, expressive, universal."

These are clear utterances, made in apparent serious earnestness, and he who assails the faith that prompted them does not understand the genius of the plea we have been making these one hundred years. Not only this, but he who denounces those who hold these views and promulgates them, as infidel and dangerous, belong not to us, but to those who are willing to offer their own interpretations as tests of fellowship.

The Courier is not summoned to answer for any of these men. It does not propose to underwrite or in any way assume responsibility for their utterances. Some of them, we know, hold views we can not indorse. But there are other men—men in our own Texas land—who hold views that are just as odious to us, but that does not mean that these men are to be repudiated so long as they hold to Jesus Christ as the only begotten Son of God and the world's Savior and Lord. Just as long as men hold these views of our Lord, and give not only a theoretical, but a practical respect to his word, such men have right to our fellowship. We fully endorse the saying quoted above that "One clear word of Jesus Christ we cannot reject." This applies to the treatment we give others, as well as to the dectrines we hold. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, when ye have love one for another."

Progress and Achievements of A Century

Address Delivered at the Centennial Convention by the Grandson of Walter Scott

Samuel Harden Church

I have read somewhere in history of a custom which prevailed in ancient Rome whereby the slaves were given opportunity once a year to speak their minds to their masters with perfect freedom, after doing which they relapsed into their former unhappy condition of servitude. It must have been worth the wearing of chains to talk back just once at their masters without fear of punishment. The same privilege should in our day be accorded to the pews to talk to the pulpits. I look upon this centennial opportunity in that light, although it seems that my chance, instead of being an annual event, comes but once in a hundred years. Perhaps the judgment of my hearers will be that once in a hundred years is enough.

Numerical Growth.

Inaugurating its movement near Pittsburg on October 7, 1809, with twenty-seven members, we find the church today, in October, 1909, with an adult membership in America, including its Bible School enrollment, approximating two million souls. This church has at present 7,000 ministers ordained to preach, 12,000 churches in America and 1,000 in other lands, a church property worth thirty millions, and thirty-three colleges in which there are enrolled this year 8,000 students. And I think this must be the time to call upon our presiding officer, Dr. Bell, of Drake University, in the language of Byron, perhaps, "Oh, ye who teach the ingenious youth of nations," and upon Hiram and Bethany and Kentucky and Indiana, and the rest of our colleges, to bring forward with all speed that may be possible these young men who are going to consecrate their lives to the ministry, in order that this excess of six thousand pulpits over the present list of ministers may be filled. There never was a time in the history of the world when the church so much needed intelligent brains in the pulpit. Its membership has given the world a brilliant galaxy of men in all the walks of life, from the Presidency of the United States, the Senate, the House, the Cabinet, the Courts, and our diplomatic service, to literature, science, the professions, business and philanthropy. A religious movemen which could in one century demonstrate so remarkable a growth in its appeal to the reason of mankind is surely worthy of the popular celebration at Pittsburg which has attracted the attention of the world.

But by far the greatest achievement of the century is this magnificent convention of fifty thousand people, like a mighty army of crusaders marching hither from all over the world to testify that God is stupendously at work in his world. And I must not fail to tell you what was said to me this afternoon as I came into the room, by the superintendent of the building. "I have seen many crowds here since this splendid building was put up," said he, "but I never saw such a nice crowd as these Disciples." The influence of this splendid gathering will never be forgotten in Pittsburg; the interests of our local churches will be immeasurably advanced, the church at large will be stimulated to new enthusiasm, and the world itself will feel the spur of your renewed energy.

To Whom Credit Is Due.

The men and women who have accomplished the success of this meeting are the whole church at large; and after that the faithful ministers who have kept their people posted as to general plans. General committeemen have worked splendidly. But I am sure that I am not derogating from any man's honor when I say that the one man behind the gun from the beginning, whose faith in the outcome and consecration to his task have made this extraordinary success possible,—I might almost say the man who has made the convention—is the Chairman of the Centennial Committee, William R. Warren.

And then there is another force to be recognized and praised—and that is the whole newspaper press of Pittsburg. I believe that, with all its faults, and they are many, the American newspaper press, next to the pulpit, is the most stimulating element in our civilization. The Pittsburg newspapers have covered the broad field of your work with great sympathy and faithfulness, enabling the entire community to partake of your most interesting deliberations.

I wish that the time allotted to me would enable me to say the words of praise and compliment which fill my heart when I contemplate the victorious church that is represented before me! I would like to say much of those pioneers—Thomas Campbell, who courageously initiated the movement a hundred years ago; Alexander Campbell, his son, whose scholarship, logic, and zeal promoted it before the attention of the world; Barton W. Stone, whose early preaching prepared the way; and of that other whose eloquence and overwhelming love made him a blazing torch among the people, winning over whole communities to the new cause, and in one instance, like a victorious general, securing the surrender of seventeen entire churches in Ohio with their congregations and their property—Walter Scott.

Speaks of Progress.

But I am told to speak not only of achievements, but of progress. Now progress means forward movement, and "it needs no ghost come from the grave, Horatio," to tell us of the wonderful progress of our cause. A membership and Bible School enrollment of two millions; a century of consecration which has made a permanent impression on the world's civilization; an example of creedless growth which has impelled other churches to forget their dogmas—How much more could I say on that score! But the word is progress. If we locate divine truth at the North Pole shall we attain that precious goal?—is any one nearer than we to it? Alas, I would gladly speak of triumphant things all day, but others have done that for a whole week. Surely one speech that has a note of caution will not be out of harmony, even amidst all the chorus of victory. It would be a very narrow conception of the subject assigned to me if I should find our progress arrested at this twentieth century outlook, and then fail to describe the barriers that give us pause. I feel sure that our joint concern for the onward movement of our church will justify me in describing, in the plainest language, those obstacles which loom straight ahead with terrific bigness.

You have done wonders. Your missionaries —these men and women who consecrate their lives on the foreign field—their very appearance here speaks a pathos that brings tears to the eyes. It means so much. And that boat built by the Oregon churches and launched at Pittsburg this week for missionary service on the African rivers—how dramatic is that boat! It is all so wonderful!

But is there anything wrong in God's world?

Did any of you see that little bulletin issued during the last month by the Census Department of the United States Government? It gave the religious statistics of our country and told us that there are forty-five millions—not in Africa, not in China or India—but forty-five millions in America who have no church affiliations. These forty-five millions are not the ignorant masses, for insofar as we have ignorant masses, they are chiefly our immigrant forces, and the large majority of these are cared for in the great sheltering arms of the Catholic church. But there are forty-five millions of good Americans outside of any church, that is to say, about one-half of the total population of our country. The problem presented by that Census bulletin has given me a new significance for the word progress. Why is it that that portion of our unchurched population which we will agree to call "the world" is constantly growing in a greater ratio than the churches themselves? God's world is all right. Can there be anything wrong with the churches—this or any other? Are we going to reach this North Pole at all? Those fortyfive millions will not come to us. Can we get to them? If so, we must make a sacrifice, for there is no victory without a sacrifice.

Growth of Protestantism.

Now, it is all so simple, and the trouble is they are encrusting it so much with mystery and difficulty that the world will have none of it. But the history of the work shows that the more mystery they put around it the more force it lost and the more its vital energies were destroyed. And so the cloud was gathering all the time, and that period is called the Dark Ages, during which the human race passed through a tunnel a thousand years long, and when it came out nobody recognized or could recognize the institution that existed as a representative of primitive things. Then came learning; suddenly the people began to think; those universities were established, the first one at Paris, the next one at Bologna; then at Oxford—and the bigness of the movement is shown when Oxford registered thirty thousands students right at the end of the Dark Ages. And the purpose of those universities then as today was to make men think. Thinking had become a lost art. And they began to think, and then the face of society was very quickly changed. Then came that age of intellectual splendor, the Renaissance, which gave us a group of painting, sculpture and literature rivaling the ancient glories of Greece and Rome, the culmination of which was William Shakespeare. It was essential that these influences should bring the Reformation, with Luther; and then Henry VIII—bad men sometimes accomplish good ends; and then when they were both too dogmatic, Calvin, whose dogmatism surpassed both of them; and then Oliver Cromwell and the Congregationalists and the rest of them came; and then John Wesley, the first man to put character above creed and dogma, as the paramount scheme of human life, doing more for free religion than any man who had ever lived up to that time save the Apostle Paul. And then the natural successors of these men—I will say of these splendid men, excepting the English Bluebeard,—who had all worked hard for the purpose of lifting up humanity, they were the men who established this church one hundred years ago. Thomas

Campbell, Alexander Campbell, Barton W. Stone and Walter Scott. It was just an easy progression, like so many outposts, like so many lines of march toward the North Pole, ever on toward the Divine Truth. I wonder how near, if Divine Truth be represented by the North Pole, how near we really stand to it?

Meaning of Nativity Stories.

Away back there was that little family in Palestine, Joseph and Mary and their seven children—Jesus, the oldest, and four other boys, James and Juda, and Joses, and Simon, and the two daughters, Salome and one other. That family was a unit in the nation, a unit in society, as any family represented here today is: a God-fearing group, brought up in the fear of God. Joseph was a direct descendant of King David—and do not forget that it was Joseph, and not his wife, who was the direct descendant of King David: we have been wrong on that since those Dark Ages began. And Joseph was dignifying labor in his little carpenter shop there, and always careful to study the law. And Jesus was chosen to perform the greatest mission that was ever launched on this earth. And what was it? He found the world going to seed from self-righteousness. Men were standing on the street corners and rolling their eyes in arrogant holiness and thanking God they were not like other men! And God put his spirit and soul into the spirit and soul of Jesus—his spirit was begotten by the spirit of God, he became the son of God and the Savior of men. Oh, don't let us ever even pretend to put it in that other way, that revolting way which drove the broken-hearted young Jewish bridegroom into the divorce court! That is merely a gross and repugnant literal reading of a beautiful spiritual fact, and was originally chosen by profane minds in order to give this honorable wife and mother a spectacular position as the wife of God and the Queen of Heaven. That cruel doctrine is the source of half our woes; it is at once a slur on the character of God and a stigma on the name of Jesus. The divinity which we joyously acknowledge comes to us in a better way than that! And with the certain fading away of that doctrine the larger part of the structural differences between the Catholics and the Protestants will disappear. And then the Saviour began his mission, which was to vitalize that wicked righteousness with the spirit of love, and that made a thing called Christian character, because it was modelled on the divine nature of Jesus. When, a long time afterwards, the Romans asked Paul to explain the meaning of Christianity to them, he told them there were five negative qualities and one positive quality required to make a perfect man. "Thou shalt not commit any impurity. Thou shalt not bear false witness. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not covet." Those were the five prohibitions, which cut away all the sin out of a man's life and reduced him to a state of righteousness, complete righteousness. But experience had shown how this negative perfection could make men monsters of self-righteousness. And so Paul, after hard thinking, adds these wonderful words of Jesus: "If there be anything else to complete the religious state of man, it is comprised in this brief saying, that you shall love your neighbor as yourself"—your neighbor being always that man, friend or foe, rich or poor, far or near, high or low, who may stand in need of any quality or thing which you can aid him to receive! That is primitive simplicity reduced to its logical skeleton. No dogma, no form, no sacrament—nothing but perfect character moved into action by overwhelming love. That's all there was to it—so simple that Jesus told them that the Kingdom of Heaven is like unto a little child. They could not understand it, and they pictured a glorious empire with its seat at Rome, or Geneva, or Constantinople, or Pittsburg, or even up there among the planets and the stars. But Jesus swept all this pretension aside and astounded them when he told them, "the Kingdom of Heaven is within you!" A Christian man who feels the truth of that avowal can worship in a Jewish temple and still be in close nearness to God. We shall never have religious union—we shall never have anything but hateful faction—until we learn the significance of that utterance! The Kingdom of Heaven is not beyond the grave, not among the stars, not in any possible combination of bricks and mortar, but in each man's heart. Then, the pious men who followed him saw Jesus surrounded by a population which was hungry and athirst after righteousness,—very much like this mighty outpouring of fifty thousand people at Pittsburg—and witnessed how he fed them their daily food from his overflowing heart. How gladly they slighted their tables in order that they might have the bread of life! I have never yet met a man, not even the closest constructionist of the old school, who will put a literal interpretation upon the miracle about the fish and the gold piece. What possible difference can it make to us now whether Jesus comforted those two bereaved sisters by convincing them that their brother was in a higher state of life, or whether he brought the actual body out of the grave, only to have it die again? His authority and his mission are not affected by either construction. And if spiritual interpretation helps you there, you will find that spiritual interpretation will help you in a thousand other places. But even if we should concede all these things to have been literal and physical and actual, the time has come when they conform themselves to our needs only in a spiritual way; and the gross, material conceptions of a generation that fought about words are no longer essential to us. That simple teaching of the power of love won the world and will win the world better than if we should surround it with the necromancer's art and make the mountains thunder and the graves give up their dead!

The Work of Jesus.

And it is well to remember that when Jesus performed his work on earth he did it without the help of any Bible. He sometimes quoted from the Old Testament, but usually only to show that he was bringing a new spirit to human society, and his message was so simple that he never wrote a line with his pen to elucidate or preserve it. The church was established in Jerusalem, in Europe, in Asia, and in Africa long before the Bible was written. Much of it was written from memory after a great lapse of time; and not until 325 A. D. was any attempt made to select from the great body of manuscripts which purported to be sacred those few which were really considered to be worthy of a place in the Bible, and then mistakes were made which future councils endeavored to correct; and so it was until the age of printing arrived. No man of sense will say today that the Bible is textually inerrant; and that motto appearing everywhere today, "Where the Scriptures speak we speak, and where the Scriptures are silent we are silent," must be understood, like everything else, within sane limitations. But it is a part of the progress of which I am to speak that modern scholarship has given us a new light on the Bible, from which we have found verily a new life; and as this examination proceeds, it becomes a more and more precious book in the growing richness of its imperishable truth.

It was in trying to win the world to the old religion in its simple form, which the world had refused to accept in its complicated form, that Thomas and Alexander Campbell and Walter Scott went further than anyone had ever gone before in sacrificing things which were once considered essential to eternal welfare. With those forty-five millions outside the churches, perhaps we shall find that a further sacrifice of things once deemed essential to our eternal welfare is now imperatively required. I have heard some of the brethren in Pittsburg this week say, "No compromise!" But now, let me say this, because I am going to discuss something in a moment very reverently with you and very carefully, for I have thought it all over for several years and it has come out of my heart and my conscience in this once a century appearance, but I want to say this thing first. Is there any one here who would think that we are done? Isn't the man who says that perfection is here now and evolution has accomplished its purpose and there is nothing more to be done, isn't that man miscalled a conservative man, isn't he the real anarchist, the real intellectual and spiritual anarchist in human society? The man who sits over yonder in his little corner of truth, and says, "I am the Columbus who has discovered this world, it is all mine, and nobody else has anything that they can tell me,"—that man is surely not a leader in society. He is the man who checks progress, who destroys harmony. And yet there are people who say that very thing,—who say, "We cannot go any further, there is no more progress to be made, our fathers have settled this thing." Now, if that is so, we may as well adjourn this convention with our first century, and when the next one comes along we would not have so much victory to shout over nor so many triumphs to be honestly proud of as we have today. I am told to talk of progress, and there can be no more progress if we are to stand still.

Sacrifices and Progress.

I have told you that the fathers of our church were forced to make great sacrifices. Sacrifice is always the first sorrow that comes to the soul of a leader. Luther and Calvin and the rest—don't you know that these men suffered the tortures which only great souls can feel when they broke away from conventional and inherited habits and beliefs? But with every sacrifice religious progress was advanced just that far. And these early leaders of ours made great sacrifices. The two Campbells and Walter Scott were nurtured in the Presbyterian church, and they left it. Now, those men were taught, and they taught others, that sprinkling as a form of baptism was valid and sufficient. But when persecution drove them to revolt against their own church they began to hunger for an organization that would shelter the whole human race. They found then that the larger part of the people of Christendom practiced some form of baptism, the most of them by sprinkling, but a smaller number by immersion; and so, for that reason, and not originally because they deemed it the only valid way, our church fathers adopted immersion, because no one could dispute the entire sufficiency of immersion, while a few would dispute the sufficiency of the other form. The record is very clear on this cardinal fact, and we should keep it in mind.

And what is our condition now? Listen. Thomas Campbell, in his Declaration, said: "The Bible, without any human interpretation." And again he said: "We are persuaded that as no man can be judged for his brother, so no man can judge for his brother, but that every man must be allowed to judge for himself, as every man must bear his own judgment,—must give an account of himself to God." A noble platform that, my friends, but we are not standing upon it today. Now, I myself have been immersed, and I believe in baptism as a loyal mark of obedience to him whom I regard as the Savior of men, and in so far as I am concerned I prefer immersion to any other form. And I readily admit the force of all those texts about going down into the water which I can read in your minds when I allude to this subject. But those texts do not impress other millions of men as they do you and me. Accepting the Scriptures for your own guidance without any human interpretation of it means that your brother must be allowed to accept it for himself without your interpretation of it. Therefore, the Methodist policy which leaves it optional for the candidate to choose his own form of baptism is much nearer the mark of a free church than ours, which confines him to a form of baptism of our choice. It is scarcely imaginable that the jailer and his household were immersed in the jail at Phillippi. But even if they were, it is a plain inference from Scripture that many thousands of those who were converted by the Apostles were never baptized at all. Jesus, who never baptized anyone, and who had a hatred of formalism, went into the Jewish synagogues every day and called those people to the higher life, but never saying a word to them about baptism; and, in the Sermon on the Mount, where Jesus gives a complete exposition of the quality of Christian character, he does not tell that multitude of curious listeners that he requires them to be baptized. When Paul started to preach the gospel to the pagan world, the close constructionists at Jerusalem followed him to Antioch, and insisted that he must circumcise all his converts. At first he tried to put them off with a protest, telling them that there was the circumcision of the flesh and the circumcision of the spirit; and when they insisted, he hastened to Jerusalem, taking Barnabas with him, and also his bigoted critics, and there, almost twenty years after the death of Christ, was held the first Council of the Church, as we are told in that famous fifteenth chapter of Acts. Peter was there, and James, the full brother of Jesus, and they were both Jews who held fast to old prejudices—in their hearts they secretly wished the gospel kept exclusively for the Jews; but after the bigots had made their demands, Paul told the Council that the whole world outside of Judaism would be lost if this old rite, established in the beginning entirely for sanitary reasons, was going to be made obligatory on the cultured Greeks. Christianity would have fallen at that instant, but both Peter and James yielded, and Paul returned to Antioch triumphantly with a free gospel. You are confronted today with the same difficulty concerning immersion.

Baptism and Individual Conscience.

What does it matter to you what method of baptism your brother chooses so that his own conscience is satisfied?—and I am not suggesting for a moment that sprinkling should take the place of immersion. Please don't forget that! My whole plea is the absolute right of private interpretation even against the judgment of that organized majority which calls itself the church. To adhere to compulsory immersion transforms this free church into Pope and Eccumenical Council all in one. Why should not the minister in the case of adult applicants who have already been baptized, advise immersion and stop there, being governed thereafter by the declared conscience of his convert? Let me give you this case—there are thousands like it: A lady born and raised in the Disciples Church is married to an Episcopalian gentleman who frequently goes with his wife to her church, and at last, when their children are growing up in that church, he, too, wishes to become a member of it, but conscientiously believes that the rite of baptism, administered in his young manhood by sprinkling, is sufficient and valid. Is it not just as consistent to require feet washing, which many thousands of good people do require, the Emperor of Russia being one of them, as it is to require any other literal imitation of primitive times? Whenever you stop to set up Apostolic forms rather than the Apostolic spirit you are going to erect barriers to progress. You will never get those forty-five millions by requiring submission to Apostolic forms. Oh, my friends, I ask you whether religion, which is the fulness of life on earth in accordance with God's laws, has not become too big and too vital and too real a thing to be bound any longer to dead forms! I ask you to reflect, with such self-cleansing power as the circumstance may carry with it, that as you go through life every other man you meet upon the street is nursing in the dark recesses of his brain a dogma which will save himself and damn his fellow men! I believe that all men and all women who present themselves from other Protestant or Catholic churches feeling that a valid baptism has been administered to them should be accepted with joyful approbation on their own statement. What other basis of union can you have? In the olden times, when they were pursuing this custom of immersion, it frequently occurred that persons lived amidst vast stretches of arid lands where there was no water in sufficient quantity for dipping, and so sprinkling was resorted to under the law of necessity; and those conditions exist today. Thus we had the symbol instead of the thing itself; and when you come to adopt a symbol the mind can perform the symbolic act as sufficiently as the hand. And millions of intelligent men say that not even the symbol is essential to a righteous life governed by the spirit of love. When they do assume that position who is to interpret between them and God? Surely no one but themselves. Does not Thomas Campbell say that? A large section of the people of Christendom are taught to believe that unbaptized children dying shall never see the face of God. You see what horrid conclusions come upon society when they place any saving efficacy upon either a dogma or a rite! The pious and faithful Quakers of the old school believe that baptism is by the spirit only, as Paul, after his conversion, believed of circumcision; and the brotherhood of a free church ought to receive into full membership all Quakers whose conscience prepared them to come, and all other men who so construed their duty, it being their privilege to interpret the way, and not ours. If you interpret for them in baptism you should not stop short of forcing them to the thirty-nine articles. And then where are you? The whole genius of Protestantism is the right of private interpretation to the very last individual in the world. Yet how inconsistent we are, for there is scarcely a Protestant church in existence which has not formulated one or more statements of belief,—and our own church is no exception,—and then demanded that the whole world should accept these averments as divine truth, or be eternally condemned! You cannot tell me for a moment that you really believe that immersion is essential to salvation, because you have already consented to its administration by other forms. Yes, yes! For you have been going into union with other churches for evangelistic work, and you have agreed beforehand that the converts from those meetings shall be apportioned to the churches for which they express a preference, and you knew that many of those churches would never immerse them, but would only sprinkle them. Now, why did you agree to do that if our form is essential? At this end of our first century have we not gone far astray from the teachings of our fathers?

Refers to Alexander Campbell.

Now, will you let me take you back to Alexander Campbell, and see what he says on that subject? In 1837, Mr. Campbell said: "I cannot make any one duty the standard of Christian state or character, not even immersion into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." And again Mr. Campbell said: "It is the image of Christ the Christian looks for and loves; and this does not consist in being exact in a few items, but in general devotion to the whole truth as far as known." But this is what I started to read—and please remember that these are the words of Alexander Campbell, in 1837, when he was in the full splendor of his powers: "There is no occasion for making immersion on a profession of the faith, absolutely essential to a Christian, though it may be greatly essential to his sanctification and comfort." And, now, before you kindle for me those funeral pyres of heresy, let me read you this, once again, from Alexander Campbell: "We have, in Paul's style, the inward and outward Jews, and may we not have the inward and outward Christians? As the same Apostle reasons on circumcision (Romans, 2:25-29), so we would reason on baptism." And I pray you, my brethren, to read that passage from Romans before you condemn either Mr. Campbell or me! I promise that those of you who are censuring me will be startled by what you will find there! Did it ever occur to you that God could rule his world outside of the church?—that he could inspire his children by whispering into their hearts loving inspirations which the church does not speak into their ears? And is not this the whole meaning of religion—that a man can find God for himself as surely as a loving child can find its father? Now I am told that there are one hundred and eighty-six sects in America, every one of which presents a plan of salvation different from all the others. And in spite of that multitude of churches, the world, turning from that situation with perplexed candor, has found its own conception of God in relation to human life, and is living out its own destiny accordingly. This is not a theory of mine, but it is the actual condition of about one-half of the population of America, or, to use the exact figures of the Census Bureau, of forty-five millions of people. And in that situation, somewhere or other, you will find the answer to your own question, as to why men do not go to church. Would it not be an astounding thing, my friends, if, while we of all these churches are warring with each other about the meaning of abstruse dogmas and the efficacy of ancient forms, that orderly and well-behaved portion of society which we call "the world" would find God for itself and accomplish its own salvation from the sins of this world without the aid of the churches?

In the Men's Bible Class which I am teaching for a limited period in the East End Christian Church we have Jews and Catholics and Protestants of every denomination and of no denomination. Their simple entrance into the front door assures these men of a cordial acceptance into the full fellowship of that class. Ladies and gentlemen, the door of Christ's church must be as wide as the door of that Bible class. But when the Sunday-school adjourns and the church takes up the day's work, all this splendid spirit of brotherhood disappears. The Catholics, the Jews, the Protestants of the other sects, while they would be welcome, mind you, as visitors, are not permitted to enter into fellowship in the church because we interpret the Bible in regard to what they shall believe and do. Why have we taken from the Jews their religion, their literature, their spiritual purpose, and their call to righteousness, using these appropriated things to form so much of the structure of our own religion, and then shut the doors against the entrance of the Jews? I know well the answer you would make. But when Jesus went among them in Palestine he pleaded with them to accept his message of a better form of righteousness vitalized with the spirit of love, but effacing his own personality, for when some of them began to set the man in advance of his mission, he told them that they should call no man good except the Father in Heaven. Calvary may be the essential completion of Sinai, but we must be tenderly sympathetic and patient in letting that proposition prove itself. Only last Thanksgiving Day this community received the noblest lesson it has ever learned on the full meaning of a religious brotherhood in its furthest reach when the Jewish Rabbi, Doctory Levy, held a great union meeting of praise and prayer in his Temple, and eight Christian ministers and their congregations joined with the Jews in that beautiful service. When will those Christian ministers invite the Jews to a return service of worship, I wonder? It was my own privilege to be in that Temple a few weeks ago when President Taft spoke there, and I tell you that the prayer that was made by the Rabbi brought God into every man's heart, for it brought forth the sure testimony of abundant tears. The Kingdom of Heaven is within you! The Jews—especially those of the second generation in America,—are nearly ready to come with us now, and we should hasten to meet them at the threshold with gentleness and not rigor. The environment will do the rest.

What Creed Would Jesus Require?

I have often wondered what would happen if Jesus should come to earth some day and stand at the door of any one of the churches. When a man approaches, would Jesus command him to believe him to be a God, on pain of having his soul destroyed? No, because the man would flee from him as from a monster. Yet that is just what you are doing in the name of Jesus. Would he propound thirty-nine articles of faith, or one article, or half an article, before permitting the man to enter the church? Would he compel him to construe and interpret a Scripture which did not exist when he was on earth? Would he require him to be baptized other than with his own spirit? No! no! But he would take the man by the hand, and plead with him in irresistible tenderness to strive to be worthy in his life and character, and to treat all other men with loving kindness. That would make the man his faithful follower. That is the way he treated the sinful Mary. He did not stop to threaten her, or to baptize her, or to instruct her in mysteries beyond the wisest intellect; yet she gave him the devotion of tears from that first contact with his spirit. That is all he would do—we know that, because that was all he did do when he was here. He would never see any difference between a Jew and an Episcopalian, a Catholic and a Unitarian, except in the measure of their righteousness and love. These would all be members of his church upon an equal footing. And they would believe on him, because he was gentle, and not because he wore the aspect of a God. But with Jesus away, look what a confusion we have wrought in setting up false barriers and disputed forms, and in judging men for their mental conceptions of things! Look how we have burnt each other at the stake—yea, and how we would do it again if we had the power! That is why the world is rejecting the churches more and more every year. That is why these forty-five millions stand outside! And they will continue to stand outside, their numbers constantly augmenting, until we change our conception of Jesus and his mission so that it will conform to the primitive and unchangeable truth!

Basis of Union.

I believe, my dear friends, that we, who are the descendants by blood and heritage of the fathers of our church have the right to promote their work into more extended boundaries than they chose for themselves, and to bring it closer to the heart of humanity than they had the opportunity of doing; and until we do this, instead of being able to offer our organization as a groundwork for Christian union, we find ourselves merely one more sect, holding to a compulsory interpretation of Scripture which presents a greater obstacle to fellowship than any artificial creed, and shutting out millions of men who would otherwise be tempted to join the church. Suppose that all the churches in the land were to propose to you today to accept your offer of union, which you have been making for a century:—you would destroy their glad approach at the first conference by requiring them all to be baptized over again. Brethren, it is unthinkable!

Must Include Catholic and Jew.

In all my references to religious union, I have spoken from a point of view which must embrace our Catholic and our Jewish brethren in its ultimate reach. America is the melting pot in which all the white races must be amalgamated and all their religions blended. It is heartbreaking to behold our Catholic brethren maintaining their own creed of exclusive salvation and teaching that creed in their parochial schools to the precious children of the Republic, narrowing the horizon of their lives, and building up a segregated nation within the larger nation, the smaller having no truly religious or social sympathy for the great remainder. It seems a great thing to ask of our American Catholics that they will, as a ground of reciprocal toleration and union, abolish their parochial schools and acknowledge the plenary sufficiency in life and death of the Protestant religion, and grant to their dear children the right to mingle with us reciprocally in our worship. Yet, if I do not mistake the signs of the times, we shall have fellowship with the Catholic people on just that basis sooner than most people think, and that will be the greatest blessing God has ever sent to this country. Bishop McFaul, of the Catholic church, has very recently made this significant utterance:—oh, if he will only make good his words, how quickly we will meet him in all good works: "Let me announce it deliberately and with all the emphasis possible," says this Catholic leader, "that the time has come when infidelity and immorality are stalking abroad in our land, and that it behooves all Christian people, Protestants and Catholics alike, to forget their petty jealousies and indifferences and, although holding fast to their religious convictions, to unite, to stand shoulder to shoulder, forming an impregnable barrier to antichristian doctrine and pagan morals." Today the spirit of Modernism in the Catholic Church and the spirit of the higher criticism in the Protestant Church, which are only other names for Science in the garb of Truth, are tearing away all the fables which have served as the foundations for dogmatic theology, and when these foundations are destroyed the systems of creed, which keep good men at war with each other, will fall.

Service of Higher Criticism.

I'll tell you what the higher criticism does for you. It makes your Bible a better book by explaining its difficulties to you! (Here there were interruptions.) I wonder if my friend who asked that question is up to date in his pulpit? How old was Methuselah?—will some one tell me that?

Nine hundred and sixty-nine years. Exactly; and he has been carrying that record for centuries, looking like Father Time himself, until the higher criticism, this scholarship in action, discovers the ancient calendar system of the Hebrews, and then we learn that a Jewish year was twenty-nine and one-half days, and Methuselah becomes exactly seventy-eight and one-third years old.

It was not so very long ago that a leading theory in all our religious systems was the doctrine known as the Fall of Man. Then came Darwin, the most reverent of Christian investigators. You may say that you will not recognize Darwin, but you might as well say that you will not recognize the sun that rose this morning. Darwin is here, and the sunshine is here. And Darwin proved to us that there could never have been any Fall of Man, but that evolution gave us instead the beautiful system of progression upward both for the intellectual as well as for the great realm of nature. Then, when we went haltingly to our Bibles, we discovered that that destructive fatalism of the Fall of Man, for which John Calvin burnt Servetus at the stake, does not exist in the Bible at all. It is mentioned but once in the Old Testament, and once in a merely parenthetical way by the Apostle Paul, but it is never even hinted at by Jesus. And so, throughout this so-called conflict between Religion and Science, the things which Science requires us to sacrifice, now and in the future, are those things exclusively which keep us in the strife of false opinion.

The Logic of Missionary Giving.

There are three ways of doing missionary work in the world. The first is by military conquest, as Greece and Rome and England have done it. The second is to build up such a beneficent civilization at home that the rest of the world will be glad to copy your methods. The third way is the consecrated missionary. We are all interested in missions, and you are giving us inspiring reports of foreign conversions by the hundreds. The record fills our souls with wonder. And yet—our yearning is so deep! Why do not these hundreds grow into millions? Can the Christian churches of America and Europe ever succeed in converting the rest of the world, Asia and Africa for instance, as long as we are split up into unrelated bands as at present? One of our largest and best equipped missionary stations reports one hundred and forty-eight baptisms in Tokyo in seven years. On the face of it that is a splendid record. Yet Tokyo has a population of 2,275,000. At that rate the world will be destroyed by its own gases before you break through the outer crust of Tokyo's conservatism. A paragraph in the "Tokyo Christian" tells me that the total conversions in Japan in the past fifty years, Roman Catholic Greek Catholic and Protestants of every kind, is one hundred and thirty thousand—in fifty years! That does not look like winning the world. Is there anything wrong with the method? Why not have a consolidation of missionary work to embrace all the churches of this land, both Catholic and Protestant, with headquarters in New York, like any other trust? Let there be a Board of Control comprising a fair representation based on a census of all the churches, including the Catholic church. Let this Board plan to give the foreign world an institutional missionary work that will be worthy of America, including in the general scheme hospitals, colleges, and orphanages. Then let it apportion missionaries and a general staff from each denomination on the same census basis and assign them to territories throughout the world where there will be no conflict of one church against another, and let the whole purpose of the missionary teaching be an exemplification of righteousness and love. A distinguished Japanese statesman said to me recently that Japan would never accept Christianity as a system of dogmas and sacraments, but that if it were offered as a system of conduct and character under the leadership of Jesus, he believed that it would become very attractive to his people. This is the age of trusts. Why not try it in religion? It stops competition and ruinous warfare in commerce, and it would stop competition and ruinous warfare in religion. The union method of missions will be necessary if any substantial impression is to be made upon the well reasoning mind of what is called the heathen world.

Can we not learn a great lesson from the Young Men's Christian Association, which seems to have adopted the ideal form of Christian Union, and solved the problem of the ages in giving the world a useful and uplifting religion which promotes the highest pattern of human life—that of happiness and work among all nations! We meet as friends in every relation of life except religion, but when it comes to religion, which is the relation of men to each other and to God, we sometimes fight each other with sharp claws, like devils in the air. Before we conquer the world it is necessary that we conquer ourselves. Earth has no bitterness that can equal the hatred of the bigot whose religious opinion differs from yours!

Existing Creeds Harmless.

But you must not attach too much importance to the existing creeds. It will be a long time before the other churches will give up their names or their creeds. The worst of those creeds are now harmless, like old blunderbusses hung on the wall, but too dear by association to throw away. Go to their churches when they are nearer your home—they never preach the old theologies although they profess to believe them—and urge them to come to your church under like circumstances. Above all, cease from any further extravagance in the building of unneeded churches. There are too many in some places already. We see this in its absurd aspect in the small town with perhaps four churches at the main square, when one would be large enough for all. When England has no diplomatic representative at any port she usually asks the Amreican representative to look after the interests of her people there. When you have no church at a place that is already well supplied with church facilities, ask the others to take care of your people, and leave the consequences to God. There is nothing to appall us in the spread of sects. Sectarianism is the only thing that has saved the world from tyranny and persecution, and it is sectarianism that has given us intellectual freedom. How long would intellectual freedom remain if the world were exclusively dominated by this or any other church? Look at France, striving for a hundred years to save her political system from religious domination—and Italy and Spain. And when there is no counterbalancing church men fall into Socialism, and many of them into anarchy. New organizations that go out from the old churches will find their right boundaries in time. The Christian Science movement, the New Thought movement, the Emmanuel movement, and all the rest are in the nature of nervous protests against the old theologies, with incidental attempts to find God and Heaven by a short cut. The Christian union which our fathers hoped for, in one broad organization, will never come. There never was and there never can be uniformity of opinion or of practice in religion. Even when Jesus was on earth his twelve Apostles were forever disputing with each other in their attempts to make his glad tidings mean more than he wished them to mean. And we have followed them instead of clinging to him! Most of the existing systems of dogmatic theology are based, not upon the teachings of Jesus, for Jesus confined himself first and last to character and conduct: but upon letters written at particular times to particular churches by the Apostle Paul. Now, Paul is undoubtedly the greatest preacher and missionary the world has ever known; but he never saw Jesus in the flesh; he was at one time the worst of bigots, and joined in the murder of a saintly man; he was not divine himself; he tells us over and over again that he does not write by inspiration; and sometimes he even doubts the wisdom of his own words. And if we would accept his exhortations to our spiritual profit and abandon the contradictory systems by which we have perverted his great writings to our own confusion, we would then grow much nearer to our real leader, Jesus; —and as we come nearer to him we must inevitably come nearer to each other. There were two sects in the church at Jerusalem; there were four in the church at Corinth. All these churches today are needed in the progress of civilization, the only imperative thing being that they should disarm against each other, as good men all over the world are urging the nations to disarm against each other. But Christian union will come—nay, is coming fast—in another shape. Reciprocal toleration and popular intermingling will be the signs of harmony, together with united efforts in all work for the good of humanity at home and abroad. And then it will make no great matter whether a man be a Presbyterian, or a Catholic, or a Disciple, or a Jew, so long as he strives to be, according to his own light, and in his own meaning of the word, a Christian. And in that way the prayer of Jesus will be realized. But you want these great churches to give up their creeds, yet you won't budge an inch!

Purpose of the Church Universal.

The church universal for which I am pleading must be the church whose paramount purpose is the fulness of life on earth in accordance with the example of Jesus. We have got far away from that doctrine of the olden time that religion was devised to prepare men for death, the grave and Heaven. The Kingdom of Heaven is within you! We have got far away from the idea of a Hell after death, which is a slur on the nature of God. Is it not a monstrous perversion of those attributes which alone would make God worthy of the love which we, his children, cherish for him, to maintain that he requires a man either to believe or to do anything in subjection to him, with the alternative of being damned after death? Yet some men have gone far beyond this in choosing certain accidental texts on which to erect a destiny of cruelty and blood. It is God's will that we suffer here for every conscious disobedience to those laws which our hearts tell us should be inviolate. That is all the Hell that exists, or that ever did exist; and in destroying the power of the church to torture us either here or hereafter we have compelled her to cease from tyranny and restore the Savior's way of gentleness. That, or she must perish! It was not this organization of erring men at Rome, denying that the earth is round, that Jesus promised to perpetuate. It was not this great convention at Pittsburg that was to be maintained forever. But it was the truth, and that shall endure without the church, and without the Bible if that were necessary. We have no longer any fear of the future—not even for our weakest brother! We came into this world helpless and unconscious, yet loving hands ministered to our needs. We shall go out of it helpless and unconscious, yet there again loving hands will surely minister to our needs. The Kingdom of Heaven is within you! The world has been clinging to dead forms for centuries, and those dead forms have broken families, states, and nations asunder, because men have attributed to dead forms the power to save or to destroy that which can only be saved or destroyed by the human spirit. It seems to me that we have almost secured Christian union right now without knowing it. What means this unprecedented opening of a hundred pulpits in Pittsburg in which these ministers now sitting before me are to preach tomorrow? What means the stupendous action of the Episcopal church in opening its pulpit to men of other affiliations? What are these things but the evidences of a practical Christian union already arrived? In what vital or substantial thing do we differ today from those magnificent churches, the Methodist, the Congregationalist, the Baptist, the Presbyterian, the Episcopalian, or any other? I say, not one. Oh, let us not, in any spirit of self exaltation, come within that scornful reference of Job: "Doubtless ye are the people, and wisdom will die with you!"

A Word from the Heart.

Oh, my friends, I know only too well that I have not made an agreeable speech. I know only too well that I have not made the speech which you expected me to make. I would not wilfully wound the spirit of any man who walks upon this earth. But what I have said has come from the depths of my nature. I have been out in the world while you have been buried in your churches and I have learned somewhat of the mind and heart of the world. I have seen the world's absorbing hunger, and I know that it is not being fed. The Government itself points you to these forty-five millions in whose life you have no substantial part. I speak to you as Hamlet did to his mother: "I have been cruel only to be kind." You know well what my grandsire did with those other men in establishing this church as a habitation for all mankind, in accordance with the will of the divine founder of all the churches of this world. I am only striving to promote his work and the work of his associates, as I believe in my heart of hearts that they themselves would promote it if they were here under the changed conditions of study and of thought in which we live. The harvest is out there!—but the church stands fixed and unyielding here! You have fenced in, let us say, two millions, but you have fenced out forty-five millions. By taking the advanced ground which lies right in front of you you can, without arrogance or ostentation, make this church the strongest religious organization in America. You have the most splendid opportunity that ever happened on this earth. And you will draw ever closer to your divine leader as you show a broader sympathy for his people. But impedimenta will arrest the progress of any explorer, whether he be in search of the North Pole or of divine truth! Somewhere you must make a sacrifice! What are you going to do about it? I know well! You are going to make a further progress which will surpass any conquests that you have yet made. The mission of the church,—the whole church and all its branches,—relieved from arrogance and dogmatism, is grander today than in any of the dramatic epochs of the past centuries. For the church, becoming once more the servant and not the master of mankind, is to take her stand at the center of all things. Grouped about her knees as loyal children about a loving parent, shall come literature, science, philosophy, humanity, philanthropy, education, politics. And the business of the Christian minister will be to interpret all these things to men in their relation to conduct and life—and to show how God has manifested himself in his higher human world—the grandest career then, which life can afford. And over all will be the spirit of Jesus—under these conceptions immeasurably more attractive in its strength, beauty, tenderness, and authority—the Lord of Righteousness and Love.

NOTE.—To present to our readers this week the address by Mr. Church, and "What Other Journals Say of the Disciples Centennial," has required so much space that it has been necessary to postpone publishing the initial chapters of "The Coign of Vantage" until next week. Every reader of the Christian Century will want to follow this story of the trusts from the first chapter to the last.—Editors.

THAT BAD SPIRIT.

I know a little fellow
With eyes of softest brown.
Whenever he feels naughty
There comes a dreadful frown.

But when the bad old spirit
Goes from his heart, I say,
"Why! Mr. Smile is coming
To chase that frown away."

His face still warm from weeping,
I feel upon my cheek—
"I'm sorry! Please forgive me,"
He says, contrite and meek.

"I'm sorry, the 'bad spirit'
Came to my heart today;
I've just asked God to take him
And send him far away."

I kiss him very gently,
And hold his little hands.
Our Heavenly Father hears him
I'm sure, and understands.

Alan's Revival

FAY STUART.

"Now hold real still, Rover," coaxed Alan, "and I'll take that tooth out for you."

"Won't he bite you if it hurts?" asked Elsie.

"I guess not," replied Alan carelessly. "Of course all doctors have to run some risk."

Holding Rover firmly by the head, he opened his mouth and looked at the loosened tooth which he had pawed until it was bleeding. Alan pulled twice, his fingers slipping both times. Rover stood with his ears laid back, like a little donkey, but he waited patiently for Alan to make another trial. This time the bleeding flesh yielded and Alan held up the tooth triumphantly.

"Good dog," he cried. "You see, Elsie, he couldn't get it out alone, and he knew I was trying to help him. Of course he wouldn't bite."

"I don't see how you dared," said Elsie, admiringly. "Is it because your father is a doctor?"

"Why, I never thought. You see, I mean to be a doctor, too, some day. I like to do such things; it is good practice."

Alan was staying for a month at Grandpa Lenox's farm. It was a great treat for the city boy to get into the country where the out-of-doors was so big and green. For eleven months of the year he looked ahead to his annual vacation visit. Meanwhile Elsie Bradford kept him informed of the events at the farm.

Elsie lived in the yellow house across the road. There was not another building in sight; only the chimney of Farmer Florin's house showed above the sand hill. Naturally, Alan and Elsie had become good frieds.

"Oh, dear," cried Elsie one day as she and Alan were strolling along the road with Rover frisking about, "I've got the rose, but just see this horrid thorn in my finger. I think I'll be your patient, Dr. Alan. Please take it out with this pin."

Alan shook his head. "Do you want to get blood poison, Elsie?" he asked in a severe tone that sounded truly professional. "Never use a brass pin. We must go to the house and get a needle. They are made of steel, you know, but I shall dip it in boiling water to make sure it is all right. Father calls it sterilizing the needle. Jolly, but it has gone in good and deep!"

The operation proved succesful. Soon amid many little squeals and wry faces, Alan picked out the offending thorn and laid it in Elsie's hand.

After that Elsie nicknamed him "Doc," to grandma's amusement and Alan's secret elation. When he had cured grandpa of a severe indigestion pain by prescribing a glass of hot water with as much red pepper as he could hold on the point of his jack-knife, grandpa chimed in with Elsie and called him "Doc" also.

Grandma was slightly disdainful. "A nice doctor you'd make, Alan," she laughed. "These simple ailments are all easy enough, but what would you do for your grandfather if he was just burning up with typhoid?"

Alan laughed good naturedly. "Ask me me something easier, grandma. Perhaps a good dose of castor oil wouldn't hurt him if it didn't do any good. You just wait ten years before you have typhoid again, and here's the boy that will cure you. I'll come straight out from Boston in my auto."

"Well, I saw Albert through a long siege of that miserable fever," said grandma, complacently resuming her patch-work. "The doctor said it was good nursing more'n medicine that pulled him through."

Grandma was rather proud of her knowledge of herbs and medicines. She had a medicine chest of carefully labeled remedies that would meet almost any emergency.

Dr. Alan went steadily on with his country practice. He helped grandpa give roup pills to the hens and rubbed sulphur and lard upon the chickens' legs.

When grandma's knife slipped and cut her finger instead of slicing the apple, she was glad to have the young doctor bind it up.

"I could have done it myself if it wasn't my right hand," she explained, giving Alan some linen soaked in creolin.

At last, however, Alan met a case beyond his skill.

Grandpa Lenox had a yellow cat named Bob. He was a splendid fellow with great double paws, a bob tail and weighed nearly twelve pounds. Grandpa said you wouldn't find his equal for catching rats and mice in all Massachusetts.

But he was ugly. He would not be petted. If grandpa put out his hand toward him, he was likely to get a scratch that was long in healing. Also, Bob resembled an animal that farmers usually keep in the sty, especially when there was meat and Rover was around.

"Hello, Doc!" called grandpa one day, "here is a job for you and I reckon you'll find it a tough one."

Alan ran down behind the shed. There sat Bob with his mouth wide open; now and then he growled and his eyes gleamed like yellow fire. Grandpa stood by with a club.

"What's the trouble," asked Alan excitedly.

"Oh, Bob was in a hurry to get a fresh pork bone out of Rover's sight and it stuck between his back teeth on the way down. It's no use to try to handle him. He has been working on it for fifteen or twenty minutes. I'll have to kill him. It's too bad; I've never seen his beat for a mouser."

"Wait a minute, till I get my gloves, Gramp," cried Alan.

He soon returned, and, grabbing Bob by the neck, reached with his gloved finger for the bone. Instantly, Bob was upon the ground and Alan rolled up his shirt sleeves to display three long zig zag blood marks.

"I don't see why you raise cats with seven sharp claws in their front feet; five are enough for any ordinary cat," he exclaimed in disgust. "Cats make miserable patients anyway. I guess you'll have to loose this one."

Just then grandma appeared in the woodshed door. She looked at Bob, then at the club.

"Albert," she said decidedly, "don't you kill that cat."

"But mother," reasoned grandpa, "there isn't anything else to do. You don't want the poor thing to suffer. He can't live this way, and neither Doc nor I can help him."

"Albert," repeated grandma more firmly, "don't you kill that cat. You go and fetch me two or three meal bags. I'll get that bone out."

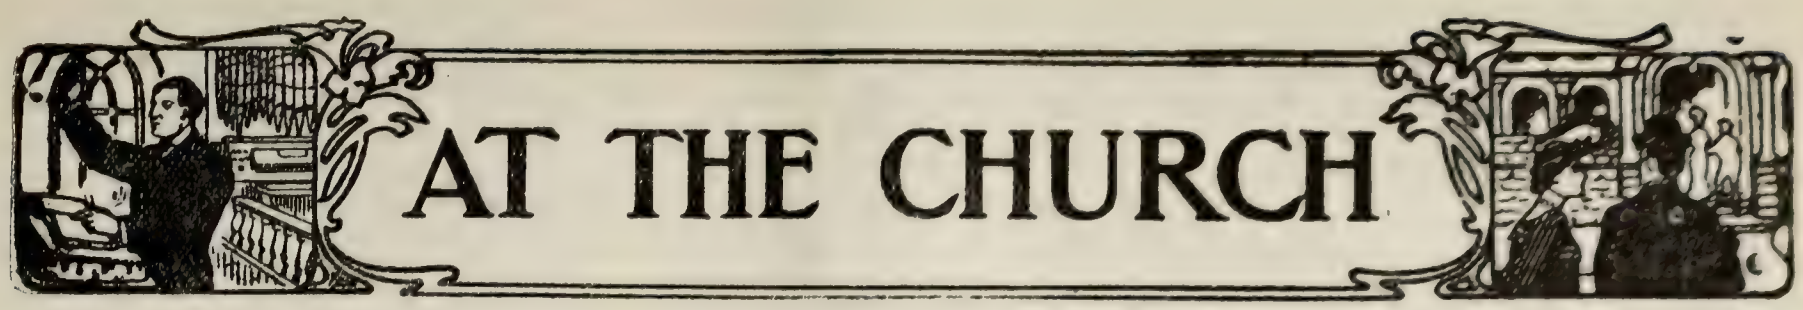
Bob was soon swathed in the meal bags with only his great head in sight. Grandpa held onto the awkward bundle manfully.

"Now, Alan," directed grandma, "you just hand me that pair of pinchers."

"Look out, mother, you've got ahold of Bob's teeth," cautioned grandpa.

"That bone is coming out if I pull every tooth in his head with it," answered grandma, and out it came, a sharp ugly looking bone with a spurt of blood.

Bob, released from his sackcloth draperies, darted off into the orchard without a word of thanks, but Alan gallantly raised his cap to grandma as she stood there somewhat breathless but victorious.



"I know now why my father is such a grand doctor," he said earnestly.

"That's right, my boy," added grandpa, "it took just such a mother to raise him."

"I don't see anything to make a fuss over," said grandma. "When Albert cut his leg awfully with a scythe, I sewed it up without having any doctor. Your uncle, Frank, cut the end of your father's thumb clean off when he was a tiny boy and I picked it off the chopping block while it was still warm, stuck it on, and it's on there yet. But taking o bone out of a cat's mouth—pshaw!" and grandma walked into the kitchen. But she went smilingly.

"I say, Gramp," laughed Alan, "I just wish I'd had my camera to get your pictures. I never expected to meet a rival in my own grandmother. Guess I'll go over and tell Elsie about it."

Your attention is called to the pages of book reviews to appear next week. Our readers will do well to notice these estimates of the latest books in determining their list for winter reading. Each book is reviewed by a man who has especial interest in the field of which the book treats.

Prayer Meeting

The Thankful Heart and the Grateful Life.
Ps. 50:14; 95:2; 2 Cor. 9:8-15.

In an earlier day, before men had learned nature's orderly ways, it was less difficult to be thankful than it is now. That is, the thankful man of the present is greater intellectually and morally than his polytheistic ancestor. The polytheist saw in every benefit that came to him the direct expression of some deity's good will. He knew nothing of what we mean by natural law and natural causes. For him every event was due to the immediate act of a personality. It was easy for him to dread the anger of the gods and to feel grateful for their care over him. Many at the present time have gone no further in the interpretation of experience than the polytheist. Their world is small and disorderly. Others have gone beyond the knowledge of the polytheist but they have not reached the Christian conception of life. They see law but they have not found a God great enough to rule the universe through law. Hence they have no feeling of gratitude. They are incapable of appreciating the difference between the faith of a Christian and that of primitive man. The Christian sings of "One God, one law, one element,

And one far-off divine event
To which the whole creation moves."

His gratitude is the expression of the highest type of moral personality. He rejoices in the triumph of the eternal right, not in the temporary victory of a faction.

Political Freedom

The politically free man is one who is capable of acting in harmony with his fellow citizens for the advantage of all. The removal of external restraint is only the beginning of the emancipation process. The proclamation of Lincoln offered the negro a chance to be a free man. He will have to win his freedom as white men have won their freedom. Misgoverned cities and states are evidence that American citizens are not all free men. But enough has been achieved to excite the gratitude of our hearts to God. The careers of men like Roosevelt, Bryan, and the late Governor Johnson illustrate the possibilities of American political life. These men did not come to prominence in spite of American institutions, but because of them. They represent a large class of really free citizens. There is a vast difference between the government of America and that of ancient despotism. We have a right to feel that what has been accomplished here is a prophecy of what other peoples now rules by tyrannies of one sort and another will accomplish. Then, too, if we have any vision and courage, we can be thankful for the privilege of fighting for a better America.

Religious Freedom

A certain amount of religious freedom has been won for the American citizen. The law leaves him free to follow his conscience in religious matters. And, what is much more significant, many have a conscience that it is an honor to follow. They are found in the house of God on the Lord's day because they delight to worship God in the company of the disciples of Jesus. They have sufficient character to feel free when they are doing right. They relate religion to aesthetic enjoyment, intellectual power, and moral excellence. Their freedom ends where the ugly, the false, and the immoral begin. In the midst of formalism and hypocrisy they always see the moral issue and act in harmony with its demands. We can be glad that we know some of the religiously free men and women. On Thanksgiving we ought to think of them rather than of the fanatics and rascals that are in the church. We cannot understand the place of religion in the home and in the state if we do not know intimately some one whose soul is free. One such person will deliver us from pessimism and fill our hearts with thankfulness. As God has enriched the life of one individual, so will he enrich our lives and the lives of all men. Having this conviction, we can praise the Lord for his goodness and for his mercy to the children of men.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

Luke 14:15-23.

Home Missions: "The Battle of the Slums."

The term "slum" does not admit of clear and precise definition. But it may be described as a congested portion of the city (usually several blocks) the dwellings of which (tenements, each holding from three to forty families) lack hot and cold water proper plumbing and bath rooms, and in the population of which "there is an expectionally high percentage of illiteracy, vice and crime, as well as extreme poverty." Dr. Josiah Strong, in that stirring little book, The Challenge of the City, used in the Forward Mission Study Courses, quotes Geo. Kibbe Turner's description of Chicago's slums. He says, "In one of these there are 35,000 people; in another, 30,000. It is a region of adults. . . . The inhabitants neither labor regularly nor marry. Half the men are beggars, criminals, or floating laborers; a quarter are engaged in the sale of dissipation, and a third of the women are prostitutes. . . . Society here has lapsed back into a condition more primitive than the jungle."

Read some of Ernest Pool's description of the "lung block" in New York, so named because of its many cases of consumption. He says, "It is a block of 1,000 homes. Through halls, in rooms, on stairways, in courts, in shafts, and out on fire-escapes are sprinkled 400 babies. At the age of two they are found alone on the streets imbibing its deep muddy wisdom. So this muddy street overflows into the homes." In such a place disease and dissipation find easy entrance. He says again, "Here a thousand homes struggle on, while hundreds yield and sink and so pollute the others. So come squalid homes and wretched meals. So comes the humorous old chap who told me, 'I ain't never sober but when I gets out of bed.' So come hundreds of others, men and women, young and old, drunk, bestial, vile, forever steadily sinking."

Dr. Strong also quotes a friend's description of a den in a New York slum. He says: "A friend of the writer, a few days ago, went with a city missionary on a midnight tour of exploration which he thus describes. 'A few steps out of Broadway we came to the vilest dens of infamy. In one room, not more than 10 by 12, we came upon eighteen human beings, men and women, black and white, American and foreign-born, who there ate, slept, and lived. In that room we found a woman of the highest refinement and culture with the faded dress of a courtesan upon her dishonored body; a former leader of The Salvation Army, a woman of sweet song, half drunk; a snoring, disgusting negro wench; an opium-eating, licentious Italian, etc. Out of that den had been rescued a descendent of one of the most illustrious men this country ever produced; and there had been found a daughter of a Brooklyn clergyman who had no idea of her whereabouts.'"

They Affect All

"The Battle of the Slums" is an apt and vivid description. It is a battle, a perpetual battle. The elements of these centers of disease, vice, poverty, and crime, contribute each to the other and thus unitedly they wage a constant warfare against all normal life—indeed against all physical existence. They seek to pull down all higher forms of civilization and they threaten us with danger. Hear the assessment of Thos. H. Huxley, the great English scientist, of a similar state of affairs in East London. We quote, "Unless wise and benevolent men take it in hand it will tend to become worse and worse, and to create something worse than savagery—a great Serbonian bog which in the long run will swallow up the surface crust of civilization."

Christianity's Attack.

But now these focal points of degredation and disease, these enemies of all that is good, must face a new foe. Christianity incarnate in the young manhood and young womanhood of the church. For years Home Missions have labored in behalf of the frontier lines of settlements in the forests of the North, and in the mountains and plains of the West and South. They have told us of the land's wonderful resources and how we ought to take care of the thousands which are sure to come in the near future. But the lurid light of the slum has at last crossed the range of our vision. And, instead of preparing for the thousands which will soon be coming, we are distracted by the wail of tens of thousands who are already there, sinking without hope. Must we not care for these? Are they not human? Do they not need salvation? Their coarse jest, their ribald songs, their infected dwellings, their vice, degredation and distress rival the heathenism of the black man of the Congo.

Church Life

State Missions month.

Has your church taken the offering for state work?

The church should not forget the needs at its own door. Every state has missionary territory within its boundaries.

Don't fail to read the initial chapters of our new serial, "The Coign of Vantage," a story of the trusts, appearing in next week's issue of the Christian Century. It is a timely and readable story.

The readers fo the Christian Century will be pleased to know that Mrs. Herbert L. Willett, who has been at Kenton, Ohio, for several weeks, is rapidly recovering from her recent illness, and it is expected that she will be able to return to her home in Chicago within a few days.

Next week we shall present our readers with "The Book Number of the Christian Century." Read the reviews of the best of the late books. The reviewers are experts in the fields to which the various books belong. Their judgment may be depended upon.

An error in entitling the pictures in George B. Evans' article last week should be corrected. The larger cut is not Garfield's birthplace but Geauga Academy, where Garfield studied. The other picture is the earliest Mormon temple, so interestingly described in the article.

The Christian Century recognizes that fine grained men of the ministry are modest about their own work. They do not care to blow their own trumpet. This is well. But these are usually the men who are in the better churches and other influential positions, and they have a duty to the brotherhood and to other men in the ministry, who wish to and should know what the stronger churches are doing. Preachers, your brethren in the ministry want to hear from you through the columns of the church papers.

With this issue we complete our systematic report of the Pittsburg convention. The issues of October 21 and 28 gave a birdseye view of the convention as a whole, November 4 a report of the Brotherhood sessions, November 11 the Veteran's Campfire, and in this issue we are reprinting the comments of the religious press together with Mr. Church's address. Many have expressed their great delight in this "continued story" of the convention.

* * * *

The subject of the sermon by Dr. Ames at the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, last Sunday was "Woman."

J. A. Wharton, after two years' service with the church at Minerva, Ohio, has accepted a call to the church at Ravenna.

A. B. Kellogg, George F. Rand and C. M. Kreidler are among the ministers visiting the meetings at the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y.

The Sunday school at the Second Church, Warren Ohio, is growing rapidly. On a recent Sunday there were 282 scholars present.

E. J. Meacham, Portsmouth, Ohio, held a meeting in Maltimore, Md., during October. The last Sunday in the month the pulpit at Portsmouth was supplied by T. J. White.

The Central Church, Toledo, Ohio, has been in a campaign for the payment of their church debt. Since Easter they have raised and paid $2,500, which about settles the entire amount.

Harold H. Griffis has removed from Middleton, Ind., to Kalispell, Montana.

A. L. Cole, of Hunnewell, Mo., has just taken charge of the work at Mt. Sterling, Ill.

John T. Riddle has closed his work at Quaker City, Ohio, and will enter Yale University.

The church at Illiopolis, Ill., is being completely renewed. Robert I. Sickles is the pastor. He will hold a revival immediately after dedication.

The first church in Springfield, Ill., has disposed of the old site and building and will build soon. F. W. Burnham is the successful minister.

What was known as the Twenty-fourth Street Church, San Francisco, California, has moved to a new location, and is henceforth to be called the Centennial Church of Christ.

The annual meeting of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society was held at the First Methodist Church Monday evening, November 8. A report of the meeting will appear in another place.

At the Central Church, Warren, Ohio, J. A. Lynn is entering upon a series of Sunday morning sermons upon the Gospel of Mark. Such effort is needed in many of the churches to give to the work of the minister more of an educational value.

Dr. T. B. Macartney, Dean of the College of Liberal Arts of Transylvania University, will read a paper on "High School Education" at a meeting of the Ashland District Teachers' Association, at Eminence, Ky., November 26.

On the evening of November 8, J. G. Slayter, who has been holding a meeting with the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, gave his lecture, "The Making of a Nation." The proceeds of the evening were given to the church to assist in meeting the expense of the meeting.

O. E. Palmer has resigned the pastorate of the church at Napa, California, and will close his work about the first of the year. His work has been of a substantial character, and is commended by those who are familiar with that part of the country.

The meeting at Modesto, California, which was to have been held in November, with the assistance of H. O. Breeden, of Denver, has been postponed because Dr. Breeden does not find it possoble to go to the Golden State at this time.

C. R. L. Vawter is just beginning what promises to be a splendid meeting at Patoka, Ill. Patoka is near Assumption, where Mr. Vawter just closed his work with a total of 160 added. From Patoka he goes to Bruceville, Ind., for his fourth meeting with W. L. Dalton of that place.

The Christian Century is in receipt of a letter and copy of resolutions from the church at Linton, Ind., warning the churches against Edward Oliver Tilburn, formerly pastor of the church at Butte, Montana, who recently held a meeting at Linton Ind., and took his leave with about three hundred dollars of other people's money, and one of the daughters of a family of the church.

Z. T. Sweeney will dedicate the new West Park Christian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., November 21. The church is built of red sand mole brick. The roof and the balcony are supported upon four large trusses. The auditorium and the Sunday-school rooms will seat about a thousand people. The pastor, Franklin P. Smith, is glad to report the work in fine condition.

An installation service was held at the First Christian Church, Springfield, last week, when the new officers of the men's club were inducted into office. They are: President, C. E. Brown; Vice President, R. E. McClelland; Secretary, W. B. Weeks; Treasurer, W. E. Walker; Chaplain, E. C. Earl.

Frederick W. Burnham has printed an outline of the Book of First Corinthians which he is, we suppose, using in his teacher training class.

The following persons, graduates of Transylvania University, have recently addressed the students of their alma mater: Mr. W. E. Crabtree (A. B. '93), pastor of the Christian Church at Covina, California, addressed the students of both colleges in Milligan Chapel. Mr. W. G. Conley (A. B. '85), pastor of the Christian Church at San Diego, California, formerly instructor in Latin in the University.

There are 257 auxiliaries of the C. W. B. M. in the state of Illinois, and the membership at the close of the year was 7,000. Illinois led all the states in organizing new societies during the centennial campaign. The aim for the present year is to bring the number of societies up to 300; the membership to 8,500; and to raise $6,250.00.

Dean K. Ishikawa, of the Drake College, Tokio, Japan, visited the Transylvania University recently and spoke to the students and professors at chapel on "The Present Status of Christianity in Japan." Dean Ishikawa is a Japanese of unusual native ability, was educated in this country, and is prosecuting an educational enterprise under the Foreign Christian Missionary Society that is yielding large results.

One of the most attractive meetings the Men's Club, Central Church, Warren, Ohio, has ever planned was held Wednesday evening, November 17. A Chicken Pie Dinner, was served at 6:30. Four fine speeches by lawyers as follows: "On the Trail of the Practical Grafter," Prosecutor Ralph Beard of Youngstown; "The Awakening of a State," Leo Denny of Sharon; "The Citizen and the Party," George Fillius; "The Necessity for Parties in a Republic," W. P. C. Thomas.

The Texas Christian Lectureship, which is each year a feast of good things, will be held in Dallas, December 6 to 9, and the program is one of unusual merit. The chief speaker is C. S. Medbury. In the list of home talent may be found such men as Dr. Clinton Lockhart, Cephas Shelburne, W. T. Hilton, E. E. Faris, Addison Clarke, E. M. Waites, F. W. O'Malley, G. A. Lewillen, J. J. Collins, E. L. Crystal, and others. Mr. Medbury's themes are: "The Christianity of Christ," "The Challenge of the Ministry," "The Burden of Unbelief," "Secular Tribute to the Divine," "Master Motives for Christian Service."

Transylvania University and the College of the Bible have formulated plans by which these institutions hope to add a quarter of a million dollars to their permanent endowments. It is their purpose to secure funds over and above this amount with which to build a central heating and lighting plant, an additional dormitory for men, and a suitable home for girls. W. T. Donaldson, who has served the College of the Bible as financial secretary quite successfully for a number of years, and J. W. Hardy, of Nashville, have been employed by the governing boards to secure these funds. Mr. Hardy has had a long and successful experience in college finance, and will, no doubt, prove even more successful in his efforts for these institutions.

D. G. Dungan began his work as pastor of the church at Vinton, Ia., the first Sunday in November.

The church at Chariton, Ia., under the ministry of C. E. Wells, has been able to pay off its entire indebtedness. They are now in a meeting assisted by W. S. Johnson.

J. G. Slayter has been in a meeting with the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., where B. S. Ferrall is the pastor. We hope to have a full report of the work next week.

The Fifth District evangelist, C. W. Ross, held a very successful meeting at Pearl, Ill., Forty-one additions in nineteen days' meeting; over $600 pledged for pastor's salary.

The Central Church, Havana, Ill., is putting over $2,000 worth of improvements on the building. The improvements include a new basement, 40x40, new pews, new paint without and new decorations within.

Clark Braden, Batavia, Ia., the veteran debater and lecturer, has lectures on such subjects as "Scepticism," "Divine Healing," "Modern Spiritism," "Anti-Ism," etc., which he is prepared to deliver for churches or clubs, where they are needed.

Aubrey Wilson closed his work with the Sunset Church, San Francisco, November 8, and will seek another field in California. This church is under the care of the state board, and is in a difficult field, but it is believed a strong church can be built there in time.

The Martin family are now in a meeting at Alva, Okla. Their meeting previous to this was at McAlester, where there were forty- three additions to the church.

A. J. Saunders, who for the last two years has been with the church at South Chicago, has resigned, to take effect on December 19. He will return immediately afterward for work to his home in far-away Australia.

The "S. S. Oregon," the new steamer for the Congo River, Africa, which was dedicated during the Centennial convention will be completed and shipped about December 1. Let it be borne in mind that about $1,500 is yet needed to pay the transportation on this boat to Bolenge.

Robert Lord Cave, of San Francisco, supplied the pulpit of the First Church, Berkeley, California, the last Sunday in October. The pastor, I. N. McCash, had not yet returned from the Centennial convention. He is expected home about the 15th of November.

Prof. Ernest DeWitt Burton, of the University of Chicago, gave an address at the Hyde Park Baptist Church the first Sunday in November on "Why I am Content to be a Christian." This address is one which Professor Burton delivered to audiences in India, China, Japan and Corea during his recent visit to the Orient.

E. M. Todd announces an inviting series of sermons for Sunday evenings in the Central Church, Fort Wayne, Ind. They are: "The Christian Faith—a Positive Statement of the Things Necesary to Be Believed;" "Are We Less Religious Than Our Fathers?" and "Doubt as a Creed." These are themes that should interest the thoughtful men of the city.

W. C. Bower, after a pastorate of eight years with the Christian Tabernacle, North Tonawanda, N. Y., has resigned and will enter Columbia University about the first of February. He expects to complete his work in the University by the first of June, but may remain longer. The relations between Mr. Bower and his people at North Tonawanda have been most pleasant and it is with reluctance that he leaves the work.

The formal dedication of the new home of the Lenox Avenue Church, New York, was held at 3 o'clock last Sunday afternoon. The pastors of the various churches of the Disciples of the city made brief addresses. There was no need of a call for money as the church property is clear of debt. W. B. Craig has just begun his pastorate with the church, and from the anouncements in the church paper we judge that he has lost none of his push and energy in going from the west to the east.

S. T. Willis celebrated his twentieth year as pastor of the Church of Disciples at 169th street, New York City, on October 3. Mr. Willis and his church have passed through a long and strenuous contest with most difficult conditions, but each year, through patience and labor, they have seen their work bearing more and more fruit. The church now occupies a position of vantage in its community and discharges its responsibilities with consecration and intelligence. We congratulate both pastor and congregation and wish them "many happy returns of the day."

A backward step, much to be regretted, is that taken by the united church of Baptists and Disciples in Kenora, Ontario, which has voted unanimously to divide again into its original denominations. This union was effected nearly three years ago under the leadership of J. A. Lord, editor of the Christian Standard, and was much discussed as a harbinger of many similar mergers. The Disciples claim that the conditions of union were never fulfilled, and that the church was in name, doctrine, practice and pastors, a Baptist church. It is a true observation that has been made that the real trouble was a lack of broad and strong leadership. Certainly no leader with either Disciple or Baptist sectarianism in his spirit is capable of carrying an enterprise like that to its consummation. Christian union is primarily a matter of the heart and temper, not of creedal agreement. Over against this bad news we find joy in announcing that the Baptists and Disciples of Ladysmith, Wis., have decided to unite and are looking for a minister who is big and consecrated enough to lead them.

In honor of A. J. Saunders, pastor of the church at South Chicago, who soon returns to Australia, his native country, a dinner was given last week by Professor Willett to which a company of the teachers and pastors of Chicago were invited. A very interesting feature of the evening was Mr. Saunders' description of the situation with the church of Australia, and the things which led him to America for this period of study and his purposes in returning to his homeland. The Christian Century extends to Mr. Saunders its heartiest congratulation upon the work he has done here, and believes that he will prove of great value to the cause of the Disciples as he comes to take his place in the Australian church.

After the close of the Centennial Convention at Pittsburg Marion Stevenson, National Superintendent of Bible Schools, started on a long trip through the southern states in the interest of the Bible schools. He will attend all the southern conventions, and hold institutes and rallies and round tables at many places. Many of these states have as yet no state superintendents to care for the interests and advancement of the great Bible school cause and Brother Stevenson is hoping to be able to help them awaken enough interest to cause the calling of state superintendents as many of the other states already have. After the convention he went direct to Owensboro, Ky., on his way south, then to Memphis, Tenn., Shreveport, La., Jackson, Miss. He is now on his way to Selma, Ala., Winder, Ga., Jacksonville, Fla., and many other places.

Dr. Royal J. Dye reached Bolenge, Africa, August 20. Dr. W. C. Widdowson of Bolenge reached America during the Centennial convention. He is far from being as strong as when he went out.

The first Sunday in December is C. W. B. M. Day among the churches. Preparation for this day should be made carefully. No organization among us is doing more commendable work than is the women's organization. It is well for it to thus be brought to the attention of the entire church. All the women in the church should belong to this missionary organization, and it would be to their advantage educationally if they were present at each of the meetings during the year.

O. C. Bolman, writing of his four weks' meeting at Niantic, Ill., where L. D. Crandall is pastor, says: "Brother Crandall is a splendid organizer and personal worker, and his people responded nobly to his plans. He has been pastor of this church a little more than six months and all departments are flourishing." During the meeting the Bible school grew until it was necessary to remove some of the classes to private homes. Mrs. Crandall, who is a very able woman, has organized a class of young married ladies. This class will meet at the parsonage. The C. W. B. M. and Young Ladies' Circle each received many new members. Eighty were baptized and others await this ordinance. Thirty-two married men and twenty-two married women were converted or reclaimed. Two men, one seventy-six years of age, and another past seventy, were baptized. The total additions were 121. The night following the close of this meeting I preached at Berea in Christian county. Seven made the good confession."

"The Coign of Vantage"

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY

Jane Richardson

will be presented to the readers of the Christian Century next week.

Now is the time to get your friends to subscribe for the Century

A. W. Wichert has been chosen pastor of the church at Indianola, Ill.

Dr. James Butchart and family returned to Lu Cheo Fu, China. They sailed on the "S. S. China" from San Francisco, November 16.

R. S. Robertson has been called to remain another year with the church at Milan, Mo. The church is harmonious and prosperous, and voted their pastor an increase of salary.

Word has just been received of the exact time of the death of Dr. Z. S. Loftis at Batang, border of Tibet. It was August 12. He was greatly loved by the missionaries.

W. R. Hunt reports five baptisms at Wuhu, China, and two at Shanghai. Mr. Hunt is one of the most tireless and successful evangelists in the "Middle Kingdom."

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of October amounted to $7,060, a gain over the corresponding month last year of $3,263. Good start on the new year—the first year of our second century.

A brother in Illinois agrees to give $5,000 toward a mission building in Matanzas, Cuba, upon the condition that $5,000 more is raised for that purpose. This is a move in the right direction.

Dr. C. L. Pickett reports thirty-four baptisms at Laoag, P. I.; Leslie Wolfe reports forty-seven baptisms at Manila; Bruce L. Kershner reports eighteen at Manila, and John Lord seventeen, or a total of 116.

Last week the Foreign Society received $1,000 from a friend in Indiana on the annuity plan. This good man gave the same amount last year. He hopes to make other gifts.

Among the offerings of the Centennial committee is an interesting looking song by Gilbert L. Harney and H. J. Stover entitled "The Light of Ages." This may be purchased for 15 cents by addressing the committee, 203 Burrell Block, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Dr. W. E. Macklin reports that Harvard College is planning to establish a union medical college in Nankin, China. This would be a great thing for the empire and would relieve the missionary societies of certain financial obligations.

Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Duxton of Des Moines gave a reception to Dr. and Mrs. I. N. McCash on their recent visit in Des Moines. The reception was held in a large hotel downtown, where a large company of friends of Mr. and Mrs. McCash assembled.

President Hill M. Bell, who has for years taken front rank among the educators of Iowa, has just been elected president of the State Teachers' Association. This is a distinction well deserved by both Drake University and her president.

It was incorrectly announced in these columns recntly that B. H. Glover had received a call to the church at Roswell, New Mexico. The announcements should have read that he had accepted a call to the church at Fullerton, California. In this pastorate he will have the support of such men as C. C. Chapman and F. M. Dowling.

Pastor J. R. Perkins, of the West Side Church, San Francisco, is preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on the Life of Christ. The services are further enriched by varied musical programs, and in this way Mr. Perkins is receiving a large hearing. The series is under the auspices of the men's club, which is carefully and systematically advertising them.

The church at Niles, Ohio, is now issuing a weekly paper called, "The Christian Assistant." This church, under the leadership of Allen T. Gordon, is making fine progress these days; audiences are increasing; back pledges to the church are being paid; the Sunday-school is increasing its attendance, and good spirit prevails throughout the church.

In a letter to one of the editors, W. R. Warren says: "The trip to Palestine seems too good to be true, yet I am beginning to do a little reading for it." The editors of The Christian Century hope that this trip may prove a great time of rest and inspiration for this man who has so earnestly devoted himself to the interests of the brotherhood for the last five years.

Mrs. Laura Deihl, wife of Rev. Joseph E. Deihl, died October 24 at the home of her daughter, Mrs. H. L. Moore, Springfield, Ill. Mrs. Deihl had two sons, known by many in Illinois: Prof. J. D. Deihl, Madison, Wis., and Orma H. Deihl of Springfield, Ill., who was a year or two ago in Y. M. C. A. work at Peoria. The funeral service was held in the church at Eureka.

AS WE GO TO PRESS.

Canton, Ill., Nov. 14, 1909—One hundred and one added past week; 275 in twenty days of meeting; Bible School almost doubled; $1400 raised for meeting, and back indetedness. A most wonderful meeting in every way. Two nights more. Begin next Sunday at Gibson City, Ill.—William J. Lockhart and Lintt.

Mason City, Ill., Nov. 14—Began one week ago today with Thompson the Egyptian. Weather against us from first. Interest is great today, first day of invitation. We wish thousand each night, in place of hundreds could hear the man preach. He is a power.—F. M. Warren, Minister.

Nevada, Mo., Nov. 14—One week of daily rain. One hundred and eleven additions in three weeks; continue.—Hamilton and Haley.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

We Must Give Battle

With these awful conditions we must battle not merely for the sake of the victims themselves, but for our own sakes as well. They are within a stone's throw of our very door. Yes, they are groveling at the foundation of our own homes. They must be driven away. It is a call, a challenge to Christian manhood and womanhood. These places are maintained by the consummation of thousands of human lives and the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars every year. They can be removed only by the consecration of a like number of Christian lives and a similar amount of money which will be used not to enact law to reform the victim, though that is laudable, but to bring both the victims and the man who is responsible for their being there into vital and personal relation to God to whom they will feel accountable. Righteous purpose must well up from within instead of being superimposed before it will bear real fruit. This, religion and religion alone, can do. The growth of all reform depends upon the subsoil of religion, without which it cannot long flourish. Neither can any true disciple of Jesus remain indifferent long to the conditions of human life about him. He soon sees that he must come to God, the Father, by way of man who is his brother.

Dr. and Mrs. Arthur Paul Wakefield of Springfield, Ill. have been reappointed missionaries to China by the Foreign Board. It will be remembered that this estimable couple were compelled to yield up their work in China some two years ago on account of Mrs. Wakefield's ill health. She has been in excellent health for many months now and is advised that it is safe for her to return to the Orient. Dr. Wakefield is well prepared for his work there by a Hiram College and a Rush Medical Course. He has been engaged of late in giving illustrated lectures on missions under the auspices of the Foreign Society.

A Thirteen Years' Pastorate

Sunday, October 24, I. J. Cahill offered his resignation to the Central Church in Dayton, Ohio. For thirteen years and one month he has ministered to this people. In these years a debt of $9,000 on the church property has been paid. A new organization has been effected in the west part of the city and some $3,000 offered to this enterprise by the Central church. In the Wilson meeting some 500 were added to the church. A. P. Cobb, W. J. Lhamon and S. H. Bartlett have also assisted in meetings with success. But there has been a good, steady growth at the regular meetings of the congregation all through the years. Bro. Cahill has been called a prince among pastors and his faithful work in Dayton confirms the statement. He has been a very potent force in the city, and especially in the Ministerial Association, of which he is now secretary. It will be a fortunate church that calls this scholarly man to its ministry. For the immediate present he will hold a few meetings, beginning at Kirksville, Mo., November 14. The class of evangelism that he will do is very much needed and he ought to be kept busy for many months at this sort of work.

Missionary Societies Beneficiaries

The famous Bondurant will case, which has been in the courts three times extending over many years, was finally settled by compromise out of court two weeks ago at Monticello, Ill. By the terms of settlement, a fund of from $200,000 to $250,000 will be divided equally among the Foreign, American and Illinois Missionary Societies and the Church Extension Board. The case was settled entirely to the satisfaction of all concerned. Over $50,000 had previously been spent in litigation. Though not comparable in size to the magnificent legacies bequeathed the Presbyterian Societies two weeks ago by Banker Kennedy of New York City, these gifts are of consequence as being the largest ever made to any of our Disciple missionary societies.

Centennial Aftermath

The surplus stock of the Centennial Hand Books (Memorial Programs) is going out rapidly. The sacrifice price of 50 cents each for the books, and 10c each, or $1 a dozen, for the badges, is recognized as a superb bargain. There is a brisk demand also for the Centennial flags at the cut price of 10 cents each. All these things will prove priceless heirlooms in the homes of our people. The Centennial can never be repeated, and these mementos of it can neper be reproduced. It is now or never!

Belated Centennial roll books are coming in every day. These are in time to be bound up with the rest for permanent preservation in the Library of Congress in Washington. There are hundreds of others that have not yet been turned in which we must have before the first of the year.

The official stenographic report of the great convention is going to be a larger and handsomer volume than was promised. The advance subscription price will remain $1.25 until November 20; after that the regular price of $1.50 will be in force. To give this epoch-making book the circulation it ought to have, we should like to have an agent in every congregation. Write at once for terms.

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

Southern California and Arizona

Grant K. Lewis.

Evangelist Willis S. Myers is meeting with remarkable sucess in his work as an evangelist under the California board, serving small churches and new fields. He has not hesitated to tackle the hardest of fields, where our forces are small and many obstacles are to be overcome, yet he has made good in every instance. He has held five meetings them to self-support. These five meetings have resulted in 145 additions to the churches and the enlistment of fifty-two men and women tithers. He has raised money in cash and pledges for the local work where these meetings have been held amounting to more than $6,000, aside from the expense of the meeting, including his salary. Our board does not hesitate to commend this faithful evangelist to the churches. His last meeting, at Highland Park, greatly edified the church, added sixteen souls to its membership and cancelled the debt of $960.00. His November meeting is now in progress at Bakersfield, where Alonzo G. Mills is pastor. For dates and terms, parties interested may write to the secretary.

Sumner T. Martin has resigned at Santa Barbara, and is now at El Centro, California, holding a meeting. He writes the most cheerful expectations as to the progress of our cause in Imperial Valley. He is having a good hearing in the opera house, and already some splendid results have been obtained.

R. P. Shepherd is making himself exceedingly useful in his Sunday school work also. He is the especial superintendent of teacher's training for the Interdenominational State Society, and his services as speaker and Bible lecturer are much in demand.

403-4 Wright & Callender Building, Los Angeles, California.

E. W. Thornton, pastor of the Naomi Avenue Church, continues to be in demand as a Sunday school speaker. The Disciples in southern California can point with pride to the fact that he has a large Union Teachers' Training Class, which meets at 11 o'clock every Wednesday in one of the numerous rooms of the great Temple Auditorium, the average atendance at which is about seventy.

John T. Stivers, another one of our intrepid evangelists, is at work for a season in the Arizona field. He is in a splendid meeting at this writing at Tempe, Arizona, where W. H. Salyer is pastor. Success, as usual, is crowning his efforts. He will hold his second Arizona meeting at Tucson, where George T. Purvis is pastor. The expectation is that he will spend another winter in this important field, adding strength to our cause. Meetings will follow at Douglas, Phoenix, and Prescott.

The great preachers' meeting in southern California continues this year with unabated interest and attendance. A series of specially prepared addresses upon the general theme—"The World's Debt to the Churches," is the program for the year. These meetings are held the first Monday in each month at the First Church of Los Angeles. Last month the address was given by M. J. Ferguson on "The World's Debt to the Jews." In December, the theme will be "The World's Debt to the Roman Catholics," by R. P. Shepherd.

The big man from the northwest, S. M. Martin, with his big brain, body, voice and soul, is again in southern California for an evangelistic campaign. This time an effectual opening for his work is found in the great First Church of Los Angeles, A. C. Smither, pastor, where he begins a meeting next Sunday. This is to be followed with a meeting with that other great church in Los Angeles, the Magnolia Avenue, Jesse P. McKnight, pastor. Let all eyes continue to be fixed on southern California as the work of the year proceeds.

Campaign for Bible College of Missouri

"We can take $1 and do more with it than other schools can with $4." So reads an official statement of the Missouri Bible College at Columbia. It is just beginning to dawn upon us what a tremendous advantage the Bible College has in being asociated with the State University, thus appropriating its entire equipment to the training of our young ministers.

A gentleman said to me at Pittsburg, "My money and influence will go into the Bible chairs associated with the great universities. They are the key to the whole problem of ministerial education. We have money enough to equip the Bible Colleges, but not enough for all branches of education."

Of the immediate and pressing necessity for more and better educated ministers all are agreed. The Bible College at Columbia offers the best oportunity I know of in our bro[illegible] for this purpose. Here is the great university, and there is no better in the land, in which the languages, sciences, and mathematics can be had from instructors who are masters in their several departments; and here is the Bible College in which the special training for the ministry can be had at the same time. Men who go out from this institution will have an advantage over those who simply take a regular university course, and also an advantage over those who take only a course in Bible study without the larger and better equipment which the university furnishes.

Our Bible College has an endowment of $55,000, but it is in great need of further endowment to increase its usefulness. R. A. Long, of Kansas City, the president of the Board of Trustees, has made a most generous and fascinating proposition. He proposes to give $50,000 if the churches of the state will raise a like amount. This must be done during the current month of November. The time is short. It will take a whirlwind campaign but the goal is such a worthy and desirable one we believe the state will be aroused and rise to the opportunity.

May I urge my fellow ministers to get into this campaign with heart and soul? Here is a chance to do something that will tell on coming generations. If we let this institution

CAREFUL DOCTOR

Prescribed Change of Food Instead of Drugs.

It takes considerable courage for a doctor to deliberately prescribe only food for a despairing patient, instead of resorting to the usual list of medicines.

There are some truly scientific physicians among the present generation who recognize and treat conditions as they are and should be treated regardless of the value to their pockets. Here's an instance:

"Four years ago I was taken with severe gastritis and nothing would stay on my stomach, so that I was on the verge of starvation.

"I heard of a doctor who had a summer cottage near me—a specialist from N. Y., and as a last hope, sent for him.

"After he examined me carefully he advised me to try a small quantity of Grape-Nuts at first then as my stomach became stronger to eat more.

"I kept at it and gradually got so I could eat and digest three teaspoonfuls. Then I began to have color in my face, memory became clear, where before everything seemed a blank. My limbs got stronger and I could walk. So I steadily recovered.

"Now after a year on Grape-Nuts I weigh 153 lbs. My people were surprised at the way I grew fleshy and strong on this food."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

"There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

languish we are blind to our own interests and the highest welfare of our church. Let us labor and pray for our victory; and God grant we may rejoice together when the campaign is ended.

James M. Philputt, St. Louis, Mo.
Union Ave. Christian Church.

The above article tells its own story. Last week I endeavored to show in a general way why the proposed increase in endowment should be made. Let me call your attention to a few facts now relative to what the Bible College has actually done. When its building was completed it had enrolled fifty-one students, fifteen of whom were preparing for strictly religious work. The next year the enrollment was eight-two, twenty-one being ministerial and missionary students. The next year ninety-six were enrolled, twenty-six for specially religious work. The next year witnessed an enrollment of 167, of whom thirty-one were preparing for definite religious work. Last year the enrollment reached 194.

Let is be remembered that the college is well represented in the missionary field. It has sent two missionaries to India, four to Japan, one to Mexico, and one to the feud district of Kentucky. Every young man who prepares himself in the Bible College of Missouri for the ministry carries with him into the pastorate a burning missionary zeal.

The fact that the college has, with such inadequate equipment, been able to accomplish such splendid results argues much for the increase of its endowment in order that its usefulness may be greatly multiplied. Oh, brethren, do not let this opportunity pass by unimproved!

G. D. Edwards.

Eureka College

A few days ago a friend asked me how our Endowment Campaign was moving along. In asking this question he offered a very significant suggestion. He said, "I want the facts and not your optimism." Blessed optimism! How few crimes have been committed in thy name! And yet there is something in the suggestion. It may be that this man had heard the accusation that was made against me recently in the language of one of our distinguished humorists. "He gets his wit from his memory and his facts from his imagination." I will give you the facts. Eureka College has a substantial increase of at least twenty-five students over last year. We have $30,000 pledged on our endowment proposition. This is in the following form: one pledge of $6,000, two of $2,000 each, ten of $1,000 each, one of $600, six of $500 each, three of $125 each, ten of $100 each, about $2,000 in pledges less than $100, and something like $4,000 for a special purpose. In addition to this we have many promises of larger things and a universe of hope, which we would be willing to close out at a reasonable percentage of reality. H. H. Peters.

A Great, Tired Man

I wish to write a few much-deserved and well-chosen words of W. R. Warren to whom I refer in the above caption.

I write to those who enjoyed the triumphs and indescribable glories of our great Centennial Convention.

Gratitude should make these read and heed me.

I do not want to write to the end I have in view here but once. Not that I would not be willing to write oftener; only I feel that I should not have to speak to this end but once.

If that great Centennial Convention were a success, and it was, no one contradicting, it is due to the untiring, wise and sacrificial toil of W. R. Warren more than to all the others of us combined. I write whereof I do assuredly know.

Nothing deterred or discouraged him. Even when his favorite sister was being buried and his loved ones were calling upon him to come and be with them while they buried her, he sat by his desk in sorrow and toiled tearfully on. He had in his heart the good of God's Cause, and the comfort and pleasure of those who were to be at the convention.

He ate little, and slept less. He is a weary, worn, tired, tried, faithful man. He needs a long, sweet rest. I propose that we give it to him by placing in his hands the money to take that cruise of the Mediterranean with the Moninger Tour.

I have Three Hundred Dollars of the Seven Hundred and Fifty Dollars that it will require.

This amount was given in one session of The Evangelistic Day at the convention.

I am writing to those who want a part in this beautiful tribute of love, gratitude and esteem to him.

Send your gifts to me at 2210 Perrysville avenue, North Side, Pittsburg, Pa. I will receipt for them each week in our paper.

If other words were needful to induce you to have a part, I would be glad to speak them. Surely no other words are necessary. Send the offering now, friend, if you enjoyed that great convention, and have a part in this tribute of love to him upon whom most of the toil of the preparation descended.

Wallace Tharp.

New Building and Endowment for Christian College

Gifts of $25,000 for the erection of an Academic Hall for Christian College at Columbia, Mo., and of an additional $25,000 for endowment purposes have just been announced by Mrs. Luella W. St. Clair, president of the institution. The donation for the Academic Hall is the gift of R. H. Stockton, of St. Louis, and the endowment money is from Andrew Carnegie, millionaire philanthropist. They constitute one of the largest gifts ever made to Christian College.

Four years ago Mr. Carnegie made the provisional promise of a gift of $25,000, on condition that an equal amount was raised. This promise was renewed during the past summer and as Mrs. St. Clair was on her way to the Centennial Convention she received the promise of the additional $25,000 from Mr. Stockton. Mr. Stockton is a trustee of Christian College and one of the best known "captains of industry" of St. Louis, being president of the Majestic Range Company.

The new building will contain lecture rooms, laboratories and a combined chapel and study hall. It will be named The J. S. Dorsey Memorial Hall in commemoration of Mr. Dorsey's long and active service as a member of the Board of Trustees. At the time of his death he had served for thirty years, much of that time as treasurer of the Board.

The first announcement of these gifts was made by Mrs. St. Clair at one of the largest night meetings, when three thousand friends of Christian education cheered the good news to the echo.

Plans are now being discussed by the Trustees of the College, looking toward the early erection of this new building.

To the Missouri Preachers

T. A. Abbott, Corresponding Secretary.

Just on the eve of the offering for State Missions, with a heart full of anxiety for its success, I am sending this last word to my brethren in the Missouri ministry. You are the key to the situation. No matter how talented, energetic or consecrated the Corresponding Secretary may be, the ministers of the congregation have it in their power to make the offering a success or a failure. They can help or hinder, they can be clogs or wings. It all depends upon the minister at last. Unless his heart is in this thing success is absolutely impossible. He must be a live wire, a dynamo, yes, a whole power house, in himself.

The position that our state holds in missionary giving is not a credit to us at all. It is our determination to redeem our state from this condition and bring her where she ought to be, at the head of the procession in all things. This can be done if the minister will join hands with us in this holy crusade. I am willing to bear my full share of the responsibility, but a great big part of it must also rest with the minister.

This is the first offering in the new century. It ought to mark a distinct advance over anything ever taken before in Missouri for State Missions. This can be done and will be done if all the ministers will join hands with us in a mighty effort.

Let us go at it in a business-like way. I do not prescribe the way, for each minister must be a law unto himself in the matter of methods. But it is not business-like to get up suddenly on Sunday morning, without any previous preparation, announce "This is State Mission Day and at the close of the sermon the offering for that interest will be taken." Such an unbusiness-like plan is a foregone failure. Make full preparation, get everybody ready, let all be informed, adopt some plan by which you know who has given—this the envelope system will do—and then keep after the other fellow. Never let up till the last member has been solicited and you know it and he knows it. Every member of the church ought to be made to feel that it is a duty to give to State Missions, and that this duty cannot be shirked without actual sin against the cause of the Master in Missouri and against the Lord. Somehow it ought to be a personal matter between them and God.

But whatever method is adopted the main thing is to see that the offering is taken and that it is one worthy of the church that gives it, and the cause for which it is given. I crave this at the hands of my brother ministers in the state and I am full of confidence that I shall not be disappointed.

This Society was organized in Louisville, Ky., in 1875. Its average annual receipts and expenditures for thirty-four years have been $108,804. The one object of this Society is to make Jesus, the Christ, known to all men everywhere.

Fields.—Work is being done in Japan, China, Africa, India, Philippine Islands, Hawaii, Cuba, England, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Turkey.

Receipts.—Amounted last year to $350,685, a gain of $76,360, or more than 27 per cent.

A FOOD DRINK
Which Brings Daily Enjoyment.

A lady doctor writes:

"Though busy hourly with my own affairs, I will not deny myself the pleasure of taking a few minutes to tell of my enjoyment daily obtained from my morning cup of Postum. It is a food beverage, not a stimulant, like coffee.

"I began to use Postum 8 years ago not because I wanted to, but because coffee, which I dearly loved, made my nights long, weary periods to be dreaded and unfitting me for business during the day.

"On advice of a friend, I first tried Postum, making it carefully as suggested on the package. As I had always used "cream and no sugar," I mixed my Postum so. It looked good, was clear and fragrant, and it was a pleasure to see the cream color it as my Kentucky friend always wanted her coffee to look like a new saddle.

"Then I tasted it critically, for I had tried many 'substitutes' for coffee. I was pleased, yes, satisfied with my Postum in taste and effect and am yet, being a constant user of it all these years.

"I continually assure my friends and acquaintances that they will like Postum in place of coffee and receive benefit from its use. I have gained weight, can sleep and am not nervous."

$20,369, or almost $27,000 per month, or $900 per day.

The Churches.—As churches gave $146,081, a gain of $17,733, or over 14 per cent. The average offering per church was $43, or an average increase of $5.90. The number of churches reaching their apportionment is 962. They have increased their gifts $56,500 in the past five years, or an average annual increase of $11,500. The increase in ten years has been $89,300, or an average of $8,900. The number of contributing churches was 3,396, a loss of 61.

Living-links.—A Living-link church is one that supports a missionary on the foreign field or gives $600 per year, including the gifts of the Sunday-school and Endeavor Society. There are altogether 120 Living-links. During the past year 31 new ones were enrolled, the largest number in our history in any one year.

Sunday-schools.—Gave $77,199 on Children's Day, the first Sunday in June, a gain of $2,019. The schools averaged $20.45, and 1,086 reached their apportionment. The whole number of contributing schools was 3,775, a gain of 33. The schools have about doubled their gifts in ten years. They are asked for $100,000 this first year of our second century as a people.

Endeavor Societies.—Gave $15,040, a gain of $1,868. The number contributing is 1,068, a gain of 35. The average offering was $14.15, an increase of $1.40. The number that reached their apportionment is 381.

Societies are asked for $20,000 this first year of our new century.

Individual Offerings.—Reached $48,248, an increase of $29,444, or 156 per cent. The average personal offering was $27, an increase of $16 each. The number of personal offerings reached 1,764, a gain of 367. We hope for $60,000 in personal gifts. Please send your personal offering now.

Number of Offerings.—The total number of offerings including churches, Sunday-schools, Endeavor Societies and personal gifts was 10,003, a gain of 105. We hope to reach 11,000 offerings this year. Help us to this end.

Leading Churches.—The ten leading churches, including Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor gifts last year in their offerings for Foreign Missions are:

Independence Boulevard, Kansas City, Mo.	$2,394
University Place, Des Moines, Ia.	1,355
High Street, Akron, O.	1,288
Englewood, Chicago, Ill.	1,021
Eureka, Ill.	1,013
Hopkinsville, Ky.	1,010
Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, O.	861
Franklin Circle, Cleveland, O.	816
First Church, St. Joseph, Mo.	778
Frankfort, Ky.	725

Annuities.—The Annuity gifts amounted to $34,789, a gain of $27,089, or 350 per cent. These are the largest annuity gifts and greatest percentage of gains in the history of the Annuity Plan. Those who are fifty years of age and who would make wise use of funds would do well to inquire about this plan. The total receipts to this fund are $326,688.

Gains.—The gain in receipts during the past year is $76,360, or more than the total receipts in 1894, or fifteen years ago. There was a gain every month of the year and a gain from every source of receipts except bequests. The gain in five years has been $129,367, or an annual average increase of $25,800. The gain in ten years has been $197,900, or an annual average of $19,700.

Whole Amount.—The total amount received and expended by the society since its organization in Louisville, Ky., in 1875, is $3,699,342. What a vast work has been accomplished at a comparatively small cost!

Bequests.—The receipts from bequests last year were only $2,453, the smallest in many years. This was a loss of $4,358. Ministers should urge upon the people the importance of remembering this cause in their last will and testament. The total amount received from bequests since the organization of the society is $147,705.77.

Money Expended.—Last year money was expended as follows: Japan, $53,578; China, $71,785.90; Tibet, $7,911.98; India, $49,279; Africa, $31,533; Philippine Islands, $24,533; Hawaii, $1,916; Cuba, $5,972; England, $13,750; Scandanavia, $9,234; Turkey, $375; miscellaneous, $23,764.

Missionary Force.—American and English missionaries 170, native evangelists and helpers 634, or a total of 804, an increase of forty-three. The number of native evangelists and workers have been more than doubled in five years, and the number has been multiplied by five in ten years.

Medical.—The Foreign Society supports seventeen medical missionaries and seventeen hospitals and dispensaries and last year they treated 131,770 patients, an increase of 3,888, or about 361 per day. There has been an increase of 92,900 patients treated in five years, or an annual average of 18,587.

New Missionaries.—Twelve new missionaries were sent out during the past year, and a number of others are under appointment.

New Century Fund.—It is our aim to raise $400,000 this, the first year of the second century of our people. At least $60,000 of this is needed for buildings.

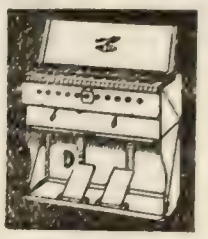
Membership.—The total membership in all the fields is 11,053, a gain of 1,172. The number baptized last year was 1,675. The number of organized churches is 152. There has been an increase of 4,700 in five years.

Sunday-schools.—The number of Sunday-schols is 132, a gain of twenty-two, and the number enrolled is 9,657, a gain of 1,868. There has been a gain of 3,315 in five years.

Educational.—Sixty-two schools and colleges are supported with an attendance of 4,270, a gain of 601. There has been an increase of 2,121 of those under instruction in the past five years.

Fees.—The medical fees received on the fields amount to $12,175, a gain of $3,444. The school fees amount to $8,472, a gain of $3,847. There has been an increase of medical fees in five years of $8,094, and $6,054 in school fees.

Financial.—The total amount given in all the fields last year is $53,360, an increase of $2,705. This is more than double the amount of administration expenses at home, so that for every dollar given by the churches for Foreign Missions more than as many dollars are expended for actual work on the field. There has been an increase of $18,645 in five years.



Sending Offerings.—Send all offerings to F. M. Rains, secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio, who will return proper receipt. Please be careful to state whether the offering is from a church, Sunday-school, Endeavor Society or an individual. Also please give local name of church or Sunday-school when different from post office.

The Wabash County (Indiana) Churches have put out a directory of over 1,300 names of Disciples of Christ distributed among nine different congregations within the boundaries of the county. The purpose of the directory is "to afford information, inspiration and a challenge to effort in Christian ways of work and workship." It is easy to see how such a directory could be made thus useful in any county.

A Progressive Religious Weekly For Christian Homes

-- Editors --

Herbert L. Willett,

Thoroughly Up-to-Date The Christian Century is a progressive religious paper. It is abreast of the times. It stands for those growing ideals which are fast taking possession of the minds of modern men and women. It is not alarmed at scholarship. It believes in education. It gives a vision of things as they are to be. It places the reader in touch with those great lives the country over which are being spent for the welfare of humanity. It strives to develop in its readers the open mind, a broad outlook and the habit and passion of service.

Devoted to Christian Union Thoroughly up-to-date, The Christian Century is no free lance. It rides no hobby. It loves free discussion but hates the contraversial spirit. Its Editors devoutly believe in the plea for the unity of all Christians proclaimed by Thomas and Alexander Campbell and by the Disciples of Christ for almost a century. The Fathers were the most progressive thinkers of their time. Were they living today they would be leading the procession of religious and social progress.

The Staff of Contributors The Editors are re-inforced by a staff of the best equipped and most brilliant writers among the Disciples. Our pages are full of rich and interesting writing.

George A. Campbell conducts a page entitled "Views of Life" that has been styled by hundreds of our readers as the finest piece of literature produced among the Disciples today.

Errett Gates conducts a page on Christian Union. Dr. Gates is a specialist in this field and writes with authority.

Alva W. Taylor interprets the Trend of the World's Events with illuminating insight.

Professor Silas Jones writes the most helpful prayer-meeting message that appears in current literature.

Professor H. L. Willett conducts a page of Biblical Problems, answering all sorts of questions on the Bible, and presenting an exposition of the Book of Acts (the Sunday-school lesson) which is itself worth the price of the paper.

W. D. Endres conducts a Christian Endeavor meeting each week.

Orvis F. Jordan keeps our readers in touch with Chicago, that mysterious, fascinating and strategic field of Christian work.

John R. Ewers conducts a department in which are presented ideals and practical methods of work for Our Church Men.

An Inspiration in the Home The whole round of life is ours. The Christian Century is an assistant pastor in every home into which it goes. Pastors will find the readers of our paper among the most useful and intelligent workers they have. Its pages are adapted to every member of the family. The department especially for children is conducted by Richard W. Gentry. Our splendid news service is edited by Harry F. Burns. Continued stories of the highest grade are running almost constantly.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT, EDITORS

The Shepherd's Search

ONE of the most beautiful chapters of the entire Bible is the fifteenth of Luke. It is one of the charms not only of the Perean ministry of Jesus, but of the entire series of his utterances. It contains the three great parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin and the lost son. With increasing insistence upon the value of human life which is all the time represented under these three story forms, the Saviour passes from one in a hundred through one in ten to one in two; from the sheep which might easily be spared, through the coin which would be a serious but not irreparable loss, to the son whose departure and estrangement well nigh broke the father's heart.

Palestine was a land of shepherds and flocks and is to this day. Israel, in coming in from the desert, changed from a nomadic to an agricultural people and later from agricultural to urban life. But it never lost the love of the field or the flocks. Many of its most beautiful figures of speech are derived from this occupation. And the Shepherd psalm has enshrined itself in the regard of the faithful in all ages as much by the beauty of its figure of the shepherd as by its central truth of the protecting love of God.

The abundance of references to shepherd industries in the Old Testament made it appropriate that Jesus should employ the same figure to represent himself as the good shepherd. One of his most searching and discriminating descriptions of his mission in the world employs throughout this line of the shepherd and the sheep.

But in the parable of the lost sheep our Saviour puts specific emphasis upon the dangers which human life encounters in the wide wastes of the world and his own supreme value as the shepherd overseer of souls. That humanity is lost is a very real and tragic truth which he tries to convey in this story. There have been ages when theological phraseology quite obscured the central and appalling truth of man's lost condition. Even today the words seem to have little meaning in the minds of a generation that has grown prosperous and self-indulgent.

What does it mean to be lost? Outside of the church, the successful business man, the professional man who has won an assured place in his work, the educator, the journalist, the man of affairs, the woman who is a social leader or even social follower, the housewife, the mother, experience very little mental reaction when, in the language of Scripture, they are described as lost. They do not feel any such sensations. Life looks too cheerful and offers too many opportunities for self-realization for them to take seriously the language of the pulpit.

The trouble is probably with the pulpit itself. It has not interpreted the significance of the experience of being lost in terms that the average man and woman can understand. Our generation has no vital conception of anything serious in a condition from which the act of joining the church can save it. The church itself is busy with so many things that seem trifling and its teachings are so frequently ill adjusted to the needs and comprehension of the men and women it seeks to reach that its story is discredited where it should be impressive and convincing.

To accept the companionship and interpretation of Jesus, however, is to gain a fresh sense of the reality involved in even the slightest of his figures of speech. He knew full well that none of the parables of this chapter or any other could exhaust the significance of the moral life. Language is a weak instrument at best to express spiritual facts. It breaks down constantly under the stress of such truths as those which Jesus and Paul tried to convey. But it has at least hints of the great experiences through which the souls of men are always passing.

Jesus came into the world that men might have life and have it abundantly. He saw that to live on the lower levels of selfish interest and materialism was to miss the supreme chance of living. He did not reprove men for seeking wealth or influence or station. He only warned them that these things could not satisfy men with natures like God's. To live with no larger outlook upon life, no ampler purpose, no deep and urgent passion that links the soul with infinite purposes and gives it continental proportions is to be lost. The man who wanders through an art gallery with no training that can make him appreciative of the masterpieces hung about him, is lost. The man who finds himself in a social group where culture, good taste and elevated thought prevails and is without some adequate appreciation of these fine qualities and some power to adjust himself to his environment, is lost. The man who is unconscious of the deeper and more controlling emotions of life, who has never, for example, felt himself urged onward by the commanding power of love, is lost. He is in the outer darkness. He is an alien from the commonwealth of heaven and a stranger to the covenants of promise. The woman who finds her only satisfaction in self adornment or the pursuit of frivolities of a superficial order, who knows and cares nothing for the great ideals of home life, the glory of nourishing childhood, the transfiguration of character through widening interests in the great vocations of social service, is lost. This is no theological abstraction. It is no phrasing of the books. It is the serious and appalling fact to whose interpretation Jesus gave his life.

Jesus came to save such men and women from the narrow, profitless, and unsatisfying life in which at their best moments they find themselves implicit. The sheep in the desert may be content until a storm breaks upon him and he longs for the shepherd's voice. The coin, inert and senseless, is content to remain where it rolled into the dark. But the human life with any response to infinite values is sure to waken soon or late to a sense of its lost opportunities. It becomes aware that it is missing the divine chance. Like the prodigal son, such a man comes to himself at last.

Whenever that moment comes, brought by any compulsion of suffering, of admiration for holiness and beauty, or of arousal to Chrstian truth, there is One who is the shepherd of the sheep and who is willing to go a very long way to find the one that is lost. That wonderful picture of shepherd's love that tarries not until the last mountain is scaled and the last valley is threaded in the search for the missing sheep has been told in parable and song until all the world knows it. But it can never be fathomed in its immense significance. The shepherd seeks until he finds the sheep.

In that word "until he finds" lies the glory of the tireless love of God and the pathos of man's resisting will. The sheep cannot choose but be found by the shepherd who, with unwearied stride, searches all the waste. The coin cannot but yield itself up at last to the searching finger of the undiscouraged housewife; but, alas, the lost son may deliberately choose to tarry in the far country. And even those gracious words "until he find it" may be defeated by the unsubmitting soul of man. It would be a comfort to believe that the purposes of God pursue the sinning soul so lovingly, so relentlessly, that somewhere either soon or late it must come back home. Perhaps in some way that we do not now perceive this will prove itself to be true. But its serious defect is the failure to take account of the choosing will of man. Sin becomes cumulative; choices grow by practice. To insist that all men will repent and turn to God at last in this or some other world is to approach dangerously near the price at which the dice are loaded in the great game and the universe becomes mechanical and not free. But it is the greatest of satisfaction to know that if there be a dead line beyond which the soul cannot return to the light, it is of man's making and not of God's. The great Shepherd at least searches until he finds the sheep. Whether he can bring it home must depend upon that will of man with which even God himself cannot interfere.

To preach this parable with all its deep significance is the task of the minister and teacher. At this season of the year when the church rouses itself to new efforts in behalf of the unsaved, it has significant value. To preach it, not as a commonplace of a half-understood theology, but as the great and vital message of the cross is the task and the delight of the servant of the Lord.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

Running Ahead of Public Opinion

It is easy for impatient reformers to run ahead of public opinion. It goes without saying that they should run far ahead in their ideals, but to attempt to run far ahead in their legal regulations often destroys their own cause. Hecker said: "The Law—her seat is in the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the universe, all things in heaven and earth unite to do her homage—the weak as feeling her protecting care, and the strong as not exempt from her power." If this be so, the law must be just and the public must realize both its justness and its necessity.

Education must precede regulation in matters that have been common custom. In republican government the people have a sense of their own responsibility for law-making, and if laws are enacted to which they are not favorable and which cross decided custom, they will excuse their evasion through this blind sense of their own responsibility for law-making, and, holding the creator greater than his creation, perhaps even defy the law. They must be educated to see the public good, to acknowledge the demands of society upon their personal desires, to know that personal gain or habit cannot intervene before public welfare. True, there are always some who will have to be taught with the "birch." But for such fewer laws would be needed. The greatest good for the greatest number rules against the personal privilege of many and civic patriotism demands the sacrifice of "personal liberty" in matters of social moment.

Preferential Voting

The Primary is admittedly a problem. Plurality nominations make it easy for independent voters to divide their votes on differing issues or differing phases of the same issue or between several ambitious reform candidates, while the machine never has but one candidate unless the second be up for a blind. Florida has the second election system for nomination. This plan gives majority nominations but is expensive. Berkeley, Cal., has adopted it also. Plural nominations are the bane of the primary. Where there are many candidates a small minority may nominate. Preferential voting gives majority nominations without the expedient of second balloting. Grand Junction, Colo., has adopted this system in its new charter.

The device is very simple. The voter simply marks his first, second, and third choice. Any candidate that has a clear majority over all on the first ballot is thereby nominated or elected as the case may be. In event no candidate has a clear majority over all the candidate lowest on the list is dropped and the second-choice column is counted and added to the first, and the name receiving a clear majority of all in the total of first and second choice votes is victor. If the count of the second choice gives no one the majority then the lowest on the list is again dropped and the third choice totals for the remaining names added to the previous totals for each and the office goes to the man with a majority over all. This is believed to be an effectual enemy of the machine. If applied to both nominations and elections it ought to stop any crookedness or wire pulling that the people desired stopped. Of course no system can be devised for the conscienceless electorate, that, by lack of faith in good government or love of partizanship, refuses to attempt to be independent.

Checks Against Maladministration

Our forefathers sought to institute a series of checks against ill-advised or arbitrary legislation by providing two legislative bodies and giving executive and judicial powers the right of veto and of judicial construction. Back of all they placed a constitution that prohibited any hasty action and attempted to set up almost prohibitory checks by the basic fundamentals it set in the foundations. Today we need to devise checks against maladministration. Administrators need a freer hand and a check on their enlarged powers that will be lodged in the electorate.

The new type of city charters have almost invariably adopted the Initiative, Referendum, and Recall. To give a mayor, a department head. or a police superintendent the large powers of administration that effective execution demands and then to leave him unchecked by a larger power, is to deliver the very powers of government over to the machine politician that happens to gain one of these positions. Civil service is an attempt to put the detail of administration under rules of competency and to prevent the discharge of competent officers by corrupt or designing heads. Civil service has proven its worth, but its weak point is also made apparent. It is not inefficient, but it is not all-sufficient.

This is strikingly illustrated in the case of the new Chief of Police in Chicago. He is evidently trying to give the city a clean police administration, but has a Herculean task on his hands and is baffled by his own aids. The whole force is honeycombed with corruption and the chief is powerless to discharge corrupt men without a trial before the Merit Board, where evidence must be strong and guilt is unproven even when entirely apparent. The Merit Board may itself be so in sympathy with the let-alone-policy of the politicians that it will make investigation difficult and discharge all but impossible. Would it not be better to allow the head of the department large powers over his force and hold him in check by the Recall? If he does not get an efficient force, let the public call him to account by demanding his discharge. The very fact that one-fourth of the voters could demand a recall and compel him to go before the electorate, facing certain definite charges, would make him very careful to do what would commend itself to the public conscience. Civil Service would operate to prevent incompetence getting onto the force, but it would not operate to keep corruption out of it.

A Radical Charter

Grand Junction, Colo., has adopted the most radical of the new city charters. Besides adopting the preferential system of voting as described above, it provides for nomination by petition. Each petitioner must make a separate affidavit for each candidate. Five Commissioners are elected and held responsible by the Recall. The Initiative and Referendum are also adopted, permitting people to become masters of legislation. Paving contracts are forbidden and no contract can be made by the council that will extend beyond the life of that council. All grants of power or propefty, such as franchises, rights of way, grants or real estate, etc., are made only upon referendum. Most radical of all, perhaps, is the utter outlawing of the liquor traffic in all forms. It cannot be made, sold, or given away.

This is the most radical effort to apply the democratic principles of republican government. It puts the final trust in the people, but gives the administrative detail into the hands of elected representatives who are made strictly amenable to public demand. Our cities draw the line straight between the two ideas of government. One is that the people can be trusted to choose their representatives, but that these representatives can be better trusted to care for the people's needs than can the people themselvs and that, therefore, their will should be supreme. The other is that the people have both the right and the ability to govern themselves and that they elect their representatives, not to govern them, but to do their will, and that to this end they give them powers of administration and committee subject to public revision.

Commissioners Instead of Legislators

The recent meeting of Illinois mayors petitioned the legislature to submit the commission form of city administration to a referendum. It is a referendum matter even after the law is passed—every city must vote on it before adoption. It allows any city to adopt the commission plan or keep the old method of government.

The commission plan looks upon the city as more an administrative than a legislative unit. The matter of fixing legislative principles is so largely done by the state legislature that the city can well give ordinance-making into the hands of its administrative boards, reserving, by the Referendum, the right of veto for the people. The design of the commission plan is to center responsibility in a few competent heads of departments and to hold them strictly accountable for administration in their respective departments, allowing them to pass necessary ordinances, subject to revision and to initiation by the electorate. It makes the city government less a matter of politics and more one of business and social progress.

Wisconsin University, ever to the fore, has organized, through its Extension Department, a Municipal Reference Bureau. The Political Science Department of the University gives seminars in Public Administration and the close coördination between the two gives the actual officials of municipalities the benefit of their expert investigations and advice. The information acquired will be given the municipal public through the lectures of the Extension Department, and the expert investigations in all city problems will be freely furnished to city officials and a journal called Municipality will be published for the general diffusion of intelligence on all civic problems.

The University undertook this work when the state passed the law allowing cities to adopt the commission form of government. It recognized that this meant the attempt to make city administration intelligent and efficient, a matter of social more than political consideration. It will be recalled that Wisconsin devised a reference department for state legislators some years ago that proved of great worth for those who came to the capitol desirous of legislating intelligently.

Prairie State Rebels

Senator Cummins is not affrighted by the President's Winona plea for Tawney nor his Boston apology for Senator Aldrich. He declares the war is on and that with all respect for the President it will be prosecuted. The President assumes the role of harmonizer. He is one of those big-natured fellows who sees good everywhere and in all men—barring, perhaps, the Oklahoma constitution. He calls Cummins and Aldrich alike into his councils and treats "Uncle Joe" not only with good-natured suavity, but treats with him for legislation. His western trip has not been a success as a harmonizer of the prairie state rebels. Dolliver says, with characteristic conservatism, that he sees no reason for changing either his opinion or tactics. Bristow, doughty fighter, throws the gauntlet fairly into the face of the "reactionaries." La Follette has the war horn to his lips and speaks with his wonted frankness. All these declare uncompromising loyalty to republicanism, but also declare that if Cannon and Aldrich are good Republicans, then they are not.

A cartoonist has drawn a map of Aldrich's country. It makes New England and the Middle Eastern states as large as all the remaining nation. They may accept the President's protest that the Rhode Island man is patriotic and does his honest duty as he sees it, but they deny that he has any conception of the fact that the interests of the whole country are not those of the East alone. Massachusetts turned an overwhelming Republican victory of a year ago into a bare majority this year, with the tariff question as the clear-cut issue, and Senators Lodge and Crane active for the candidate and the present bill, and Massachusetts is above almost any state a manufacturing territory. A Republican ran on the democratic ticket for Lieut.-Governor as a foe of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

This, of course, gives great heart to insurgency. The Middle West feels it will take a turn at molding policies. The rebels are from the prairie states. Kansas, ever in the lead, proposes to inaugurate a Republican campaign, among Republicans, to defeat all who opposed the insurgent program in the last congress. "Uncle Joe" has been through these states "cussing" in private and venting no little spleen in public, shouting all the old party shibboleths, and earning his long deserved retirement thereby. It is notorious that on the recent trip with the President down the Mississippi, Middle West congressmen frankly told the Speaker that it was as good as defeat for them to advocate him any longer and that he could best repay his debt to them for past fealty by making this term his last. La Follette reminds us that Cannonism is the real issue and that it must not be obscured behind Cannon; that it will be of no use to retire Cannon if it does not at the same time retire the arbitrary rules he holds over the head of congress and the Bourbon principles of which he is crowned monarch. Many strong party men whisper loudly enough to be heard that if the President does not make more open cause with progressive policy and less tolerant espousal of reactionary personalities, that a certain gentlemen in Africa will be his successor as well as predecessor.

AMONG the notable figures in English life during the past decade Lord Rosebery occupied a position of great promise and prestige, especially in the brief interval following Mr. Gladstone's retirement from politics. But after his short administration of the premiership he began to withdraw not only from general political activity, but even from the close friendship of his colleagues among Liberals. In July, 1901, he announced his intention to plow his furrow alone, and later, during the premiership of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, he advised the Liberals to clean their slate in terms that were somewhat resented by the Prime Minister. When, indeed, he was asked if he spoke from the interior of their political tabernacle, he replied in the negative. But he added that he hoped to remain not wholly in solitude. Recently, after a long political silence, scarcely broken by his Life of Napoleon and certain lectures on literary topics, Lord Rosebery has assumed the attitude of critic of the Liberal budget, now being so vigorously pressed for adoption in the House of Commons. This last utterance plainly reveals his final departure from the Liberal side, although he has not announced any policy of direct support for the Conservatives. Lord Rosebery might have been a tower of strength to progressive legislation in England, but his aristocratic sympathies have been too pronounced, and his place in the political life of England will be a pathetically negligible one. The famous lines of Browning on "The Lost Leader" recur to those who study his career.

THE plans for a campaign in the Winter and Spring to exclude the saloons from Chicago are going forward with enthusiasm and confidence. The Anti-Saloon League and the Chicago No-License Committee are coöperating in this enterprise. It might seem at first entirely unreasonable to expect success in such a huge undertaking as this, but next to winning a fight is the good that results from making it. It is certain that the ultimate victory for sobriety against the saloon can only be won at the end of a long campaign; and each battle, whether it is won or lost, helps to educate the community regarding the true character of the liquor traffic. It is for this reason as well as because there is a fighting chance of actually winning in the present instance, that the temperance forces are lining up for the coming contest. One of the promising features of the work is the harmony prevailing between temperance forces which have been all too quick to assume critical attitudes toward each other, almost amounting to open hostility. Nothing is more disastrous than for such organizations as the Anti-Saloon League, the Prohibition Party and the local temperance organizations to quarrel over methods and results. At the present time there seems to be a reasonable degree of unity in this Chicago campaign, and this is the most heartening aspect of the matter.

The first biennial convention of the Anti-Saloon League of America, which will also be the thirteenth national convention, will be held in Chicago from Monday, December 6, to Thursday, December 9. It will be preceded by a conference of superintendents and field workers from Tuesday, November 30, to Saturday, December 4. Sunday, December 5, is to be made Anti-Saloon Sunday in all the churches of Chicago. Speakers will be provided by the League to occupy the pulpits of all churches which offer this hospitality. Eminent representatives of temperance work throughout the country and indeed throughout the world will be present to make the convention the most notable temperance gathering in modern times.

ONE of the interesting lines of investigation which has claimed the attention of certain workers in the field of psychical phenomena is that relating to alleged spiritistic manifestations. Gradually it has been shown by the simple rules of scientific observation that the vast majority of spiritistic phenomena are purely the tricks of the trade. All such alleged proofs of spirit activity as slate writing, table lifting, trumpet speaking, spirit messages and most forms of materialization have been shown to be the simplest tricks, easily performed by the practised operator and relying, of course, upon their surprising and unusual character for any ability to delude the credulous. The most convincing proof of the fraudulent character of these mediumistic claims is the fact that every trick in the long list of alleged spiritistic manifestations is also performed by men and women who claim no intercourse with the spirit world. Now and then, however, there are found persons with such psychic gifts that their operations require more careful study, and even then seem to baffle the experts. An instance at hand is the Italian woman, Eusapia Palladino, whose arrival in this country last week was at the request of certain members of the American Society for Psychical Research, who had learned of her remarkable powers manifested in various European capitals. This woman, who seems to be a fair representative of the peasant type, without physical attractiveness, but with a highly nervous temperament, performs feats of amazing character which, in many instances, have completely baffled the psychic experts in their efforts to explain them. It is evident that their explanation lies not in the realm of spiritism at all, but in that of psychic endowments of an extraordinary type. The interesting fact regarding the woman is that, coupled with these alleged mediumistic powers, there are moral qualities of the most primitive and undeveloped type. If it could be claimed that the woman is the proof of spiritistic manifestations, then certainly the character of spirit life with which she is conversant, is of the least desirable sort. Her performances, however, prove the fact that there is still a considerable realm of psychic activity unexplored, or at least uncharted, and that the students of psychology have before them an interesting field for exploration. It is a field with many alluring features, but unfortunately the people who have given it the most attention are apparently those less capable of drawing sane and wholesome conclusions from their studies. The broad and immature conclusions reached on the part of some men whose names are more or less familiar as students of science show that there is need not only of poise and restraint on the part of one who gives himself to psychic study of this character, but also of a competent and thorough preparatory training in studies related to the psychic field.

ONE of the most interesting features of the work of the Religious Education Association, whose headquarters are in Chicago, is the collection of a library of nearly two thousand volumes on special subjects relating to religious education. This library is arranged for easy access in the rooms of the Association at 72 Madison street. It is something of a proof of the service that this library is rendering that the United States Custom Office has, after examination, recognized it as entitled to the privilege of a public library, including the reception of books from Europe duty free. Many visitors call daily at the rooms of the Association and consult the volumes there gathered. Those of our readers who live in Chicago or who are passing through the city will do well to visit this library and become familiar with its significance and value as an aid in the great work of religious education. The time will inevitably come when some person will furnish the funds to put it on a systematic basis and enable the office to employ an assistant who can have the care of the volumes and can render aid to those who wish to avail themselves of the collection.

IT IS apparent that the Disciples are not the only ones who are dreaming of Christian unity and striving for its realization. From the most unexpected quarter news comes constantly of serious and prayerful attempts making toward this same end. The latest news of this kind and perhaps the most remarkable is that which relates to the efforts now being made in New England for a closer union between the Episcopalians and the Congregationalists. The men in both denominations who are wrestling with this question are not without hope that wide as are the reaches that separate these two churches, they may be brought not only to coöperation, but actual union. A committee representing the Congregationalists and headed by Dr. Newman Smyth of New Haven met a similar committee headed by Bishop Brewster of the Episcopalian church to exchange views regarding the desirability of such a union and several questions which touch most points of possible difference were discussed in a spirit which promises a serious effort to grapple with the problem and bring some solution to pass. The mere fact that such a union could be contemplated by men of recognized standing in the two denominations is a proof that the question is not merely academic, but practicable and capable of solution. The Disciples will watch all such efforts as this with the keenest interest and most sympathetic attention.

THE Biblical World for November opens with an editorial entitled "Our Attack on the Bible." It is a review of the circumstances connected with the sensational newspaper reports of last month's editorial on the "New Ethics and the Historical Interpretation of the Bible," of which The Christian Century made mention. Professor Votaw writes on "Moral Training in the Public Schools," an exceedingly live topic treated in a constructive and suggestive way. Professor McFadyen continues his articles on "Communion with God in the Bible," and Professor Edward O. Wicher deals with "Ancient Jewish Views of the Messiah." Professor Soares writes of Paul's missionary methods and Professor Goodspeed of Paul's voyage to Italy, while Professor Vernon Bartlett treats of Paul in Rome. These three articles, all of which are illustrated, are valuable for their assistance in the International Sunday-school lessons of this quarter.

Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, the Labrador missionary, has been giving a series of addresses in Chicago in the interest of his work among the fisher folk of that region. His lectures are illustrated by stereopticon views and are full of interesting facts in regard to these northern regions and their people. Dr. Grenfell's story is one of the romantic and impressive narratives of missionary work in our generation.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett.

What was the purpose of Moses' killing of the Egyption? Was it the result of his anger at Egyptian cruelty or was it a signal for the uprising of his people. R. C. T.

The narrative in the book of Exodus implies only the first of these motives. But the words of Stephen in his defense (Acts 7:25) "He supposed that his brethren understood how that God by his hand was giving them deliverance; but they understood not," seem to imply that Moses expected his countrymen to rise in an effort for self-liberation when he thus pointed out to them his plan and offered his leadership.

Dear Brother: I had occasion today to look up the subject of "Baptism for the Dead." I was disappointed in finding nothing definite and clear upon that subject. Pardon me if I give an interpretation that seems at least clear to me, and one upon which I desire your criticism. In the 15th of 1st Corinthians Paul is writing upon the subject of the resurrection. He emphatically gives the Corinthians to understand that the Christian religion is based upon the resurrection of Christ, and that if Christ be not risen, that, then, of course, Christ is dead and our hope is vain, etc. If Christ is dead, and you have been testifying by your baptism (immersion) that Christ is risen, then you have become false witnesses, etc. Then comes that 29th verse which I wish to quote by inserting in parenthesis the word Christ, which I think will make my idea clear. "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead (Christ) if the dead (Christ) rise not at all?" Why are they then baptized for the dead (Christ). It seems to me that this version is logical when we take into consideration that immersion symbolizes the death, burial and resurrection of Christ. Is it not fair to presume that Paul had taught the Corinthians the significance of baptism by immersion? And that they practiced it as taught by him, showing forth that which some of them had ceased to believe, and in that practice they were false to their convictions? All of the other interpretations that I have seen, seem to be based upon a supposition of what must have been a custom for which there seems to be no authority. Most respectfully yours, A. L. C.

Springfield, Ill.

This interpretation of the verse in Corinthians is interesting, but not convincing. If the apostle had intended to refer to Christ as the dead for whom others were baptized, he would surely have made it more evident by his words. It would have been appalling to leave so simple a fact obscured by partial statement. Of course the significance of your interpretation may be taken for granted without supposing that the apostle had it in mind, for it is obvious that it would be useless to baptize any one in the name of a dead Messiah. But this can hardly be what Paul has in mind. The custom was as old as the days of the Macabees, as we learn from the first book of that name. And similar ritual customs for the dead, with the obvious significance of claiming the virtues of redemption for those who had passed away without such obedience as entitled them to the rights of believers, was common. This seems to be the natural and obvious meaning of the text.

Please tell me the best biographies of the following men: Huss, Luther, Erasmus, Calvin, Wycliffe, John Wesley; also the best treatment of the soteriology of the Old Testament. B. H. Cleaver.

Huss—Loserth: "Wycliffe and Huss"; Luther—Lindsey (in brief; 296 pages), Koestlin (full and authoritative); Erasmus—Capey (brief, 220 pages), Emerton (the best; 463 pages); Calvin—Henry (old but standard; 2 vols.), Schaff: "History of the Christian Church" (vol. 7), is the best; Knox—P. H. Brown (full; 2 vols.); Wycliffe—Lechler (translated from the German); Wesley—Winchester.

The soteriology of the Old Testament is best treated in the Old Testament Theologies of Schultz (2 vols. T. & T. Clark) and Davidson (Scribner's—International Theological Library); also in a work just published by the University of Chicago Press on "Atonement" by Smith, Burton and Smith.

The Book World

The Inner Life

THE TEMPLE, by Lyman Abbott, is the third of three companion volumes. The others, previously published are: "The Great Companion," and "The Other Room." These are not books of theology but of religion. Their object, the author says, "is not to define but to describe." The first to describe Christian faith as an experience; the second, to describe immortality, a habit of mind in looking upon things that are eternal; and the present volume is not to expound philosophy or psychology, but to describe human experience as it ought be, interpreting the laws of both body and mind. The treatment is practical, terse, and suggestive. The chapters are brief and may well be used for short studies for evenings by a group of church people. They might with great profit form the text for a series of studies substituted for the usual prayer meeting service. The comprehensiveness and suggestiveness is seen in the mere enumeration of the chapter headings: "The Body," "The Eye," "The Ear," "The Tongue," The Hand," "The Feet," "The Appetites," "The Passions," "Imagination," "The Conscience," "The Reason," "Love." These chapters form a little volume of inspiration, and practical wisdom hardly surpassed anywhere. They are good for any life that is still growing. (The Macmillan Company New York. $1.25, net.)

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PRAYER, by Anna Louise Strong. This small volume is in part a reprint of articles in the American Journal of Psychology and Education and the American Journal of Theology. It deals with prayer as a study of social relations between the individual and God. It traces somewhat the character of prayer as employed by primitive people and children to express their sense of need. And from this simple value of petition it traces the growth of discrimination up to the point where prayer becomes, on the one side, a satisfaction of the sense of rest and completion in relations with the divine, or of desire for quickening and assistance in the tasks of the world. The writer has carefully avoided all discussion of the reality of response to prayer, and confines her attention to the psychology of the subject, attempting to trace the results of prayer as they are observed in the praying subject. The treatment, though fragmentary and far from satisfactory as a statement concerning prayer, is a valuable contribution to one aspect of the subject. An appendix contains a selected bibliography. (University of Chicago Press. pp. 122. $1.75 net.)

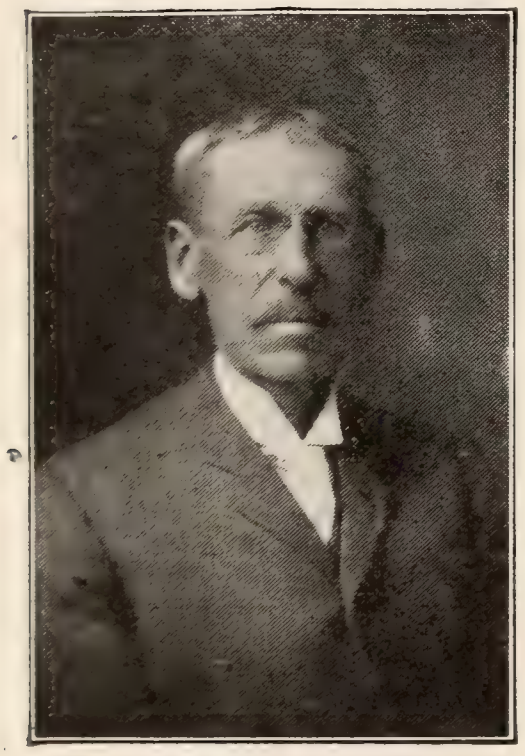
PSYCHOTHERAPY, by Hugo Munsterberg, is one of a series of books on applied psychology by the same author. It is a much needed work. Loose and often misleading psychological conceptions have passed into popular use at the present time. Especially in the practical field of so-called mind cure do these erroneous conceptions prevail. The popular doctrine of the subconscious is an instance in point. Upon this doctrine are based more of the psychic follies of today than upon any other. Professor Munsterberg dismisses the subconscious with three crisp words: there is none. He insists upon carrying the scientific method straight through all phenomena like hypnotism, somnambulism, alternating personality and suggestion without the use of the uncanny and mystical hypothesis of a subconscious mind. In this he is in accord with the best psychologists. The facts of psychotherapy are not questioned by the author. One way of curing disease is through the psychic side of the psycho-physical organism. But it is never to be overlooked that the human organism to be cured is psycho-physical through and through. One school of psychotherapy today proceeds upon the contrast between consciousness and subconsciousness and makes its approach to the organism through the subconscious. The other school proceeds upon the antithesis between mind and body and makes psychotherapy a kind of triumph of the mind over the body. The first is the fallacy of the popular representatives of the Emmanuel Movement, the second is the assumption of Christian Science. "As soon as we have overcome the prejudices of these two rival schools and have recognized that both are wrong, that there is no subconsciousness and that there is no psychological fact that is not at the same time a physiological one, we see at once that this common procedure of both schools is unjustified and dangerous." The practical inference is that the systematic application of psychotherapy belongs in the hands of the well-trained physician and of nobody else. But this involves of course that every physician ought to be well schooled in psychology.

Dr. Munsterberg brings to his task not only a thoroughly specialized training in psychology, but an almost equal specialization in physiology and medicine. The book gives an introductory section of about 150 pages on the fundamental principles of psychological science which might be difficult to the average reader. After that, however, the style is easy. (New York: Moffat, Yard & Company, pp. 398.)

Sociology and Missions

THE LIVING CHRIST AND DYING HEATHENISM, by Johannes L. Warneck. Translated by Neil Buchanan.

Herr Johann Warneck has written a volume that is worthy of much more than a conventional review. He has made a close study of the mind of the devotee of animism and all heathenism. His work as a missionary among the devil worshippers of Sumatra gave him an extraordinary opportunity and he has used it to produce a psychological study of the mental processes involved in a conversion from animism to Christianity and of the methods and objects which are necessary to produce it. His study of animism leads him to conclude that it is not a stage in the evolution of religious belief but a degeneration of it and a flat denial of God and good and a worship of evil. It involves the contradiction of morality, and custom is the only thing approaching moral sanctions. The first presentation of Christianity is repelled by the materialism of the heathen concept and by their rebellion at the moral demand. Theologically, the new religion does not impress them and they have no acute sense of sin as a rule, but they are miserable physically and socially and the missioner incites a desire for the better by entering this open door of opportunity. He removes the cruelties of heathenism and thus strikes at the major results of its superstitions. The evangelist becomes the evangel and through his own personality as a benevolent factor in the better physical and social life he preaches the personality of Christ. Many phenomena such as dreams and visions are observable in the transition of the pagan mind and illustrate the primitive phenomena of the Old Testament. The missionary always has the boon of a few minds that are truth seekers and bridge for him the weary waiting time for the germinating of his seed in the hearts of the many. Once the mind of the spirit worshipper is unburdened of its obsessions and the desire for better living is aroused, the personality of the missioner magnetizes the seeker and the work of his redemption is completed by his growing appreciation of the Christ. Moral and spiritual certainties begin to anchor within him, the fact of God begins to be appreciated and his love comprehended, and the spirit of service mounts to the place once held by that of fear and the brute, and the mind of Christ becomes his living possession. (New York and Chicago: Fleming H. Revell & Company. pp.312. $1.75.)



MISSIONS IN THE PLAN OF THE AGES, by Wm. Owen Carver, M. A., Th. D., Professor of Missions and Comparative Religion in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary at Louisville, Ky. Missions are here treated from the theological rather than the sociological standpoint. The Biblical teaching is worthily given, but with a strong theological flavor. The author is quite conservative and prefers the authorized version in his quotations, but demonstrates that neither the conservative nor radical viewpoint takes away the missionary content of the Scriptures. One might expect that the plan of the ages would include some historical and social considerations, but if so, in the author's mind, it must be found beneath the superstructure of theological formulary. In such a chapter as that on "The Meaning of Missions to the World" there is certainly no adequate treatment that ignores the vast social amelioration that Christian missions brings into civilization and a treatment wholly eschatological is hardly adequate to the theme. On the phases treated the book is very readable and enlightening. It lacks the thrill of such a book as McLean's "Where the Book Speaks" just because of its theological cast, but is withal an illuminating exposition of Scripture on the universal element in the Gospel. (New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. pp. 289. $1.25.)

SNAP SHOTS FROM SUNNY AFRICA, by Helen E. Springer. This book is what it is called, snap-shots. It is a series of pictures,—the pictures worth while without the unpicturesque rhetoric so often used to fill in between. The author knows what the untraveled reader wants to know, a thing which many writers of strange lands and customs do not seem to know. They are so oriented within their strange environment that they forget the utter newness and interest of it to the one who never experienced it. Mrs. Springer gives snap shots of the native's way of thinking, of his wearing of names, of his habits at home and on the path, of African highways and byways, the little incidents of travel and life that make it different from that of other places, and so puts together one of the most readable books on that great continent that is getting so much attention today and which will soon be, doubtless, the most sought out portion of the world. Bishop Hartzell writes the introduction. (New York and Chicago: Fleming H. Revell & Co. Pp. 194. $1.00.)

THE ARMENIAN AWAKENING, by Leon Arpee. This volume is in part reprinted from the American Journal of Theology, but most of the chapters are presented for the first time. It constitutes a history of the Armenian Church from 1820 to 1860 and outlines the causes of trouble and persecution which the Armenians in the Turkish empire have suffered for many years past. One could wish, of course, that the discussion had been brought down to the present time. A full and careful treatment of the materials which are covered in the survey indicates the effort the author has made to give an adequate statement of the subject, and one knows that this could have been continued to the present, covering, as it then would, one of the most important epochs in the history of religious progress and persecution. The appendix, however, gives a competent statement regarding the new Turkish constitution adopted last spring. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1.25.)

THE GREAT WHITE PLAGUE, by E. O. Otis, M. D. This book is written in popular language by one of the great experts in the study and treatment of tuberculosis. It is attractive reading to the average man. The history, cause, prevention, and cure of the most destructive of modern diseases is simply and graphically told. One is heartened to find that 70 per cent of the incipient cases are completely cured by hygienic measures and disheartened to find that the dread malady lies at the end of nearly every road of dissipation, bad housing, over-work, monotonous toil, crowding, dusty employment and every other evil condition of living that confronts the social student of the times. For instance, it is shown that 41 per cent of cases coming under the writer's observation had a history of excessive alcoholism, and that out of some 23,000 cases examined of those who were engaged in dusty factories, the tuberculosis rate was three times what it was among out-of-door occupations. The writer demands practically all the reforms asked for by social workers today as means of defeating the plague. Among them are the prohibition of the liquor traffic, breaking up of the tenement system, clean factories, food inspection, sanitary living and the abolition of the sweat shop. He describes the amazing progress of the crusade against it and tells the reader of the simple means all can use to aid the cause. (New York: T. Y. Crowell & Co. Pp. 321. $1.00)

THE ETHICS OF PROGRESS, by Charles F. Dole. Readers of the "Religion of a Gentleman" or of any other of Mr. Dole's works, such as "The Spirit of Democracy," "The Theology of Civilization" or the Ingersoll lecture on "The Hope of Immortality" will welcome this discussion of the theory and practice of civilization, which proceeds from the same pen. Among the topics discussed in the book are ethics and evolution, the doctrine of good will, conscience and the right, moral evil, how to treat it, the problems of human nature, the realm of casuistry, and problems in practice. Perhaps the most interesting section is the last, in which the author discusses some of the questions which our generation is facing most definitely. After laying the foundation in his previous discussion, he tackles such themes as gambling, intemperance, war, social responsibility and religion. The reader will find the discussion sane, balanced and informing, if not inspiring. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. Pp. 308. $1.50 net.)

The Disciples

CENTENNIAL ADDRESSES, by W. L. Hayden, A. M. Few men among the Disciples are better fit to review with awareness and force the work of the four men whose names are most familiar to us as the first champions of our plea than Mr. Hayden. He comes from a family of the pioneers and his own long life has given him a knowledge of events and movements which have prepared him to make proper assessment of the fathers and the later generation. These addresses have been delivered during the past year and are particularly appropriate to the Centennial time. To do justice to these men without over-statement or boastfulness is a difficult task, and yet Mr. Hayden has accomplished it with admirable poise and fairness. The book includes not only studies of the four founders but a later chapter on pioneers and missions which adds greatly to the value of the work. The book is published in two forms, in pamphlet and in cloth, at 25 and 50 cents or $2.00 and $4.00 per dozen, respectively. It is a genuine contribution to our Centennial literature. Published by the author at Indianapolis, Indiana. Pp. 48.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL AS A PREACHER by Archibald McLean, president of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. "The Grand Old Man" of our day has here made a valuable contribution to the Centennial literature of the Disciples, for he has not only given an interpretation of the life of Mr. Campbell, which is unequalled, but has embodied the words of many noted contemporaries concerning Mr. Campbell's character and work. The work is in President McLean's inimitable style, clear and incisive, interpreting Mr. Campbell as a preacher and a man. (Fleming H. Revell and Co., Chicago.)

THE STORY OF A CENTURY, by James Harvey Garrison. It has been somewhat surprising that the Centennial of the Disciples of Christ has not called forth a larger list of writings pertinent to the history and efforts of this people. Perhaps our Centennial aims have been so various and insistent that we have not had much time for literary labor. Among the few books, however, which have emerged from the press directly relating themselves to the work of the brotherhood is this volume by Dr. Garrison, who has reprinted the chapters originally published in the Christian-Evangelist. Without undertaking to be in any manner exhaustive, the book reviews the most significant feature of our history from the days of the fathers to our own time. It is a curious fact that in most of the efforts to write the story of this reformation special stress is laid upon the beginnings of the enterprise and upon the present situation and its problems, but very little is said of the middle period which is not less significant as pointing out the tendencies of later times. In the present volume more than half of the space is devoted to the four founders, while only some thirty pages bring up the discussion to the beginning of the summaries. But Dr. Garrison was not writing a methodical history, and we are very glad to have this treatment of even a familiar theme. If there is one point in which the volume seems lacking especially, it is in the failure to emphasize with ever-increasing insistence the real task of the Disciples as the advocates of Christian unity. To be sure the subject is spoken of in many different ways, but the total message of the book does not mass itself on this theme as it ought. None the less the volume is an interesting contribution to our Centennial literature, and additional value is lent by the portrait of several men prominent in our history. Archibald McLean contributes an introduction. There ought to be a bibliography added. (St. Louis: The Christian Publishing Co. Pp. 278. $1.50 net.)

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL AND CHRISTIAN LIBERTY, by James Egbert, A. B. Mr. Egbert has made a very valuable contribution to the literature of our Centennial year. Manifestly few people have the time or inclination to go through the voluminous writings of Alexander Campbell, even if they were accessible. The volumes of the Christian Baptist and Millenial Harbinger are not easily obtained, even if one had time to read them. An anthology of Mr. Campbell's writings from these periodicals would be interesting, but even this would take a good deal of space. Mr. Egbert has rendered a more valuable service by selecting those writings of the great reformer which bear particularly upon the problems that are now uppermost in the minds of religious thinkers. The eight chapters of this book are devoted to such themes as "Liberty and Progress," "The Limits of Knowledge and the Freedom to Think," "Appreciation of Great Personalities," "A New Voice in Protestantism," "Liberty and the Bible," "Criticism," "New Versions," "Heresy" and other themes. In these chapters Mr. Egbert has not merely quoted from Alexander Campbell; he has done more than this. By the side of the quotations he has used he has put such interpretations as help one to understand the setting and significance of what is presented. At the same time the book gives admirable expression to the movement of the times in religious thought and the opinions of some of the great teachers and leaders upon the subjects that Alexander Campbell discussed. No one can read this book without a juster appreciation of Mr. Campbell's independence, fearlessness and growth in appreciation of new truths and emerging facts in the Christian world. A brief introduction is contributed by J. H. Garrison, W. T. Moore and F. W. Allen. (St. Louis, Christian Publishing Co. 1909. Pp. 338. $1.50.)

HELEN E. MOSES, edited by Jasper T. Moses. No woman has made deeper impress upon the churches of the Disciples and especially the womanhood of the churches than Mrs. Helen E. Moses. Called from a comparatively obscure life to the leadership of the hosts of missionary workers in this great company of people, she displayed qualities of leadership in an unusual degree. Her death was felt as a most serious loss by all who were at all acquainted with her personality and services. Her son, Mr. Jasper T. Moses, has done well to gather some memorials of her life into this small volume. It would have been more satisfying to her friends if the volume had been such a biography of his mother as Mr. Moses could so well have prepared. The few pages in the book devoted to this theme only give a rapid and partial survey of the career that would have proved an inspiration to great numbers of readers. We hope that Mr. Moses will still regard this as a debt he owes not only to his mother but to the Disciples. The lives of men and women who have done notable work in the kingdom of God are not too numerous, and every one of them is an inspiration to its readers. The present volume is made up, in addition to the biographical sketch by Mr. Moses, of an introductory statement by A. McLean, an appreciation of Mrs. Moses by A. B. Philputt, a note on the power of a consecrated life by J. H. Garrison, and a memorial tribute by W. J. Wright. These items occupy the first seventy-five pages. The remainder of the book is devoted to missionary addresses and editorials by Mrs. Moses, which extend from pp. 79 to 169; and the last twenty pages are devoted to poetical selections of Mrs. Moses' composition. These personal utterances reveal something of the woman, but not by any means all that her friends would like to know regarding her. (New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. pp. 192. $1.00 net.)

Biblical

STUDIES IN GALILEE, by Ernest W. Gurney Masterman. Dr. Masterman, who is at the head of the hospital and mission conducted by the Church of England for the Jews of Palestine, resides at Safid, near the Sea of Galilee, in Palestine admirable opportunity of studying its natural features. For years, while he lived in Jerusalem, he made regular observations of the Dead Sea, with important results to the scientific knowledge of that section of Palestine. During recent months he has contributed a series of articles to the Biblical World on the different sections of Galilee. The present volume contains seven chapters dealing with the physical boundaries and chief towns of Upper and Lower Galilee and the Jordan region, the inland fisheries of Galilee, Gennesaret, Capernaum, Chorazin, and Bethsaida, the ancient synagogues and Galilee in the time of Christ. Those who are at all familiar with Dr. Masterman's writing will welcome this compact arrangement of these valuable statements. The material is profusely illustrated with maps, diagrams and photographs. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. pp. 141. $1.00, net.)

ON THIS ROCK, by H. Grattan Guinness, D. D. The author of this book, who has written previously on prophecy with the strong bent of millenarianism, attempts in the present volume first to contrast Christianity with philosophy to the discredit of the latter, and then to point out some of the proofs of the divine character of our faith by a review of the ministry of Jesus and a treatment of the apocalyptic materials which have served other writers of the same school in the elaboration of schemes of "times and seasons." This treatment of the gospel in discrediting contrast with the work of great secular thinkers, and of the Bible as a work of predictions concerning the times of the end, has now largely ceased to have significance for the better informed class of biblical students. It is time wasted to go laboriously through historical records for the purpose of finding the fulfillment of the apocalyptic utterances of Daniel and the Revelation. (New York, Fleming H. Revell. 1909. 227 pp. $1.00, net.)

THE HISTORIC EXODUS. by Olaf A. Toffteen. Mr. Toffteen is connected with the Western Theological Seminary in Chicago. A considerable fund placed at the disposal of that institution by benevolent friends enabled the writer of this volume to gather a large Semitic library and to publish through the University of Chicago Press this volume and one which preceded it on "Ancient Chronology." The method of the book is not very satisfactory and its materials are far from reliable as scientific statements of the case. But a large amount of work has been devoted to the two volumes which have thus far appeared and which are understood to be portions of a series projected by the same author. (The University of Chicago Press. pp. 306. $2.50 net.)

OLD TESTAMENT NARRATIVES, by George Henry Nettleton. How often have parents and teachers felt the need of the narratives of the lives of the Old Testament characters put in a form to be read by the youth. It is this need that Mr. Nettleton supplies in "Old Testament Narratives." The narratives are of the men of the Old Testament times. These men were heroes, and the stories of their lives are of greatest interest and value to young people just entering the period of adolescence. (Henry Holt & Company, New York.)

GENESIS, by Hinckley G. Mitchell. This is the third volume in the new series of biblical commentaries edited by Shailer Mathews under the general title, "The Bible for Home and School." It seems to be fully the equal of the two admirable volumes already published, the one on Acts by Professor Gilbert, and the one on Hebrews by Professor Goodspeed. There is an introduction, brief but satisfactory for the average reader, giving the sources of the book of Genesis and its analysis, with a general bibliography of the subject. This commentary does not profess to equal the splendid work by Professor Driver in the Westminster series, but readers who have been accustomed to depend upon the Cambridge Bible for schools and colleges will welcome this much more adequate and timely contribution to the understanding of the first book of the Bible. (New York: The Macmillan Co. Pp. 373. $.90 net.)

TARBELL'S TEACHERS' GUIDE to the International Sunday School Lessons for 1910, by Martha Tarbell. With an increasing number of Sunday-school teachers who use the International Lessons, the Tarbell Teachers' Guide has become indispensable. Its material is not always satisfactory, but the wealth of comment furnished gives opportunity for such selection as any wise teacher is sure to make. The lessons of 1910 are all found in the Gospel of Matthew, and the first section of the work is devoted to some consideration of that Gospel and the methods by which it can be taught most adequately. (New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. Pp. 475. $1 net.)

ARNOLD'S PRACTICAL SUNDAYSCHOOL COMMENTARY on the International Lessons, 1910. Edited by David S. Warner and William B. Olmstead. This is a lesson commentary of the older type, closely printed and chiefly to be commended for its cheapness. (New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. Pp. 233. $.50 net.)

THE GIST OF THE LESSON, by R. A. Torrey. A vest pocket memorandum of the lessons for 1910, uniform with the previous volumes by the same author. Dogmatic and usually unreliable in matters of history and interpretation, but convenient as giving in pocket form the (unrevised) text of the lessons. (New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. Pp. 160. $.25 net.)

Doctrine and Life

RELIGION AND MIRACLE, by George A. Gordon. "When a teacher and preacher of the Christian religion moves from the circumference toward the heart of faith, miracles fall out of the sphere of his vision." In these words, which give the clew to the entire book, the pastor of the Old South Church in Boston open this volume. Dr. Gordon is one of the most eminent preachers and thinkers in the Congregational Church of America. In this course of five lectures delivered before the Yale Divinity School he registers his definite belief on the theme of the miraculous in the words, "More and more the view prevails among educated people that miracles are no part of genuine history." He then asks the question, "How much will thus be lost to faith? How much will survive the storm and abide?" His five chapters are devoted to the following topics, The Issue Defined, Belief in God and Miracle, Jesus Christ and Miracle, The Christian Life and Miracle, and An Eternal Gospel. However one may differ from Dr. Gordon's point of view, the sincerity and earnestness of the discussion are instantly apparent. He is not minded to make any assault upon the miracles; he merely notes the fact that less and less are they significant for modern thinking. They are no longer aids to faith, but rather the burden which faith must carry. If this be true, what effect is the changing attitude of the thoughtful world toward miracle to have upon Christian faith in general? He believes the effect will be to disengage the fundamental elements of Christianity from the secondary and adventitious helps upon which too much reliance has been placed by a half-intelligent type of apologetic. The consciousness of God in the Bible nowhere depends upon miracle. The redemptive work of Christ is independent of miracle. The apostolic ministries proceeded with the slightest stress upon the miraculous. If miracles really happened in the days of Jesus and the apostles, they were the least important events of early Christianity. If they did not happen, the sooner the church ceases to thrust them forward as objects of belief the better it will be. The eternal gospel of the grace of God asks nothing of miracle. It must be understood in terms which are level to the comprehension of every man and woman today, and in its ability to meet this test lies its supreme efficacy. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Pp. 236. $1.30 net.)

THE GLORIOUS COMPANY OF THE APOSTLES, by Rev. J. D. Jones, M. A., B. D., is a study of the men who formed the apostolic school. It is a keen, discriminating examination of man's need through the typical needs and characteristics of the disciples, with a telling account as to how Christ fits into the folds of every soul and lifts it to its richest promise and fullest expression of power. (George H. Doran Co., New York. Pp. $2.58. $0.75 net.)

Mr. Jones, of Bournemouth, is among Great Britain's most influential preachers. He is the distinguished present chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. Felicitous in speech, artless in style, with a mind for important things and a heart glowing with evangelical fervor, his messages possess a distinctive charm, and effectually dispense the grace of God. Through the George H. Doran Company he has published three handy volumes of sermons. Each volume is packed with nutriments and ferments of the gospel. The laymen will read them and rejoice, and the preacher will find in them veins of rich promise. Here are the titles of the other two with a word on each.

THE MODEL PRAYER, by Rev J. D. Jones, consists of nine expository sermons on the Lord's prayer. It puts this "Pearl of Prayers" upon our lips with freshness and gives our minds a new hold upon the place of prayer in man's life and God's world. (George H. Doran Co., New York. Pp. 174. $0.75 net.)

THE GOSPEL OF GRACE, by Rev. J. D. Jones, is somwhat larger than either of the preceding volumes. It contains seventeen sermons on profound and living themes. Take these as samples: "The Optimism of Jesus"; "The Lion and the Lamb in the Cross"; "The Easter Triumph." In tone and treatment this book sustains the same lofty elevation of spiritual vision as the others. The same healing, life-giving currents course through it. Reading it you feel in touch with a thoroughly Christianized mind whose soul is kindled to the point of glowing with the affectional virtues of God's all-redeeming love. (New York: George H. Doran Co.; Pp. 281. $1.25 net.)

THE HIGH CALLING, by J. H. Jowett, M. A. Many American ministers and Bible students are coming to regard each successive utterance of Mr. Jowett, the successor of Dr. Dale at Carr's Lane, Birmingham, with increasing satisfaction. It is not too much to say that he is among the most noted preachers in England today, and many put him at the head of the list. He has published a number of sermon volumes in the past few years, but none that, in directness and interpretative value, surpasses the present one. In this book some forty chapters are devoted to the successive themes of Paul's epistles to the Philippians. Mr. Jowett has drunk deeply at the fountain of this great utterance, and has poured out a wealth of his thought in this work. Fleming H. Revell. 1909. $1.25.

C. W. B. M. Day

FIRST SUNDAY IN DECEMBER OR SOME SUNDAY DURING THE MONTH.

Every Woman's Missionary Society is praying and working for the C. W. B. M. Day offering. Envelopes have been distributed to the various churches. One of the suggestive programs sent out from headquarters is "A Day with the Executive Committee." This is an exact picture of the problems presented to the board and the business methods used in considering and disposing of these questions and is an appeal for an enlarged offering. Many societies not provided with a speaker will use this. Others will use it at a midweek meeting, preparatory for the Sunday service. Many pastors will give the missionary message, and this is greatly to be desired. All our national and state officers and field workers are engaged for these services for the entire month. Also all our missionaries who are on furlough are already engaged for full time. The response from the churches and the preparation that is being made indicates a deep-felt realization that to meet the obligations of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in the complete launching of the Centennial enterprises, and the maintaining of all our work, calls for courageous effort.

Never before were there so many appeals for appropriations for evangelistic work in the states and territories. The requests from India for increased appropriations, if answered, will require more than $8,000 aside from the sending out of a number of new missionaries. Four workers are enroute to India now, Mr. and Mrs. Ghormley, Miss Ennis and Miss Vance. Mrs. Maria Reynolds Ford and Miss Zona Smith will sail for South America the middle of December. A new orphanage must be built in Porto Rico, also a mission home. Several new buildings are needed in India and must be constructed this year, if possible. Jamaica must have some new buildings, also Mexico. Fifty-nine schools, in different parts of the world, are now supported by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. The missionary training school, to be opened this fall, will make sixty. Our field is the world. In the homeland and in eight lands abroad work is being maintained.

The C. W. B. M. Day Offering will apply to the following list of pledges by states, and each state will seek to reach the amount. Failure is not to be in the vocabulary of any church this first year of the new century.

Church Extension Receipts.

Comparative Statement of Receipts for October, 1908, and October, 1909.

	Churches	Individuals
1908	$ 4,750.61	$ 3,278.10
1909	2,977.98	12,580.98
Loss	$ 1,772.63	Gain, $ 9,302.88
Total Gain		$7,530.25

There is a total gain in receipts over October, 1908, of $7,530.25. The churches have fallen behind $1,772.63, and there have been hundred churches that agreed to take the offering have not yet sent in their remittances. Let all the churches that have not contributed their Centennial Offering to Church Extension remit as soon as possible to G. W. Muckley Corresponding Secretary, 500 Water Works Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Annuities.

During the month of October two annuity gifts have been received: one of $250 from a friend in Iowa, and another of $12,000 from a friend in Oklahoma. Applications for aid are coming in from all over the country, so the interest in building churches has not abated. Quite a number of these cases would be glad to accept annuity money at six per cent, and we trust annuity gifts may continue to pour in as well as other individual gifts and offerings from the churches. We must not let our interest abate in this first year of our new century. Remember that the board pays six per cent on annuities. For further information write to G. W. Muckley, Corresponding Secretary, 500 Water Works Building, Kansas City, Mo.

HOME AND THE CHILDREN

New Books For Children

THE CHRISTMAS CHILD, by Hesba Stretton; a beautiful story of the Christmas-tide, among the simple and stern folk of Wales. The story presents four characters of the type to be found among the tillers of Wales. "Aunt Priscilla, a spare, hard featured woman, with weather-stained face, and hands as horny as a man's with farm work." But she is a capable woman, and resourceful as a man in managing the farm. Then there is the servant "Old Nathan," a white headed strong old man, nearly seventy years of age, but still "able to do a fair days work." Lastly, there are two nieces, little Joan, and Rhoda, aged eighteen, "than whom there is not a prettier girl in the parish." But Rhoda is wilful. Disregarding the warning of her spinster Aunt, she runs away and marries a ne'er-do-well, who later deserts her. With the marriage of Rhoda, her aunt closes the door upon her and tries to shut her niece out of her life forever. But reconciliation is brought about throught a discovery made by little Joan, on one of her annual visits to the stable to see if the legend of the Christ-child might not still be true. The lesson of the story is that of all Christmases, "Peace on earth, good will to men." (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York; fifty cents net.)

WAGNER'S WALKUERE, as retold by Oliver Huckel. Lovers of Wagner are under many obligations to Mr. Huckel for his earlier rendering of four of the music poems of the great German singer into excellent metrical English. The dramas included in that list are Parsifal, Lohengrin, Tannhauser and Rheingold. These handsomely illustrated little books bring the great epics of Wagner, minus of course, their weird and haunting music, to the hand and heart of the ordinary reader. Each of the volumes is supplied with an introduction dealing adequately with the sources and structure of the poem. Not only those who hear Wagner's operas and wish the text for study, but those also who have not that privilege, but wish to know something of the great musician's work will appreciate the book, for Wagner was a poet of almost as commanding gifts as he was as a musician. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. Pp. 95. $.75 net.)

"THE WHITE PUPPY BOOK" and "THE BLACK PUPPY BOOK," are the titles of two books for children by Cecil Aldin. The former is a small dog's diary for a day. In the latter a little black puppy introduces the reader to a number of his friends and some of his neighbors who are not so friendly. Both will quickly appeal to children, for they are very life-like representations of their dog friends, and the simple, rhyming stories are easily within the grasp of very young minds. The illustrations and the neat, artistic bindings are especially to be commended. (New York: Hodder & Stoughton.)

THE BAR B BOYS, by Edwin L. Sabin. This is a stirring story of western cowboy life. The hero is a young fellow who goes west for his health, falls in with a group of cow punchers and meets many thrilling adventures in the life of the ranch "Bar B." It is illustrated. THE LAND OF NOD, by J. Walter McSpadden. This capital book of juvenile nonsense, illustrated in colors by Edward L. Chase, begins with the story of the Sand Man and goes on through a series of interesting adventures in which there is a procession of Letters, a journey to the capital of Nod, the King's review, a Welsh rabbit who asks questions, a story by Santa Claus, and a battle in which many of the children's familiar friends of story-land have their places. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. Pp. 137. $1.50 net.)

DOROTHY BROOKS' SCHOOLDAYS, by Frances Campbell Sparhawk. The writer of this volume is already known as a successful writer of juvenile stories, as her "Life of Lincoln for Boys" proves. The present volume is a narrative of school-girl days, sure to prove of interest to girls and boys. It is handsomely illustrated and just the kind of book to give a girl for leisure reading. GREAT OPERAS TOLD FOR CHILDREN, by John Pendergast. The author tells for children the story of three of the greatest and most popular operas—Faust, Aida, and Lohengrin. These legends are as interesting to the child as fairy tales, and besides form an important part of every child's education. The work of education it is often said is to put the youth into possession of the cultured treasures of the race. If this be true, it is a great educational service one performs, who takes these great rich stories, so much cherished by the race and places them where children can appropriate them. The book is beautifully illustarted in colors and attractively bound—a fine Christmas present for the young. (Frederick A. Stokes & Company. $1.50, net.)

The Spirit of the Gift

'Tis not the weight of jewel or plate,
Or the fondle of silk and fur;
'Tis the spirit in which the gift is rich
As the gifts of the wise ones were;
And we are not told whose gift was gold,
Or whose was the gift of myrrh.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER I.
Changes.

The windows were open and the May sunshine flooded Robert Brainard's office. The twitter of the companionable martins in the cornice outside, could be heard. There was a cheerful stir in the street, and the wind brought the fragrance of apple blossoms from the orchards on the outskirts of the town. He looked at the woman who received his ultimatum with a composure as perfect as his own, with a keen sympathy that he was careful not to betray.

"And you think there's no other way?" she asked, bravely keeping back the tears that would have blinded her had she yielded for a moment to her emotion.

"None. I have thought it over carefully. My sister and I will take the house if you will persuade your mother—"

"I must:" she interjected decisively.

"—And while she would rebel at the thought of another tenant, she might not object to me, and it may be that, by nursing the estate, the income can be increased and you can live again in your old home."

Eleanor Crofton bit her lip. After a moment she said: "I shall not delude myself with any such hope, but accept whatever comes. I can make the Wakefield house comfortable, and my mother may become resigned You have done the best that could be done. I know well, and I cannot tell you how grateful I am:—Good bye!" She extended her slender hand, which Brainard grasped and held for an instant.

The door closed behind her, and he listened to her light foot step descending the stair till it was lost in the stir of the pavement below.

Robert Brainard could scarcely remember the time when he had not loved Eleanor Crofton. As a lad, struggling with bitter poverty, and later, when he had reached manhood, burdened with the support of his mother and sister, he dreamed of her as something remote and inaccessible. A wide social chasm had separated them; the Croftons being the important people of Carlinville, while his own family was poor and obscure. The little Indiana town had been one of those oases in the western wilderness amongst whose early settlers were many who brought with them into exile refinement and genuine love of culture that set the community apart from neighboring towns. A struggling college was founded by men educated in the older institutions in the East,—gentle God-fearing men,—who were missionaries amongst the rude frontiersmen with whom they cast in their lot.

Here Eleanor Crofton was born and grew up in comparative seclusion; for she was educated at home except for a year or two at boarding school for special instruction.

At the beginning of the Civil war her father had been among the first to enlist and was a brave soldier who reached high promotion; but at its close he was never again able to busy himself in the simple affairs that had once employed and contended him. He had little faculty for business, and after his death the two women sat down in their desolate home with only the scanty remnants of a fortune between them, the elder the more helpless and ignorant of the two.

"Yes," Eleanor soliloquised as she paused at her own gate, "nothing else could be done!—Robert—Judge Brainard is right. Mother may rebel at first, but she must submit. I can manage it I suppose." and she sighed as if in anticipation of the hard task before her. "The half of the house in Wakefield will be enough for us. We must make it do! The Johnsons are good decent people. They can keep their half, for we shall need the rent from that, too.

Her glance swept the pleasant old place where she had been born, and where her father had died. The house which stood upon the outskirts of the town was a two-story structure with galleries above and below, connected by a wing at either end. A sweep of grassy lawn was cleft by the graveled drive. To the east stretched the fertile fields, planted in corn, and to the west was a deep ravine with tall forest trees rooted in its steep banks, while below, in a tangle of ferns and wild touch-me-nots, a brook, fed by a never-failing spring, fretted and complained among the mossy stones. Near the house were a half a dozen gnarled old apple trees, still famous for their fruit, which now were a mass of pale blossoms.

"My home—my dear home!" she murmured with poignant bitterness. "To be given over to strangers to whom all your associations are nothing. It would have been better a thousand times never to have been born at all, than to have all this only to lose it!"

She speedily recovered her self-control and hurried into the house to get the impending ordeal over. She knew she must contend with repining and reproaches, even bitter opposition; but she could not yield. All her life Mrs. Crofton had been a selfish wilful, indulged woman. And Eleanor knew well that there is nothing so hard to combat as the obstinacy of the outwardly polite and amiable which resits all opposition. Yet she could sympathise with her mother for resisting the uprooting, and transplanting to uncongenial surroundings.

When luncheon was over and Mrs. Crofton had had her nap Eleanor introduced the painful subject:

"Mother, dear," she began, without evasion. "I went to see Judge Brainard this morning. I have bad news."

"Bad news?" and the blue eyes were turned upon her wonderingly.

"Yes; you know the times are hard everywhere."

"I don't see how that concerns us," Mrs. Crofton replied indifferently, picking up the knitting which showed her delicate white hands to such an advantage, that she had dropped at Eleanor's remark.

"It does though, and very vitally. Things have gone wrong with us, too!" She would not explain that investments against which she had vainly warned her mother had proved worthless. "We must retrench. I have talked it over with Judge Brainard and he suggests that we rent this place and live in half the house at Wakefield."

"What!" interrupted Mrs. Crofton angrily. "Give up my home—and live in Wakefield! How dare he—"

"There is no other way—"

"I'll not hear of it—"

"We have no choice!" persisted Eleanor firmly. "Judge Brainard says that he will take this house, and you know there's no better housekeeper than Miss Abigail. She will care for everything as if it were her own"

"Now I understand why he advises it!

"Mother, such suspicion is unworthy."

Mrs. Crofton whimpered weakly for a few moments, Eleanor soothed her gently and at last brought her to a realization that Judge Brainard's advice was really disinterested.

Eleanor shared her father's confidence in Brainard, who had named him executor of his will and, in a manner, confided the oversight of the wife and daughter to him.

By the end of a fortnight the removal was accomplished with much grief and trouble. Mrs. Crofton discovered many relics she could not surrender,—little luxuries quite useless in the new home. But Eleanor had not the heart to refuse her as this indulgence reconciled her in some degree to the greater loss of their old home.

By the end of May they were settled in the house in Wakefield, a prosperous suburb of Carlinville. Ann, their faithful servant had followed them, for when Eleanor attempted to explain that they were no longer able to pay her wages, she said reproachfully:

"I've not lived with you all these years to have you turn me out now. It isn't wages I'm thinking of. I have my savings, the little I need, and I won't leave; what other place would be home to me, me that's been with you since you's born,—You can't turn me off I'll go too."

Eleanor found the Johnsons who lived in the other half of the house the best and kindest of neighbors. Alonzo, the husband, was the engineer of the Wire Fence Works around which had grown up the pretty prosperous suburb of Wakefield. Susan, his wife, was thrifty and industrious, attending strictly to her own affairs; devoted to her stolid, faithful partner and to their two children. They had been saving carefully and hoped in the course of time to have a home of their own; the lot was already selected and "payments" begun on it, and to the erection of a house upon it all the circumstances of their humble lives were ordered.

Eleanor accepted her changed surroundings resignedly. Mrs. Crofton still fretted, but less persistently. Eleanor and Ann repapered and repainted the rooms. The fence was mended, a new walk laid and soon there was the beginning of a trim lawn.

One lovely May morning, Eleanor, who had already paid her mother a visit in her room which she set to rights, opened the window to let in the sunshine, went into the kitchen to prepare the breakfast tray which she would presently carry to her. The egg was delicately cooked, the thin, brown slices of toast invitingly arranged upon a fragile plate with the coffee pot of antique silver and the tiny cup of thick cream. Her task in the kitchen finished, Eleanor mounted the stair. She rapped softly at her mother's door and was languidly bidden to enter. The little table was drawn up beside the sofa, and Mrs. Crofton, a strict formalist, had been fortifying herself for possible vicissitudes—confronting the breakfast tray, and lesser trials that might follow—by reading the collect and gospel for the day. She eyed the tray dubiously:

"Eggs again this morning, Eleanor," she said: "you really must imagine that it's Lent."

"But mother, these are unusually nice. Mrs. Johnson just brought them in, warm from the nest."

"Mrs. Johnson seems to be the universal authority, nowadays," Mrs. Crofton replied dryly.

"If you could see her poultry, mother, you'd be delighted," Eleanor said cheerfully. Mrs. Crofton was not in the least interested, and her indifference was so plainly expressed that Eleanor was not encouraged to continue the subject.

"The light is blinding! Really, Eleanor, you have a mania for drawing the shades—" she turned fretfully toward the window disregarding the lovliness of the morning which to Eleanor was enchantment. The blind was lowered. Mrs. Crofton's long slender fingers, glittering with jeweled rings, not one of which could be sacrificed although they might be on the verge of poverty, were stretched to reach the coffee cup which Eleanor had carefully filled. She sipped it and sighed.

"I don't know what has come over Ann, she has certainly lost her knack of making coffee; this has a most unpleasant, earthy flavor."

"It's the coffee we've always used, mother, made as Ann always makes it."

"I may be allowed to express an opinion, I hope, Eleanor; Ann is failing; I should know, since she has been with me for thirty years."

Eleanor made no reply, she hated useless contention over trifles. But the beverage, whatever its imperfection, had the required effect; and presently, feeling the gentle simulant Mrs. Crofton became first resigned, and then, if not content, a little less dissatisfied.

"Ann will come for the tray. I've a hundred things to do, so I'll leave you, but call me if you want me," she said as she stooped to kiss her mother's faded cheek—an endearment which Mrs. Crofton received without emotion.

Mrs. Crofton was not an acknowledged invalid, "only delicate"; but upon this vague ground she demanded as much attention and pampering as any helpless convalescent; and without the personal attributes which might have entitled her to distinction she managed to make herself always the center of observation and attention. It was a deep-rooted vanity that had grown with her growth and strengthened with indulgence.

Thankful that she was so easily satisfied this morning, after the kiss which might have been bestowed on a wooden image for all the response it met, Eleanor, after a last glance around the room to assure herself that nothing was lacking, ran down stairs, put on her hat and thick gloves ready to attack the discouraging, weedy garden.

Susan Johnson in this, as in countless other things, was already her faithful ally. She and Eleanor understood each other with the freemasonry that exists between women, where there are mutual respect, confidence and sympathy.

Susan, on her part, without the faintest vestige of acknowledgment, was convinced that Eleanor was something too fine to be burdened by the sordid cares which were her own daily portion. She knew that there was a lack of money in the straitened household, and in many delicate and considerate ways she had arranged "to exchange work," giving Alonzo's and her own service where Eleanor's strength and experience were not equal to the demands made upon them.

Eleanor had agreed already to teach little Ned an hour a day. Susan had small opinion of "Kindergartens."

"Sendin' a child there to learn him to point East and West," she remarked scornfully, "and mix mud, and cut paper—things the stupidest young'n that ever lived knows 'thout bein' told, and has to be whipped to keep him from doin' it. H-u-h!"

Then Eldora was to have lessons on the cabinet-organ, which Susan herself had bought on the installment plan, before she was married. She had also arranged an exchange of sewing, Eleanor to do the fine hand-work, which Susan said was not intended "for paws" like hers that did well enough for washin' and ironin' and scrubbin'."

In accordance with this agreement, then, Alonzo had cut the mustard, which had grown luxuriantly, so that it no longer vexed Ann's eyes as she ruminated gloomily in the kitchen door. He had also prepared the borders and spaded the flower beds, and to these Eleanor was giving the finishing touches. She hoped by mid-summer to have the porch and staring windows veiled and softened with pink, purple and white morning glories. The ash heap should be removed and gay sun-flowers should supplant the rank "Jimson weed," and the blank board fence should be screened with sweet peas—all in good time.

Eleanor looked up at the weather-beaten house and said wistfully: "If I could only paint it, the place would be immensely improved. But doors and window-sills are very different—and I could not undertake the whole house."

"Well, mercy! I should think not!" It was Susan who interrupted Eleanor's soliloquy. She had come out into her own garden and paused bare-headed in the sunshine, sewing as she stood. It was one of her habits; she frequently followed Alonzo about sewing and talking as she did so, tongue and fingers working harmoniously together. She now watched Eleanor plant the seeds of portulacca, petunias, verbena, and phlox, marking each with a clean pine wedge on which she had written its name.

Susan's needle was poised in mid-air: "Dear me! Miss Eleanor. How handy you are. One'd think you'd done nothin' but garden all your life. You do it like you'd been born and brought up to it."

Eleanor laughed, glanced up at the red face beaming smilingly above her:

"Well, Susan, you are a born encourager, and that, I think, should be considered one of the fine arts. I'm sure that men and women spend years in other callings that are not half as much good to the race."

It was a bit of philosophising that was a little beyond Susan's comprehension, but anything Eleanor said was a matter of faith with her.

"I know a little, a very little, about flowers, and can make them grow, probably because I love them so. You know, over at the other house I had quantities," Eleanor continued.

"It takes a sight of work. Lon was up at four." There's so much to do about a place this time o' year that he begins at daylight.

"Lon feels so encouraged," Susan went on cheerfully, "seems as if for the first time in our lives we're beginnin' to git ahead. And land knows, it's time! We've both of us hustled. Nobody can ever say that I've set down and took it easy! And I'm sure Lon wasn't ever nothin' of a loafer!" She pulled her thread through with energy.

"I should say not, from what I've seen of you both," said Eleanor sympathetically.

"Eldory's jest doin' splendid in school. Her teacher says there ain't a better pupil in the grade; her reports come home every month nigh about perfect!" Susan's pride was touching. "We've only got a few more payments to make on the lot and then we can own our home. Lon 'lows to build as soon as he can. That's one good thing of workin' for a man like Dick Randall; he's not in it for all he can git out of it for himself; he thinks of other folks too. He started the Works to fill up his time, everybody knows he's got all he needs, but they're a godsend to the people 'round here."

Eleanor had known Dick Randall as a girl in a village may know a young man in her own set, but there had never been much intimacy between their families. Eleanor acknowledged the force of Susan's observation. From where she stood she could see the wide-spread roofs of the Works, some distance up the road. The cottages of the workmen were in "easy walking" distance; most of them new, with strips of grass in front, painted fences, and flourishing vegetable gardens in the rear. The foreign element had not as yet invaded Carlinville and many of Dick Randall's men had been his playmates and his chums at school, and a sturdy self-respect was apparent in his employes. "He don't put on no airs," they said of him. And he on his part never forgot that they were flesh and blood.

Strikes and lockouts were industrial cataclysms unknown in the history of the Carlinville Wire Fence Works. The men were treated justly, and had intelligence enough to realize it. They would have laughed in the face of the agitator who might have tried to convince them they were "downtrodden victims of industrial slavery." Here each man was a responsible human being, with the acknowledged rights of an individual, cringing and truckling to no one.

Ned, "the baby," now joined them in the garden, having missed his mother from her accustomed place at the sewing machine. Jody, his yellow cat, followed at his heels, his long tail waving gracefully, and a suspicion of milk on his whiskers.

Susan did not notice the cat. She caught sight of a fine pair of horses approaching, and heard the quick regular trot of their hoofs in the road. They came nearer, tossing their small proud heads, their silken coats shining, with manes and tails like threads of silk, their silver-mounted harness glittering in the sun. Her face fell and she exclaimed as they whirled by:

"There goes B. F. Mullins and that Billy of his'n. He's up to no good, I'll be bound."

The owner and driver of the team, a stout, red-faced man, with bristling gray beard and close-cropped gray hair, had lifted his hat somewhat ostentatiously to Eleanor, a salutation which did not include Susan. She took Ned by the hand and said: "I must go in and see about dinner." To her the sky seemed to have been suddenly overcast.

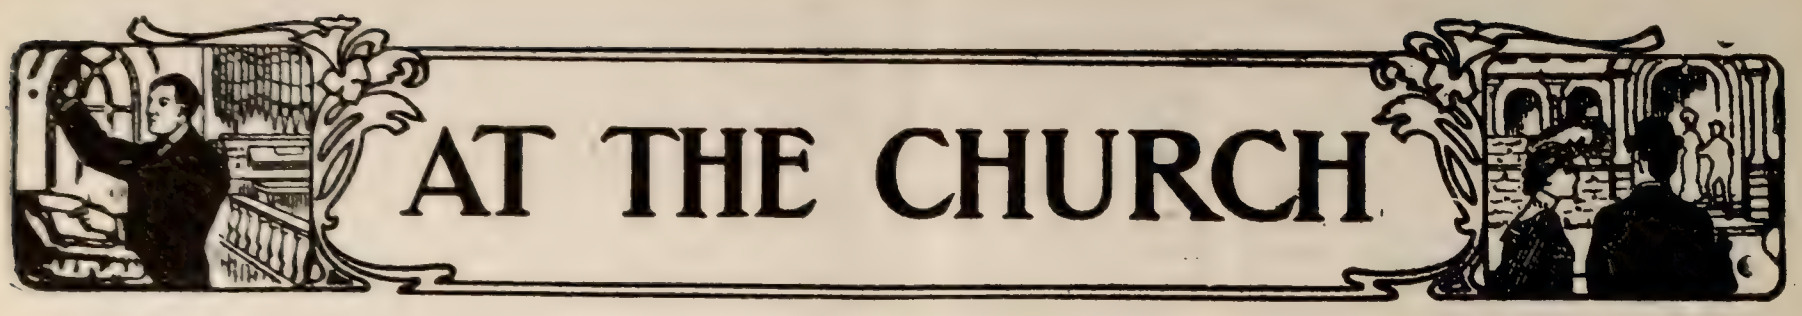
The Rock-a-By Lady



The Rock-a-by Lady from Hush-a-by Street
Comes stealing, comes creeping;
The poppies extend from her head to her feet;
And each hath a dream that is tiny and fleet;
She bringeth her poppies to you, my sweet,
When she findeth you sleeping.

There is one little dream of a beautiful drum,
Rub-a-dub it goeth;
There is one little dream of a big sugar-plum,
And lo! thick and fast the other dreams come
Of popguns that bang, and tin tops that hum,
And a trumpet that bloweth.

The dollies peep out of those wee, tiny dreams,
With laughter and singing;
And boats go a-floating on silvery streams,
And the stars peep-a-boo, with their own misty gleams,
And up, up and up, where the mother moon beams,
The fairies go winging.

Would you dream all these dreams, that are tiny and fleet,
They'll come to you sleeping.
So shut the two eyes that are weary, my sweet;
For the Rock-a-by Lady from Hush-a-by Street
Comes stealing, comes creeping.

Sunday School Lesson

The New Discovery *

Christianity came into a world which was largely given to the selfish arts of personal gratification. Emperors stripped provinces for the adornment of their palaces. Proconsuls swept into new regions with fire and sword, bearing home plunder that would have made a kingdom's ransom. Power, either military or civic, was used as the master-key to open the coffers of the world to the self-indulgent. Life in the Roman empire was for the rich a continued orgy, and for the poor a never-ending drudgery.

When Christianity came it changed all this so far as that growing company of its own confessors was concerned. For the first time men were awakened under its impulse to the necessity of thinking of others rather than of self. It was the astonishment of that hard pagan world to discover that there was a company of men and women in their midst who regarded service for others as their greatest happiness, even though they were laborers in the commonest tasks, and who shared with one another and even with men and women whom they had never known those modest competencies of theirs which others of the age would have hoarded for private satisfaction.

The Christian Weal s

This was the astonishing fact revealed by the conduct of the Jerusalem church. Almost from the beginning there had been a feeling on the part of these believers in Jerusalem that in the great joy of the newborn faith they could not count anything as merely personal property. Many of them had sold all their possessions and brought the proceeds to the feet of the apostles. Others disposed of part of their goods as occasion offered: and most of them felt that whenever there was need, no one would count his lands or properties as merely his own, but would generously bestow them upon the common cause. This beautiful spirit of generosity and comradeship has in a measure prevailed wherever Christianity has gone. Not that our religion has defined itself in terms of communistic experiment. Christianity is much larger than any financial program. But its ideal has been that wherever there was need, the spirit of generous and openhanded giving would prevail.

Paul's Interest in Jerusalem

The church in Jerusalem soon fell into troublous times. Persecution deprived many of its people of all their resources. They were driven away, imprisoned, some were even put to death. The result was that the Christian community in the Holy City was very soon brought to poverty. When Paul took up his wider missionary enterprise he was requested by the leaders of the Jerusalem church to lay on the hearts of the Gentile Christians in that wide world to which he carried the gospel, the story of their poorer Jewish brethren who were often in dire need. This he promised to do, and never did he omit that kindly ministry of helpfulness in his journeys about the Mediterranean. He had no missionary society to promote his own enterprise. He was compelled to depend upon the labors of his own hands and the chance assistance of Christians who often were as poor as he. But he never failed to remember the poor at Jerusalem and to take offerings on their behalf.

Paul's Method

Whenever he approached the moment of his return to Jerusalem he seems to have visited afresh, as far as occasion made possible, the churches in which he had recently labored; or he wrote them letters urging them to make generous contributions to the Jerusalem poor found. He further instructed them to choose from their own number a trustworthy representative who should journey with him to Jerusalem, bearing the offerings of the particular church. Paul was thus able to save himself from any suspicion of misappropriating the funds—a suspicion that was all too eagerly voiced and circulated by his opponents in the church. He never went up to Jerusalem without these offerings, which were taken by him to the leaders of the Christian community, the apostles, if they were there, and the elders, but chiefly to James, the Lord's brother.

The Examples in Macedonia

The epistle from which our lesson is taken is partly devoted to this very subject of offerings for Jerusalem. In it, as will be noticed, Paul uses the example of the churches in Macedonia, i. e. those at Thessalonica, Berea and Philippi, to stir up the Christians at Corinth to the same generous care for their less fortunate brethren in Judea. The characteristics of the Macedonian churches are pointed out with affectionate pride. They were none of them rich, Paul insisted, but even their deep poverty mingled with their joy made their gift a work of value and of love. Far beyond their power they gave, and this was because they were themselves the first gift they committed to God. Where a man gives himself wholly to God it is not difficult for him to bestow also a generous part of that competence with which God is daily blessing him.

Preparation for the Offering

Titus had been sent to the church in Corinth before Paul's arrival with the suggestion that he make such preparation for the offering as occasion offered; and to this Paul refers in his epistle. Now that he himself is coming to visit them, he wants them to be ready with such savings of money as will not shadow the collection he hopes to make with the danger of sudden miscarriage at the moment of his coming. That danger against which Paul tried to guard is the very danger that befalls all missionary and philanthropic offerings that are subjected to the mere routine of a calendar. The day may be observed, but if there has been no adequate preparation beforehand the people are but half prepared for the offering. And, more than this, unfavorable weather other intrusion of some other interest may almost totally defeat the important object in hand, and therefore the congregation goes through the year but partially represented in an enterprise which is really of great significance.

When Should Offerings be Made?

People who insist upon being apostolic in all things should learn the apostolic method of giving. Paul's method was to have his Christian brethren lay by week by week as their wages were paid them or their business allowed a sum that would accumulate until the moment of his arrival. Nothing would then be left to spasmodic giving, nor be endangered by any miscarriage of plans. This is the only proper and adequate way of receiving missionary offerings in any church. Every Lord's day in the year ought to be missionary Sunday. Every member of the church ought to have a pledge for the missionary fund, just as carefully made and enthusiastically observed as is the pledge for the current expenses of the church.

The Proper Proportion

When the churches arrive at their true status of generosity and absorption in the work of the kingdom of God, the offerings made for missions and philanthropies on the one side will stand to the local expenses of the church in the proportion of the total capital of any business to its running expenses. The local church is merely the means by which a definite group of Christians carry on the work of the kingdom of God throughout the world. A certain amount of their gifts naturally goes to the support of the local establishment, but this ought to be less by far than the outgo for the real purposes which have given the church its being. A missionary society that spends the most of its income in office and other expenses could not long justify its existence; nor can a church meet the wishes of the Master which lavishes upon itself most of its income and spends but a small part for the extension of the kingdom.

The Royal Rule

The joy and the grace of giving need fresh emphasis in all the churches. No minister should ever permit himself to speak of a "collection." The very name is repulsive and suggestive of that ungracious aspect of giving which is too frequently put foremost in all financial matters connected with our churches. The giving of money is an offering, and as much a part of the service of the church as the ancient sacrifices were of the temple ritual. When one has given first himself, then that which he possesses easily falls in due proportion into the treasury of God. Paul's words to the church in Corinth with other similar utterances are the classical enforcement of the law of generous and proportionate giving, never endangered by hazards and mischances of times and seasons, but made a consistent and commanding part of the worship.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

TOPIC, DECEMBER 1.

The Fourfold Expression of the Religious Life. Ps. 9:1, 2.

The psalmists knew how to worship God. They were not posing when they stood in the congregation of Israel to express their gratitude and their trust. God was real to them. How is it with us? Do we really worship when we go to the house of the Lord? Perhaps a serious study of the psalms would lead to an appreciation of the privilege of worship.

Give Thanks.

Thanksgiving is a matter of character and intelligence. The thankful man knows his indebtedness to others. He has character enough to understand when a benefit has come to him. The grumbler is immoral. He does not see things right and the total effect of his life is bad. He poisons whatever he touches. The thankful man is a real man. He does not apologize for the space he occupies and he does not envy others the blessings they receive. He so magnifies the good that comes to him that he does not often think of his misfortunes. Of course he knows that the world has in it sorrow and sin. These he does not ignore. But he thinks there is no sense in adding to the sin of the world and of his own life the sin of ingratitude. The grumbler, seeing many wrongs about him, thinks it is a virtue to be disagreeable and to shirk his duty on account of the sins of others and the pain he experiences.

Tell.

The religious heart tells of the marvelous works of the Lord. It is not content to let people find out for themselves what God has wrought. The religious man is the only person competent to interpret events. He sees men and things in their relation to the whole of experience. The lover of pleasure applies the test of pleasure to what he examines; the miser always raises the question of money; the politician considers the question of votes; the dogmatist inquires as to correctness of doctrinal statements; the ritualist turns his attention to forms of worship; the "moralist" has in mind a few duties which he thinks comprise the whole of life; but the religious man discovers the largest meaning of facts. He gives men reasons for not becoming panic stricken because the plans of a few earnest souls have miscarried and for being modest after winning a few battles. Genuine religion saves men from littleness in failure and in success. The worship of the church affords the religious heart the opportunity to set forth sound views of life. The world is filled with the noise of men and women who know just enough to cry out when something hurts them but not enough to discern the meaning of pain and pleasure.

Exult

"Such boastings as the Gentiles use" are not becoming to the religious heart. In fact, boasting of that sort cannot be joined to religion. The boaster attributes too much to himself. He exalts himself against other men and against God. The religious man exults in God. He is glad when justice is done and he does not wait to calculate the benefits to himself before he expresses his satisfaction. The overthrow of despotism in Turker or in China, the conversion of tribes on the Congo, the election of good men to office in a distant city, rejoice his heart, although he may be able to see no financial or social gain for himself. He desires good government, not party success, the conversion of the world to Christ, not the glorification of his section of the church.

Make Melody

"But music is pursued, not only as an alleviation of past toil, but also as providing recreation. And who can say whether, having this use, it may not also have a nobler one? In addition to this common pleasure, felt and shared in by all (for the pleasure given by music is natural, and therefore adapted to all ages and characters), may it not also have some influence over the character and the soul? It must have such an influence if characters are affected by it. And that they are so affected is proved by the power which the songs of Olympus and many others exercise; for beyond question they inspire enthusiasm and enthusiasm is an emotion of the ethical part of the soul." Thus the Greek philosopher reasoned about music. Only a degenerate church will neglect music.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

TOPIC FOR DECEMBER 5.

Life Lessons for Me from First John. I John 4:7-21.

The mutual love of Christians, might be a statement of our theme. Love, what is it? Everybody knows, but nobody can tell. No man has ever defined it. Yea, it beggars all description. Puny words cannot carry it. It bounds the universe. It dwells with the stars. From it springs all life, and by it life is maintained. By its grace trees and flowers bring their cheering message. It nestles in the throbbing breast of the song bird. It has a home even with the wild beasts. It has an abode in the islands of the sea. Yes, it graces alike the hovel and the mansion. It is everywhere.

Love is our god, for our "God is Love," and we must also have love if we would know him and be like him. Love is just, it insists on the right. It forbears, it suffers long, and is quick to forgive. It is tender and kind, meek and gentle, but it is unyielding and firm. It is unselfish in its attitude, it seeks to serve in every good way. It has no program, but it is present in every worthy undertaking. It seeks and inspires every thing in human life worthy of man.

Such is our God, and this we know through Jesus. In him does the Father reveal himself to us. His precepts, his rebukes to wrong, and his exaltation of right are known and honored. His sympathy for the sorrowing, his ministries to the needy and naked, his ever prompt service to those in distress, yea, his true love for all that is human in us—these are but expressions of the Father's attitude to us. In human eyes these very things constitute him "the way, the truth, and the life,"

> This is His divinity,
> This His universal plea;
> Here is One that loveth thee.

But we must love God. "He that loveth is begotten of God." But you say "I do this now." Doubtless you think so, but do you? We are all so quick to say that we feel under obligation for his kindly providence. Yes, we believe we love as he would have us love. We really enjoy the hour of public worship—the quiet, the praise, and the admonition. We think we sing with understanding the song of the great blind preacher:

> O, Love that will not let me go,
> I rest my weary soul in thee;
> I give thee back the life I owe;
> That in thine ocean-depths its flow,
> May richer, fuller be.

But beware of delusion. The surrender of George Matheson set forth in that stanza came only after travail of soul, and he who sings it from the heart must be able to drink the cup of disappointment to the bitter dregs. Loving God is vastly more than subscribing to correct doctrine, and attending the public worship which lifts us to the mountain tops where in the ecstasy of soul we are granted a glimpse of the Eternal. This in itself is little more than a psychic exercise—a sort of sacred lullaby which gives a most pleasing sensation.

How shall we know then when we love God? Our scriptures say, "If we love one another . . . his (God's) love is perfected in us," but it also says, "If a man say that I love God and hateth his brother, he is a liar." Every man who has grown from infancy to maturity, was forced, by the existing order of things, to pass through the period of childhood. In like manner must every man come to his love for God through his love for man. How great! If Jesus be our guide here—and he is—we must raise our protest wherever wrong is done, and wherever right prevails there must our approval fall. The sick and the helpless, the naked and the hungry, have claims upon us. And we need only to look about us to behold the unjust practices in industry and commerce, the frightful toil of life and limb in mine and factory, the exploitation of graft and greed in municipal affairs—it overwhelms us. But as lovers of men this is our imperative duty. The victims of these conditions are sufferers—brothers in distress. The man who closes his eyes and stops his ears to all this "hates" his brother man, and "lies" when he says he loves God. He is the friend to neither God nor man. He is as a publican and a sinner.

Our Brother

O Brother of the righteous will,
  O Brother full of grace,
What human glory is revealed
  Foreshadowed in thy face!

As once the homes of Galilee,
  It lighteth ours today:
And still to men it showeth clear
  The Life, the Truth, the Way.

Thou are the Way: for still, to know
  The Love that reigns above,
There is no other way than thine,—
  To live the life of love.

Thou art the Truth: alone on eyes
  Like thine the visions fall.
Blessed, with thee the pure in heart,
  Who see the God in all.

Thou art the Life: in thee we own
  The glory all may wear,
Who will, like thee, for truth and right
  But learn to do and dare.

O Brother of the righteous will,
  O Brother full of grace,
With deepening faith the sons of men
  Still gaze upon thy face!

Church Life

At the last meeting of the executive committee of the Foreign Society, Tilden Eldred and wife were appointed missionaries to the Philippine Islands. The growing work there demands an increased force.

The Colville, Wish., church closed a series of special services October 31, with A. A. Doak and Prof. Baird of Colfax, Wash., preaching and leading the music. The pastor, W. A. Diggins, and wife have done a fine work, and one item of the "general good accomplished" in the meeting was raising his salary $250. The church, organized nearly three years ago with some thirty members and now approaching 200, is the largest in town. Prof. Baird, although young in the work, made good as a soloist and chorus leader and promises well for a bright future. The impressive close of the meetings was the dedication of her young life to the foreign missionary field by Pearl Simpson, twenty years old, a daughter of an elder in the church. Miss Simpson, a high school senior, will attend Eugene Divinity College next year.

John G. Slayter has just closed a twenty-six days' meeting at the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., that resulted in sixty additions. "The success of this brief campaign can be better measured," says Pastor B. S. Ferrall, "when it is known that more than this number have been added to the church—largely by primary obedience—since the first of the year. Mr. Slayter is surely a manly man with a great message, and his presence has done the church and community immeasurable good. A stronger series of addresses were never delivered to this people. Among those to respond to his splendid appeals are some choice spirits as well as some whose decisions for the better life have demonstrated the marvelous power of the gospel to attract and save where all else fails. Brother Slayter is our type of an evangelist and while he has shown his ability as a settled minister in developing two or three great churches, we can but wish for his continuance in the evangelistic field."

The Columbia Place Christian Church of Indianapolis, whose building was dedicated October 31, is a splendid illustration of a work of faith. About a year ago four little girls who lived in this growing addition started a Sunday-school in one of their homes on Sunday afternoons. Several children attended, and the older people in a few weeks gave it their attention. They changed the meeting place to a vacant room in the rear end of a grocery building. Austin Hunter then pastor of the North Park Church, preached a few evenings on week nights for them and baptized sixteen persons. The little group craved a more desirable meeting place, and secured an option on a lot. They were organized into teams and raised the money to pay for it. J. L. Tyner, formerly superintendent of the North Park Sunday-school, took oversight of the work speaking for them each Sunday. The new building enterprise was undertaken. The cornerstone was laid August 8, by Austin Hunter and there were fourteen additions that night, ten by confession. The building was completed. It is a frame structure with basement under the entire building. It will seat 350 people. The entire property cost about $3,000 and enough money was raised to pay for it entirely and to purchase the adjoining lot. It was dedicated by L. L. Carpenter. It is in a good growing addition and is sixteen blocks away from any of our Indianapolis churches. It has about seventy-five members and will doubtless make a rapid growth.

N. S. Martz, an active member of the church at Tipton, Indiana, was elected mayor of that county seat town at the recent election.

In a recent sermon in the East End Church, Pittsburg, John R. Ewers made a strong suggestion for a Bethany College Social Settlement in Pittsburg. The idea was taken up by the newspapers and discussed.

J. N. Scholes, Newark, Ohio, has accepted a call to minister for the church at Bellaire, Ohio, after December 15. The Newark church will need a preacher after that date, but the Pulpit Supply Committee does not invite correspondence.

F. W. Collins, pastor at Garnett, Kans., reports that the Sunday-school there, of which L. F. Wildman is superintendent, has adopted a definite plan of grading. Nine persons have been added recently to the church fellowship, at regular services. In a service held at Coney, Kans., November 7, there were three confessions and baptisms.

J. W. Ross, pastor of the young church at Belen, New Mexico, writes about the difficulties and limitations of the work in that field. The town is new, and the Disciples are on the ground with the earliest comers. Twenty active persons constitute the membership with twenty-four in the C. E. Society and a Sunday-school attendance of about fifty. The infant church and earnest pastor have faith in God and believe that a valuable work will be done there.

H. M. Brooks who canducted the funeral service of C. C. Boyer, at the Pleasant Hill Church, near Paris, Ill., sends us an interesting obituary notice of the aged pioneer preacher. Mr. Boyer was seventy-two years old at his death, the father of eight children all of whom with their mother survive him. He united with the Christian Church in 1857 in Kansas and not long afterward was ordained to the ministry. One of his sons, Thomas A. Boyer, is now pastor of the First Christian Church, Oakland, Cal.

W. H. Smith, who came from Yale University to the Fourth Church, Indianapolis, two years ago, has resigned his pastorate and will accept another church. Mr. Smith has labored under the most discouraging conditions in Indianapolis; a condition that many of the men in that city feel could be met only by a change in the location of the church. This move, it seemed, could not be made at the present time. Mr. Smith felt, therefore, that he should not remain. He has the respect and utmost confidence of ministers of our churches in Indianapolis.

C. A. MacDonald, lately pastor at McKee's Rocks, Pa., is now actively engaged in the new work of which mention was recently made in these columns. Mr. MacDonald is a Sunday-school evangelist, or, as he seems to prefer, an educational evangelist. He has been conducting a series of meetings with A. R. Slicer's church in Dixon, Ill., where his work was very fruitful. We regret that an announcement of an open space in his schedule came too late for last week's issue else some church in or near Chicago might have been able to secure him for the two weeks before he begins his western trip, December 3. In his unique work Mrs. MacDonald cooperates with him.

C. G. Kindred's tenth anniversary as minister for Englewood Church will be marked by a general social to be held in the church building on Tuesday evening, November 30. A formal program of speech-making and responses, with music interspersed, will precede the social features of the evening. The occasion will serve also as a "good-bye" to Elder and Mrs. L. L. Crim,—for two decades members of this church who will remove early next month to Oklahoma, their future home. A note from W. P. Keeler says that our Chicago preachers are especially invited to come and bring with them a delegation from their flock. It is hoped that every church may be represented.

In opening his work in El Paso, Texas, P. J. Rice prints in the church leaflet a fine statement of his conception of the place of the church in the community, and the significance of the pastoral relation. Three words, he says, stand in the foreground as they enter upon their new work: "Consecration, Coöperation and Continuance. Consecration to Christ and to the church; cooperation in every worthy enterprise on the part of every member, and continuance in the service to which we have laid our hands and committed our lives." Mr. Rice reports the El Paso church as one of signal influence in the city and the outlook good for a fruitful work.

F. M. Green, well known throughout Ohio as one of the older and most successful pastors of the state, has for some months been in failing health, and it is now announced that he has been compelled to give up all public address, and can use his voice in conversation only to a limited extent. Mr. Green is now more than seventy-three years old. As a youth he was fond of making public addresses, and because of his unusual ability in this direction was often pressed into service, both for school and church. Throughout his life Mr. Green has been a vigorous and progressive leader in the church, and in his declining years is surrounded by a great many friends drawn to him by his large public service.

James N. Lester of Denair, Cal., has accepted a call to the pastorate of Highland Street Church, Worcester, Mass. The vacancy was caused by the resignation of Austin P. Finley last July. The Highland Street Church extended a call to Mr. Lester about ten years ago, but at that time he was in ill health and was compelled to decline. He preached two sermons at the church last September, when on his way to the Centennial convention at Pittsburg. When Mr. Lester reached Pittsburg he found a call awaiting him from the Highland Street Church. He received his education at Eureka and Lake Forest, Ill., taking the degree of A. B. at the latter institution. His degree of A. M. came from Bethany College. He has held pastorates in Milford, Hoopeston and Waukegan, Ill., but has of late been residing in California, whither he went to regain his health. The new work in Worcester will begin about December 1.

Henry F. Keltch is closing his work at Tuscola, Ill.

W. L. Cowan of Albia, Ind., has accepted the work at Ludlow.

H. A. Morgan is now located in San Diego, where he succeeds Walter S. Martin.

The church at Muskogee, Okla., is building a $35,000 house, and is one of the most modern in the Southwest.

Oliver M. Olds of Oakland, Cal., preached at the Sunset Church, San Francisco, November 7, morning and evening.

Charles O. Lee of Burlington, Ind., is conducting a teacher training class with sixty-six members.

Petersburg, Ill., is greatly enjoying their new house of worship recently dedicated by F. M. Rains. B. H. Sealock is pastor.

Miss Lura V. Thompson, state organizer, requests all the preachers in Illinois to preach a C. W. B. M. sermon some time during December.

The First and Second churches in Milwaukee coöperate in issuing a weekly paper, The Messenger. Claire Waite and Eugene N. Duty are the respective pastors.

The church at Illiopolis, Ill., is being repaired and will soon have a good building. Robert Sickles is the pastor and will hold a meeting following the dedication.

Every loyal church will plan for the C. W. B. M. day, December 5, or some Sunday in December. This "Day" is a big day in those churches which have learned its value.

Robert Lord Cave preached at Alameda, Cal., last Lord's Day evening during the absence of the pastor, H. J. Loken, who is now in a meeting with the Centennial Church, San Francisco.

B. H. Hayden writes that the Sunday-school at London, Ontario, has doubled its attendance since September 1. One confession was reported for the service November 7.

Mrs. Princess Long, California's gifted singer, has been visiting her old home in Paris, Ky., since the Pittsburg convention. She will return to her home at Long Beach in the near future.

A. M. Lindsey closed a good meeting with Fred V. Loos at Smithville, Mo., with sixty-four additions. At Mr. Lindsey's church, Clinton, Mo., fifty-one persons have been added in the past two months.

J. R. Ewers, pastor of East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa., will deliver a series of lectures at Bethany College on social themes November 18 and 19. He will discuss "Tenement Houses" and "Social Settlements."

The union Christian Endeavor organization has set as its aim for 1910 "Fifty new societies, 2,500 new members and 100 new mission study classes." H. W. Hunter is the state superintendent to whom reports and inquiries should be sent.

The work in Nelsonville, Ohio, is going steadily forward. There were 124 men in the Berean Bible class last Sunday and 463 in the Bible-school. The Bible-school averaged for the summer months 95.5 per cent of the winter attendance. W. S. Cook is the energetic pastor.

W. H. Smith has just closed a successful work with the Fourth Church, Indianapolis, to which he came from Yale University two years ago. Mr. Smith is a cultured and efficient pastor. His friends and members of the church are grieved to have hi msever his relationship as pastor.

J. H. Fuller of Monterey, Mexico, sends a card with the simple announcement of the death of T. M. Westrup, November 15. This aged Christian missionary had reached his seventy-third year. The sympathy of the brotherhood goes out to the afflicted family.

The prospective union of the Baptist and Disciple church at Ladysmith, Wis., of which mention was made in these columns recently has become an established fact and R. E. Stevens of Georgia, has taken the responsibilities of pastor. May he and his people have guidance from the good spirit of Christ to weld and unify this Union church!

A. E. Dubber of Greeley, Colo., writes that he is prepared to conduct a bureau of pulpit supply. Ministers needing pulpits and churches in search of pastors will do well to correspond with Mr. Dubber as to their desires. A small fee of one dollar will be asked from each applicant—sufficient only to defray the expenses of the correspondence.

The resignation of I. N. McCash as pastor of the First Church, Berkeley, Cal., was presented to the congregation November 7. The resignation, reluctantly accepted, is to take effect December 15. Dr McCash expects to move his family to Cincinnati, Ohio, which will be their future home. He takes up his new duties as secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society January 1.

J. E. Bell, formerly pastor at Salinas, Cal., has accepted a call to Imperial and is now on the ground and at work. As was announced at the time, the church and parsonage at this place were recently destroyed by fire, the total loss above insurance being about $2,000. Since the fire the church has met in the auditorium, which has a seating capacity of 500.

Harry G. Hill of the Third Church, Indianapolis, is again answering many calls to address big men's meetings. He spoke before the colored Y. M. C. A. in his home city recently and will address a mass meeting at New Castle, Ind., November 22. He has been the first speaker at the latter place since the inauguration of the meetings.

The board of deacons of the Marshall Street Church, Richmond, Va., last week adopted a resolution unanimously endorsing and commending the work of their pastor, B. H. Melton. They also extended to Mr. Melton a call to remain as pastor of the church fo rthe remainder of his life! Mr. Melton has just begun his eighth year as pastor of this church.

Information from F. B. Sapp of Fargo, N. D. is to the effect that the Hon. Fountain L. Thompson of Condo, N. D., recently appointed United States senator by Gov. Burke, is a member of the Christian church. He is one of the wealthy men of the state, coming from Illinois a score of years ago and taking a homestead. "His appointment," Mr. Sapp says, " seems to please both republicans and democrats."

Last week was a historic week in the life of the church at Centerville, Iowa, of which J. H. Booth is minister. During the week an enthusiastic men s meeting was held and a local brotherhood organized. Thirty-six men signed the covenant cards and became members of the Brotherhood, And on last Sunday more than $600 was raised for home missions. This church supports two missionaries, Lewis Kopp, Fort Dodge, Iowa, and Mrs. R. D. McCoy, Drake College, Tokio, Japan.

We announced two weeks ago the resignation of J. M. Philputt from the Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, in order to make a long-desired trip to the Holy Land and Europe. Now comes word that the congregation unanimously adopted resolutions urging him to return to their pastorate after his trip abroad. But Dr. Philputt feels that he ought not to be away from a work for which he is responsible for so long a time as he intends to be away. Hence he insisted upon his resignation being accepted.

Frank L. Van Voorhis of Shawnee and Ben F. Hill of Okmulgee, Okla., are exchanging meetings. Mr. Hill is now at Shawnee, and they are having splendid meetings. Together they will begin at Okmulgee, November 29, with Mr. Van Voorhis doing the preaching. This is especially complimentary to Mr. Van Voorhis, as he was formerly pastor at this place. Mr. Hill and his son will enter the evangelistic field January 1.

The church at Vacaville, Cal., has decided to bulk the missionary offerings into one, to be divided between the various missionary interests of our churches. Sunday, March 14, was their annual missionary day. Dr. H. H. Guy was with them and delighted all by his two masterful addresses. The offering was over $220 in cash and pledges. The pastor, Frank E. Boren, believes this is larger than the aggregate of separate offerings would have been. He feels that the plan has worked well. With their C. W. B. M. offerings for the year, this will make about $300 for a church of 150 members.

The Christian Ministers' Association of Indianapolis, recently passed resolutions commending the wisdom of the proposed unification of all the organized interests under one or two boards, "and that we heartily endorse any effort for real unification and simplification of our organized interests." The resolutions were passed by unanimous vote with twenty-eight present and are signed by Charles M. Fillmore, president, and Clay Trusty, secretary. No doubt this progressive ministers' association points the way for one of the most urgent practical reforms in the brotherhood.

The graceful act of one of the closing services of the Centennial convention in starting a fund to pay the expenses of Secretary W. R. Warren on a trip through the Holy Land has been commended on all hands. Mr. Warren gave himself body and soul to the business of making a success of this great convention. His weariness was apparent to all who saw him at Pittsburg. Wallace Tharp who received the cash and pledges proffered there reports that he now has $554. It will require not less than $750 for Mr. Warren to make the tour. He should have $1,000. The words of Charles S. Medbury, president of the Centennial convention, printed elsewhere, will no doubt quicken many who were not there to send in their contributions.

T. J. Golightly, for two years pastor at Shenandoah, Iowa, has resigned. Some competent pastor will be greatly needed there to care for the harvest gathered in the meetings held by E. E. Violett which closed November 11. Mr. Golightly says the meetings had to close just when the interest was highest and the people were yielding. Twenty-two responded to the invitation. The pastor speaks as follows concerning the evangelist: "Mr. Violett did not preach even one weak sermon, they were all splendid utterances. He does not try to move men's emotions before he has convinced them of the righteousness and reasonableness of the gospel's claim. His indictment of sin was tremendous; his knowledge of the Scriptures is marvelous; he seems to be able to quote any passage at a moment's notice, he always reads his Scripture lesson from memory. Any true report of the meeting would seem to indicate that it was spectacular. It was not so in the least. Everything was forgotten but the message and the burning earnestness with which it was uttered. Mr. Dakin proved himself a splendid soloist and leader."

The R .A. Long Proposition and the Bible College of Missouri.

The generous proposition of Brother Long is before the brotherhood of our Missouri churches. Its magnanimity appeals to the dignity of a great people and provokes their hearty response. The greatness and the glory of such an enterprise will suffer no lagging. Surely, a people with the vision of the Kingdom of God and with the means at their command will arise in might to meet this proposition and assert their right to the glorious inheritance bequeathed through the grace of God. There should be no stint in the effort. The call spells unbounded opportunity. The day of greater achievements is before us. The King takes the initiative in giving his life on the cross. He compasses the world in his purpose. He bids us follow Him whithersoever He goeth. O, the inspiration, the thrill that comes of a mighty effort for him should make our present undertaking a supreme joy. Yea, and the faith we have in Him gives the assurance of certain victory.

Neosho, Mo. J. M. Hunley.

A STUDENT'S TESTIMONY.
What I Heard—and—What I Saw.

Four years ago I entered the University of Missouri. Before doing so these are some of the things I heard:

1. The University of Missouri is a "godless institution." Its teachings are misleading to the Christian and are encouraged to the non-believer. Its teachings should be shunned, or taken with antidotes.

2. The students of the University have no opportunity for instruction in a religious way. They get their secular education and go away without ever touching the great fields of religious thought; and, as a consequence, go to their callings with the religious side undeveloped.

When I came to Columbia these are some of the things I saw:

1. Just across the street from the University there was a beautiful stone building, erected to the memory of the Man of Galilee, and for the service of the state. It was the home of the Bible College of Missouri.

2. The site of this school had been chosen for three reasons: (a) The founders of this Bible College realized that the university is not the "godless institution" some of our earnest brethren believed, and that many of the best minds are coming to this university for instruction. They wished to know these young minds. (b) They realized that these young minds lost much, both for themselves and for the Cause in going out to their work without some opportunity to learn of the things best worth while. They wished to teach these young minds. (c) There was a small but increasing number of young men preparing for the service of God's church. They wished to give these the opportunity of studying under the best instructors the money of the state of Missouri can hire, and thereby leave the Bible College free to give its efforts to strictly theological work.

3. During these four years the work of the Bible College has not been in vain. (a) It has been a leavening and uplifting force in my own life. What I might have been without it I do not know. But this I do know: Instead of cutting loose in the cold sea of pure scholarship I have learned that I cannot go so far there that the spirit of God and His Son will be unable to guide, direct and inspire. (b) In proportion to its enrollment and length of life it has sent out more missionaries than any other school in our brotherhood. (c) It has lifted itself from a position of small notice to that of a powerful factor in the university and city life. Yearly its enrollment increases and its activities are more noticed. Yearly the Spirit of God working through it touches some phase of our state life in a new and telling way. Its Christ has shown Himself to be still the Christ of the multitude, of the rich and the poor, of the honored and the obscure. It is realizing the aim of its founders. It has proved that all people still desire to hear of the Man of Galilee, and that in close proximity to the university it can do a work our segregated schools can never do.

May the silent and beautiful front of its building ever continue to look down into the campus of Missouri's greatest school to inspire to high ideals, and to win to itself affection and gratitude.

These are some of the things I saw at Columbia. They inspire me to feel that this busy world of ours is in no danger of forgetting the Prince of Peace. Brethren, are these not good things to have seen, and to have experienced? Are they not worthy to continue? Then will you not take the word of one who is, and has been long on the ground; and lend your voices, your hands, and your means to their preservation and upbuilding.

E. E. Chiles,
Student at Columbia, Mo.

The above letters, one from a pastor, the other from a student in the Bible College, speak for themselves. They most forcibly present the opportunity that is now ours, and the great need for the increase in the endowment of the Bible College. Brethren the time is short. We have only about half of the $50,000 needed in order to secure the $50,000 offered by Brother Long. It cannot be that the brethren will see this effort fail. Let every church, every pastor and every individual feel the burden of responsibility and in faith and love give as the Lord has prospered him. G. D. Edwards.

Southern California

I have just returned from the twentieth annual Sunday-school convention of Southern California, at Riverside, where, a few years ago, President Roosevelt transplanted the parent navel orange tree in the courtyard of the famous Glenwood Hotel. In enthusiasm, fraternal spirit, excellence of program this convention was pronounced by national Sunday-school workers one of the most remarkable they ever attended. In teacher training, adult Bible classes, and those things that mean most in the modern Sunday-school movement, Southern California stands first of all the states according to the number of schools.

"Our people" have gone into this Sunday-school movement heart and soul. Our plea for union has here found itself in the realm of the Sunday-school. One-fourth of our pastors in Southern California were present. They constituted one-fifth of all the preachers present.

A Good Investment!

145 CHURCH BUILDINGS ERECTED WITH OUR ANNUITY FUND

THE ANNUITY PLAN

What It Is! How It Works!

In Our Church Extension Fund at Kansas City, Mo.

WHAT IT IS—Through our Annuity Plan you can administer upon your own estate by putting your money into our Church Extension Fund. This is far better than making a bequest, because the Board will pay you 6 per cent, in semi-annual payments, if you are fifty years old, or more, and the interest will be paid to your wife if she survives you. Between the ages of forty and forty-nine the rate is 5 per cent, and 4 per cent, between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-nine.

ITS GREAT ADVANTAGES TO YOU:

1. You can see your money work while you live.
2. You have no trouble or losses in making reinvestments.
3. You have no taxes nor attorney's fees to pay and your income is regular.
4. The Society is perpetual and is incorporated. Its funds are perpetual and are loaned only on first mortgages where titles are absolutely good.
5. Your money is safe because the Annuity Bond which the Board issues you is as good as a Government Bond because it is backed up by all of the assets of the Fund, which now amount to $650,000 and which will constantly increase.
6. We receive remittances of $1.000, or as many hundreds or thousands as you can send, and your money will be received at any time and the Bond will be dated so that your interest begins at once.

HOW YOUR MONEY WORKS—The Board does not invest your money in some secular enterprise and WAIT FOR YOU TO DIE before using it in the work of Church Extension. All of our Annuity money is loaned at 6 per cent to aid promising congregations to build. The money is returned by the churches using it in five equal, annual installments, and as fast as it returns it goes out again and again to build churches. Your money is thus in a PERPETUAL WHIRL OF DOING GOOD, because we have more demands for Annuity money than we can answer. Our mission churches in the new Southwest are glad to get Annuity money from the Board of Church Extension and pay 6 per cent, which is only 2 per cent more than is charged for the regular funds. They then have their loans in the hands of their friends.

Our Annuity Fund has received 260 gifts and $256,363, and 145 church buildings have been erected by Annuity Funds alone.

We can use $100,000 this year. Send remittances at once and give your full legal name and your age. Remit to

G. W. MUCKLEY, Cor. Sec., 500 WATER WORKS BLDG., KANSAS CITY, MO.

Our own C. C. Chapman, president of the convention, could not be present. R. P. Shepherd of Pomona presided in his stead. Brother Shepherd is also superintendent of teacher training and has large interdenominational classes in Pomona and Los Angeles. W. C. Pearce of Chicago, prince among Sunday-school men, was present and contributed greatly to the success of the program.

Among other of our workers on the program, specialists in different lines, were E. W. Thornton, Los Angeles, G. M. Anderson, Riverside; F. M. Rogers, Long Beach, and Dan Trundle, Rialto. None of these men thought of themselves, nor were they thought of as "Disciples" in any distinctive sense. In finest fraternal spirit they were there to serve. The Sunday-school is one of the open doors through which shall come that unity for which the Master prayed "that the world may believe." Coming close to the feet of Jesus in the study of his word we shall one day look up into his face and discover that we are one in him and he is one in us. Then, ceasing to wrangle and to vilify our brother, we shall carry the story of the Saviour's love to the whole creation.

The First Church of Long Beach has arranged with Mrs. Princess C. Long to become assistant pastor to F. M. Rogers. This will be a rare combination. Mrs. Long will assist E. N. Phillipps in a meeting at Oxnard in December. She will begin her new duties with the Long Beach church the first of the year, assisting the pastor in a meeting in January.

S. M. Martin is with A. C. Smither in a meeting at the First Church, Los Angeles. There were seven added the first day.

Sumner T. Martin is in a meeting with the El Centro Church.

On a recent Sunday Dan Trundle and the Rialto Church resolved to pay off their debt of $2,400—and did it.

"Echoes from Pittsburg" were brought to the last monthly preachers' meeting by A. C. Smither, R. P. Shepherd, L. J. McConnell, Grant K. Lewis, Mrs. W. R. Harper and Mrs. Princess C. Long.

The December preachers' meeting will be devoted in part to a farewell reception to Grant K. Lewis, as he will leave soon afterward for his new work in Cincinnati.

The Breeden-Gardner Meeting at Liberty, Mo.

H. O. Breeden and W. A. Gardner have just closed a meeting with the church here. Beginning the first Sunday after the Centennial convention and continuing until Sunday, November 14, they have led this church in one of the best meetings in its history. The meeting was conducted on a high plane. No sensational or questionable methods were used, no unworthy motives appealed to, but with singular power the gospel, in its vitality and strength, was presented in sermon and song. The numerical results were fifty-five additions to the congregation. The other results include a toning up of the entire life of the church, and the deepening of the hold of the Master on all who came under the influence of the meeting.

Dr. Breeden is so well and widely known that I feel it is unnecessary for me to write at any length as to his ability in presenting Christ to men. He is a master workman, one who, knowing and rightly using the Word of God, has no need to be ashamed. He seems to know the Word almost in its entirety, and all his readings from it are wholly from memory. His quiet, dignified style of preaching makes a powerful appeal to the minds and hearts of his hearers. With many others, I feel a regret that he is for a time leaving the evangelistic field for a return to the pastorate. He is filling a vacant place in our evangelism, and is badly needed.

W. A. Gardner, of Millersburg, Ky., who had charge of the music, is worthy of high praise. He is a devout Christian, humble, tractable, capable of doing many things well, and leads the music with dignity and effectiveness. His cornet solos are superb, and add much to the attractiveness of the music.

I wish to record my high appreciation of the service these two good men have rendered here, and to bear testimony that in every way their meeting has been a blessing to the church and to the community. I feel that from now on the Liberty Church will be able to do better work and more of it because of the inspiration of this meeting.

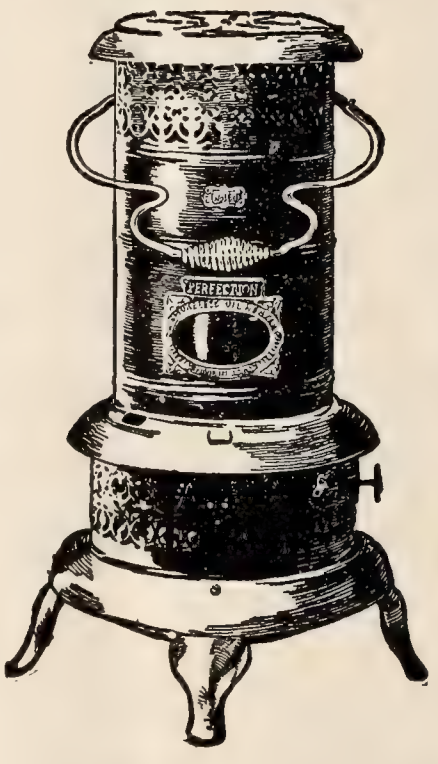
Six Years in Columbus, Ohio

Yesterday closed six years and six weeks work in Columbus. These have been years of toil and some victory. Our Bible-school has more than doubled in enrollment and attendance. Our C. W. B. M. has grown to be more than three times as large. Four hundred and eighteen were baptized into Christ and one thousand received into fellowship. enjoyed for our National conventions. It ness section gave way to one of the handsomest buildings in the land, the plant being well worth $60,000. I have sought to give our glorious plea a hearing and a standing it deserves in this beautiful capital of Ohio. God has richly blessed our labors together and I leave for Wichita Tuesday morning with the love and prayers of the whole church and community, for which I greatly rejoice.

Walter Scott Priest.

A Short Stop at Topeka

A dedicatory service at Manhattan, Kans., November 14, enabled me to spend a few hours in Topeka, nearby, where our next National Convention will be held. Already the wheels of preparation have begun to go round. The general committee has been organized. The Hon. J. W. Gowing, a leading member of the Christian Church, and a prominent business man in Topeka, has been elected chairman; Charles A. Finch, the pastor of our First Church, has been appointed secretary. A convention bureau with a well appointed office will be established soon after the holidays.



The splendid auditorium, which has already been secured for the sessions of the convention is equal to the best we have ever enjoyed for our National Conventions. It will accommodate four thousand. The location, the light, heating, ventilation, seating and the acoustics are all ideal. The large organ is an exceptional feature. The beautiful capitol building nearby will probably be used for general headquarters,—registration, postoffice, exhibits, etc. The senate chamber and the house of representatives can be admirably used by boards of managers and for other important meetings. A number of large church buildings, including our own, are close to the capitol.

The Commercial Club and the citizens generally are already taking a lively interest in the convention.

Topeka is on four of the leading transcontinental railways and enjoys a train service unequaled in the world. It is easy to reach Topeka, and it is a charming place to abide. It is without question one of the most delightful cities in all America.

the Sunflower capital in October, 1910! No doubt the attendance will reach 10,000 or more. This is the slogan of the Topeka brethren. They will make the convention well known. They are fully awake to the situation,—no question about that. Those who came in contact with Charles A. Finch and other alert representatives at Norfolk, New Orleans and Pittsburg do not have to be reminded of this.

W. R. Warren to the Holy Land.

One of the delightful incidents of our Pittsburgh fellowship was the proposal of Brother Tharp that a fund be raised to give our faithful Centennial secretary, W. R. Warren, a trip to the Holy Land. The unselfish pleasure of the Pittsburgh committeemen in this proposal was one of the fine things about it, but the very finest thing of all was the opening up of an opportunity by which a great host of us may express, in a telling way, our appreciation of Brother Warren's loving and tireless service. We owe this man of God so much. He not only labored hard but he kept things on a high level. Even if we could do so, we would not tear from the records of our people one communication he sent to the churches. Nor did he ever shame us in a single public utterance. Ruggedly true to distinctive things held precious among us, his representative ministry gave no offense anywhere but rather challenged thought. It is good to honor one so worthy and so faithful. We need to feel and voice deep gratitude even more than Brother Warren needs the rest our gifts will bring.

Education Day in Illinois.

Education day ought to be made the great day of the year in Illinois this missionary year. There are almost 800 churches with a membership of 100,000 in this state. The Disciples have but one college. They ought to demonstrate what could be done for the college with a popular free will offering. We are asking the churches for $6,000. I presume a great many churches will feel that this is a big amount, but it is an average of only six cents each for our membership in Illinois. Without doubt there are a great many who will not pay the six cents. This makes it necessary for others to be more liberal. We are going to give the churches the greatest opportunity they ever had. The preachers will be supplied with information on every point connected with our work. We are going into the campaign to win. A large education day offering is more necessary this year than ever. While we are busily engaged raising endowment, the danger is that we will neglect the necessary income to keep the college from becoming further involved in debt. These lines of course are written for Illinois Disciples, but if they shall inspire the members of the church in other states to do larger things for their schools, we will be more than gratified with the results. Let everybody prepare for Education Day, January 16, 1910.

DURING SLEEP
Nature Repairs the Human Engine.

The activities of the day cause more or less waste of tissues in the human engine, which is repaired at night during sleep.

The man or woman who can sleep well at night, is sure of the necessary repairs, other things being right, to make each day a time of usefulness and living a real joy.

But let insomnia get hold of you, and the struggle begins, of trying to work with a machine out of repair. A Nebr. woman's experience with coffee as a producer of insomnia is interesting. She says:

"I used to be a coffee drinker and was so nervous I could not sleep at night before about 12 o'clock, unless I would take some medicine. I was under the doctor's care for about 5 years and my weight got down to 82 lbs.

"The doctor said I would have to quit drinking coffee. Then my father got to me try Postum, which he said had done wonders for him. I am past 43 and before I quit drinking coffee, my heart would jump and flutter at times, miss a beat, then beat so fast I could hardly breath in enough air and I would get smothered.

"My tongue would get so stiff I could not talk and I could not hold a glass to drink from. Since I have been drinking Postum, in place of coffee, I can sleep sound any time I lie down, and I feel I owe everything to Postum. I now weigh 120 lbs. and am well."

The Bethany Graded Sunday-school lessons are the most notable achievement in a half century of Sunday-school progress. The materials for each grade are prepared by experts under the co-operative auspices of five denominations.

It should be borne in mind that this graded course is designed in outline by The International Lesson Committee. It is not to be classed with independent ventures. Schools adopting this new graded series will find themselves therefore in line with the progressive schools following the International leadership.

The best way to grade your school is to do it by "installments." Begin at the bottom now—in the elementary grades. Provide elementary teachers and pupils with the equipment offered in The Bethany Series and later on, when the International Committee puts forth a course for higher grades, you will be ready to carry the graded principle a step higher, and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for these higher grades. In this way the most beneficent improvement which could take place in your Sunday-school methods and aims will be accomplished without the slightest risk.

Do not for a moment imagine that the graded lessons are only for teachers who have had special training. While the best work will always be done by specially trained teachers, no further training will be necessary under the graded system than under the uniform system. Indeed the superior adaptation of the graded system to the child's mind together with the clear and fascinating instruction provided in the teachers' helps gives the untrained graded teacher a great advantage over the untrained uniform teacher.

This advertisement is being written only three days after our first announcement of The Bethany Series appeared in the Christian Century. Today's mail brings us letters from the pastors of three of the most important schools of the brotherhood and one from a state superintendent. The latter says: "I am so glad that one of our houses is going to put in the graded lessons. I have been trying to get a number of our schools in this state to adopt them, but so far I have had to recommend helps that are prepared by other people." The pastors will send their orders as soon as they receive an order blank.

The Romance of Grace

Christ's Story of the Lost Boy

It is by almost universal consent of the Christian world that the parable of the Lost Son takes its place as the supremely impressive picture of God's relations with man. There are other parables that are as frequently studied—such as the Sower. There are other parables that are more interesting in details—such as the Good Samaritan. There are other parables that lead further into the realm of mystery—such as the story of Lazarus and the Rich Man. But there is none that embraces so much of the truth which the gospel seeks to convey regarding God's character as the story of the son who went away into the far country and returned at last to gladden his father's heart.

The Old Testament has sometimes been called the Iliad of human life, the struggle of the soul with contending powers, beasts and men, and its achievement of victory through the divine help. The New Testament is the Christian Odyssey, the record of how the soul after long wandering in far lands, comes back to home and rest. And of this experience the parable of the Prodigal Son is the epitome and sum. Yet for all of its world-spanning inclusiveness it is the simplest of narratives. Any home in Nazareth, Capernaum or Jerusalem might have held this little drama of family life. And many a home in every city of the world from the days of Jesus to our own has been the scene of just such tragedy and restoration.

There were two sons in that home, and with the elder the parable concerns itself only in the sequel, which might, so far as its connection with the more familiar side of the story is concerned, be an entirely different narrative. Of the two sons one was content to remain with the father, after the custom of the young men of his time. There his dower was already in possession, his living was assured, and all the luxuries of his father's home were his constant satisfaction. He had no thought of going away to try his fortune in other regions. But the younger son was restless and adventurous. He did not like what seemed to him the monotony of the home, although its industry and pleasures might have afforded him the amplest range for his developing life. But he would see the world. He would take his career in his own hands and be free from the oversight and restraint of parental love.

But he had no wish to go unprovided for what he conceived as a brilliant excursion into the unknown. He would take his inheritance with him. Without stopping to ask whether he had a right to property that he was unwilling to stay and improve along with his father and his brother, he demanded with the quick impulsiveness of unreckoning youth the division of his father's goods and the instant possession of his share. Against this headlong and hazardous proceeding his father raised no protest. And yet all the current of the story reveals the tender solicitude, yearning love and wounded sensibilities of the father as he hastened to comply with his younger son's request.

It was impossible for him to forbid the journey, dangerous and disappointing as he knew it would be. Had he been willing to keep his son at home by abrupt refusal of consent there would have been a hardening of spirit, a resentment against what would seem like arbitrary authority, and perhaps even a sudden flight and an irreparable breach. The father chose the better way, not without anxiety and due warning. No reasoning could avail. The younger son must take his course, and the father with sinking heart saw him leave the home and disappear in the growing distance of the road.

At first life was easy and joyous for the youth. There were plenty of companions to share the early prosperous days of his adventures. Youth and beauty answered to his call. There was no lack of a kind of happiness of which he had never dreamed. To him the quiet of his father's home seemed now too dull and stupid for any lively and ambitious spirit to endure. The days of delight, the nights of reveling were a sufficient answer to his father's anxious cautionings. He was living for the first time in his career, so he thought. Inexperienced in providing for his needs, he thought nothing of the future, and spent easily and lightly the store of gold and of health which he had brought away from the old home.

Then suddenly the awakening came. He had never thought but that his brilliant career would continue indefinitely. The mere cost of his enjoyments had never troubled him. And in the soft companionships that his gold had purchased he was easily lured to unconcern about the future. But the amplest of such partial possessions comes to an end. And with the close of that luxurious day his friends departed, leaving him alone, without comfort and void of skill to meet the future.

How many times in the tragic story of human life has this scene been repeated. The first mortals wished to taste of the forbidden fruit, both because it was delightful to the sight and able to make them wise. Those are the two seductions of all inexperienced natures. They wish pleasure and they wish knowledge. And it seems to them that to see the world, to dip into its mysteries and fascinations is both to enjoy and to know life. The experience is tried, the hand is reached out to pluck the forbidden fruit, and when it is eaten there comes a new knowledge indeed,—the knowledge of sorrow, disappointment, disgrace and ruin. It is the story of thousands of youths coming from simple homes into great cities, curious, eager, ambitious to experience and to know. And when the doors have been opened and the secrets of pleasure and vanity have been explored, they awaken with the sense of knowledge that brings no satisfaction but only a deep shame and perhaps a lifelong regret.

The boy had spent all he possessed, and reduced to utter want, he was compelled to make some shift for daily food. To a Jew of the days of Jesus nothing could seem a more shameful degradation than the necessity of resorting to the abhorrent trade of a swineherd. But there was no alternative. In the far country men kept such creatures as swine, and the youth could find no other and more honorable trade. And so in bitter misery of body and soul he took up the loathsome task. Days passed on in this degrading employment. Often he must have recalled his former life. Perhaps at first his thought dwelt chiefly on the joys of his halcyon period of reveling and prodigality. But gradually tenderer and deeper memories came back. The father's house, the elder brother, quiet but honest and faithful, the servants with whom he was a favorite, and most of all the father's welcoming glance of love and parental tenderness. But not as yet could he summon his courage for any backward steps. Things would take a turn. He would find a better occupation. The world was still before him in spite of his great mistake. He was too proud as yet to confess his error.

But the slender resources of his distasteful life grew more meagre. Famine came with ever increasing severity to teach its lesson of suffering. The food, mean enough at the first, became ever less satisfying. In desperate hunger he was even glad to share with the swine the rough food, the pods of the carob tree, on which they fed. The margin of life was growing scanty. Physical strength was vanishing. The brilliant hopes once cherished had long since gone, and even the more modest promise of bettering his condition took wings. He was in abject misery of mind and body. Anguish such as he had never dreamed could fall upon him was now his hourly lot.

In that depth of darkness, that outer range of misery which finds its secret in exile from the life of God, he came to himself as all men must soon or late. There could be no longer any excuse for refusal to look squarely at the facts. No revampings of the old sense of injury at the narrowness of life in his father's house could possibly stand for a moment against the appalling facts of his frightful mistake, his shameful waste of love and time and wealth, and the degredation to which he had come, all because of his vanity and resentment of the wholesome, simple life of home.

He came to himself in that depth of hell where no excuses could longer mask the facts, and where no other objects of blame than his own foolish pride and obstinacy could suggest themselves "He came to himself." Never had any vision seemed so fair as the old home looked to him now through the tears and sorrows and shame of his present life. How little had he been worthy of the place the father had given him. He was no true son. And yet he knew his father's

By Alva W. Taylor

Progress of the Air-Craft

The conquest of the air is no longer a mere novelty. It is a sober scientific undertaking. Lambert has sailed 200 feet above the top of Eiffel tower, thus demonstrating that the aeroplane, like the eagle, can soar into the heights. Latham, with dare-devil temerity, took a flight at Blackpool, Eng., in a forty mile wind, thus demonstrating that, hazardous as it may be, accident is not inevitable in stiff breezes. He came down the windway course at a rate of eighty miles per hour. The German army now has a small fleet of air crafts and has instituted maneuvers for it the same as for the army and the navy. The Czar, with the cowardice of an oppressor, has forbidden the sailing of any air-craft over St. Petersburg or near any fort or palace. He fears the falling of bombs.

The Gyroscope Train

Mr. Breenan, the English inventor, has made fair trial of his gyroscope car. It will be recalled that he has operated a small car about his grounds for some months. It was large enough to carry his little daughter and ran on a gas-pipe track, up and down, around all angles and curves, and kept faithfully to its single rail even though its burden was placed all on one side. The government appropriated a considerable sum to build a track and a large car for experiment. This experiment was just as much of a success as was that of the model. It was demonstrated that all the passengers could ride on one side of the car and it would but give that side an upward tilt sufficient to keep the single row of wheels on the track. It was also found that the size of the gyroscopes might be largely reduced with just as good results. Men of means are interested in building a short line of practical monorailway for a commercial test of the invention. Gyroscopes are already successfully used on North Sea ships.

A New Anaesthetic

Chloroform was one of the epoch making discoveries. It gave birth to modern surgery. Today it is used as little as possible because of the depressing effects it exerts and the dangers attending its administration. That fact but registers the progress of discovery. Better anæsthetics are now found. The latest seems from reports to be the most marvelous. It leaves the patient conscious and intelligent during the operation. Professor Jonesco, of Bucharest, has demonstrated that stóvaine, if given in conjunction with a solution of strychnine, is practicable. Heretofore it was used only in the lower limbs on account of being a depressent of the heart. The strychnine counteracts this and renders it usable for all operations. Professor Jonesco performed an operation before forty London physicians that caused them to marvel. The patient retained perfect consciousness while an operation was performed upon his neck, answering questions and walking from the table by himself. The solution was injected into the spinal canal, a perfect anæsthesia being obtained within two minutes. Professor Jonesco claims to have performed 700 operations in the hospitals of Bucharest with no other anæstestic and had no bad results.

Overcoming Electrocution

A young Russian woman physician gave a remarkable demonstration in New York before the officers of the Edison Company, by restoring to life a rabbit that had been electrocuted and pronounced dead by attending physicians. By making special applications of an electric current she restored the animal to "life" in three minutes and it was released to run away. She had claimed the discovery and this test was given for a public and tested proof of her claim. If the method is correct and is reduced to a formula, as she claims it is, it will be a great boon to electrical workers.

Writing Off a Depreciation for the Workers

Every business writes off a certain per cent for depreciation. Thus a factory rehabilitates its machinery and an insurance company provides against losses. Provision is thus made in a sensible manner for property interests. But who writes off the depreciation for the toilers? If a man spends his life working for two dollars per day and supports his family who writes off a depreciation for the wearing out of his body? If a strong man goes down into a mine and loses his life by accident who writes off the depreciation for his accident? True his family get a few hundreds, perhaps an amount equal to a year's wages while to them he is worth in dollars and cents a sum on which his annual wages would be but the interest. On the other hand it can be seen how small business at least could not be responsible for the great sum involved in the life of an employe if paid at such a cost. There must be some arrangement made by which industry will provide for the depreciation of human energy and life involved in the industrial processes. It should be charged up to the loss account of the industry and it must be enforced by the state. Germany does it by assessing the employer, the employe, and also the third party to all industrial transactions—the state or society as represented in the state. This makes it simple and feasable for the employer, it insures equitable payment to the employee, and it compels all the people to bear a portion of the burden that must fall upon them if not otherwise paid and that belongs to them because of the contribution that industry makes to the general welfare.

A Clearing House for Labor

Labor becomes congested in centers of large employment. Any industry is subject to fluctuations and periods of out-of-work result. Excepting in times of panic or general industrial depression, other industries will be running at full capacity and could employ many men. Then some industries have their seasons and these seasons are found in various industries to so come that they could be made to co-operate with each other in furnishing employment. Thus a great need is supplied to workless men and to menless work by having a labor exchange that will act as a sort of clearing house for workers. The employment bureau has fallen under censure because it was the prey of politicians and used to further their corrupt system and jobs were traded for votes or, if a private affair, because it so easily lends itself to a system of mulcting.

Illinois has six free employment agencies. In nine weeks 11,549 applied for positions and 10,391 received them. These agencies are largely local in their operations.

The English Poor Law Commission recommend that the bureaus be given a national scope and co-ordinating center in order that there may be no gluts of labor in one place while there are not enough workers in another. The London Exchange registers 35,000 positions annually and fills 25,000 of them.

Germany has 700 exchanges and they fill 2,000,000 places each year at a cost of but 14 cents each. Stuttgart fills 2,000 each week and Munich 200 daily.

The exchanges must be made permanent governmental agencies and divorced from politics. To establish them at needed seasons and as means of temporary relief puts them under the ban as charity measures while they have a permanent and legitimate industrial function to discharge.

Practical Sociology in the Public Schools

Sociology is being rapidly reduced from its academic phases to a practical place in the curriculum. Beginning January 1 the Chicago schools will have a course in the study of their own city. It will be comprehensive enough to require one hour per day for five months and will doubtless be still further lengthened. The pupils will study the city as a field of social exploration. Its history and geography and development will be one phase. Its industries will be mapped and their significance pointed out as social factors. Its educational, philanthropic, and religious institutions will be investigated and its civic affairs will be taught as intimately as the story of the revolution is now. The children will learn what a city is socially considered. They will find the interdependent features of its corporate life and the part each good citizen should play in them. The mechanism of city government will be studied and good citizenship insisted upon. Such a departure ought to have something of the same effect on the future of civic corruption as the study in our schools of the evil effects of alcohol promises to have upon the future of that nefarious business.

Practicalizing Education

The whole trend of sentiment seems now to be toward the practicalizing of education. There is no doubt that education has been too much a matter of mere theoretical training of mind. There is just as little doubt that it may become too much a matter of getting ready to earn some specific sort of a living to the neglect of culture. Labor leaders desire vocational training but they warn against a system that may take the child out of his real education —which means his process of development intellectually and morally —and substitute for it an adept training to do this or that for so much pay per day.

In England today there are 2,000,000 persons between twelve and seventeen years of age that have no educational training. They work as apprentices, spending from five to seven years learning an occupation. In fact they might learn it in less than half the time and ought to be compelled to take such studies as would really educate for the remainder of the time. There children are pushing men out of employment. Legislation is demanded that will keep the children at school in order that men may have work. The night-schools are helping 719,000 of the more ambitious, but it ought not to require that added task to gain a little learning and better fit self for life at that crucial time in one's existence. Many of these become half-timers after the age of twelve, i. e., they go to school half the day and to the factory the other half. That plan is very good for those in the high schools and whose maturity fit them for the strain and whose development requires vocational experience if they are to be ready to do the best when they drop school to take up employment. But these mere children of twelve years and up to the high school age show marked deterioration under the process.

There is a vast difference between training the hand and eye along with the mind and subordinating mental training to some specific and narrowing process of training for a job. Let the learning of a trade be incidental to the development of a mind not the development of mind simply an incident to the learning of a trade.

Lords or Commons

The House of Lords have cast the die and an electoral struggle is on in England that promises more excitement and more momentous consequences than any since the great reform bill of 1832. At that time a marked advance in the democratizing of England's constitution took place and it is again a constitutional struggle in which Englishmen are engaged.

The landlords have long fought any attempt to appraise their landed holdings. They cling to their privilege with desperate tenacity and veto every measure that hints at an attack upon their vested interests. Lloyd-George skilfully attached a valuation scheme to the budget and the Lords face the alternative of accepting his reform and seeing the thin end of the wedge driven deeply into their ancient and aristocratic privilege or daring to challenge the commons to a constitutional combat. The budget strikes them in other places as well when it levies heavily upon liquor and by providing heavy taxation of the wealthy and privileged it threatens to steal all the campaign thunder of the new party of protectionists.

Lord Landsdowne makes the shrewdest move possible. He refuses to commit the Lords to an act of veto directly, but asks for a referendum on the budget before giving approval. This might seem reasonable on the face of it for the bill makes very radical changes in taxation and is revolutionary in its proposal of reforms. But for the Lords to bring about a dissolution of Parliament is a usurpation of the privilege of the ministry—which means in fact of the majority in the Commons. Thus to escape transgression in one way they trespass in another, but dare the alternative rather than surrender their landlordly privileges an iota.

The Larger Issue

If the Conservatives carry the election the power of the Lords will be greatly strengthened by the approval given their tactics. They will have established, not only the right to reject a budget but to dissolve a Parliament which means that by veto they can be masters of any situation. If they are defeated it means that they will be shorn of power and prestige if not so changed in their very membership as to create them a new chamber. A compromise is possible, if the majority for the Liberals be small, by allowing the Lords to plead that the referendum has shown that the people want the budget and thus accept their approval of the measure with a warning to take a care for the future. If the majority be large it is possible that the Liberals will create enough new peers to give them a majority of the upper house and a clear road for all kinds of reform both in law and constitution.

The king has felt the crisis to be very grave and has tried his hand at getting a compromise, but the feeling was too deep. The Lords are too determined to keep their dear land and liquor dividends and the Commons too determined to fix once and forever their principle of popular rule and taxation of the rich and privileged for the defense of the nation and the help of the poor. For it is the Tory demand for a great navy on the one hand and the Liberal demand for old age pensions on the other that has created the need of increasing the budget through some sort of greater taxation. The king has been powerless and the Lords will be gradually shorn of all power as has the Crown, for the people of Britain are as democratic in principle as those of America. They tolerate old form until they threaten new principles then they abolish them.

The Curtailing of the Lords' Power

In 1839 the right of the Commons to appropriate supplies was first established. It was a right held lightly at times since, but never surrendered. In 1407 the principle that all financial measures should be initiated in the Commons was fixed. In 1671 the Lords were deprived of the privilege of modifying in any important manner any part of a financial bill, but they were left the power of accepting or rejecting it as a whole. This right is much less real than the face of the statement makes it appear for the fact that the Commons could leave government unprovided for if the Lords rejected their measure made it a dangerous thing for the peers to do. As a matter of fact they have suggested slight amendments but none affecting any vital portion of a bill on finance and even then the Commons have generally drafted an entire new bill embodying the suggestions and sent it up for approval without amendment, thus holding to the technical demand that no financial measure can be amended by the hereditary house. In 1860 the Lords rejected a proposal to repeal the paper tax, but the Commons passed some very warm resolutions and sent the bill back and it was humbly accepted.

Will the Lords Be Mended?

The question threatens to become one involving the House of Lords more than the budget. The radical elements cry for withdrawal of all power of vote from the hereditary chamber. It is proposed that if the Lords reject a bill of any kind that the Commons have the right to make it a law by passing it over their veto, much as our legislative bodies do when they overthrow an executive veto. Another proposal is to so modify the chamber as to virtually make it no longer hereditary by making it a sort of senate though with many seats reserved for men who have served the kingdom in signal ways. The fact that the land and liquor bills have been rejected by majorities made up of peers who are never seen in the house at any other time certainly argues for mending of some kind if England really desires a legislative body that can be respected. Some are accused of desiring only a one house Parliament with no power of veto imposed upon it, but that is doubtless a suggestion too radical to receive serious consideration.

The Death of Disease

Man is slowly but surely gaining on disease. Tuberculosis, the most deadly of all human enemies, is yielding to the hand of science and philanthrops and the past year saw a decrease of 5 per cent in the death rate from that dread disease. It is estimated that $8,000,000 has been given within the past year or two to fight it. Last year it killed one-third of all the workingmen who died and among the indoor workers, such as clerks and copyists, it was responsible for two-fifths of the mortality. The compositors and printers owe one-half their deaths to it and other trades that confine men closely suffered nearly as much, e. g. barbers, tailors, and servants. The farmer fares best. His outdoor occupation, notwithstanding it is sometimes dusty, saves him from the frightful ravages that indoor workers suffer and but one-fourth of the deaths among his kind were due to tuberculosis.

Pneumonia is almost as dread though not so powerful a disease as tuberculosis. Of all quick diseases it is to be most dreaded. It is now being subjected to the fresh air treatment and instead of housing the patient as formerly he is kept where the air is pure, even though it be cold. The death rate here has dropped 16 per cent. Typhoid, which once killed one-third of those attacked, now digs graves but for about 3 per cent of its victims, and science gained on it last year some 15 per cent. Diarrheal diseases cling with unusual stubbornness. Four-fifths of its ravages is among children under two years of age and it will continue to be the worst enemy of the little ones until the slum is abolished at the one extreme, and mothers nurse their cihldren at the other. Well-to-do mothers thank a kindly Providence that their little ones do not have to be nursed in a tenement then refuse the real burden of motherhood and turn their little ones to a bottle and thereby condemn many times as many to infant mortality as nature would. Cancer alone of the major diseases made a gain in victims over the last year.

Editorial

To Friends of Federation

THE utter inadequacy of the organization under which the Disciples of Christ are at present operating is illustrated in the ineffectual efforts made to provide our share of the sum needed to meet the expenses of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ. The Disciples have been asked to pay during the four years ending in December, 1912, the sum of five thousand dollars to support this organization. There is no method by which this money can be secured except by an appeal to the friends of this great cause through the newspapers. Shortly after the Philadelphia meeting of the Council last winter, W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, chairman of the Disciples' committee, published a statement and asked for pledges. Five persons responded, as follows:

R. A. Long, Kansas City, Mo.	$200.00
Frank H. Main, Cleveland, O.	100.00
Fletcher Cowherd, Kansas City, Mo.	30.00
W. F. Richardson, Kansas City, Mo.	10.00
Claire L. Waite, Milwaukee, Wis.	5.00
Total pledged	$345.00

Does this represent our substantial interest in this great movement for Christian co-operation? We cannot believe it. Our brethren have been under great pressure during our Centennial year, and have merely forgotten this cause, which is not, like our own special interests, kept before them in our church papers. It is time for action, if we would not be put to shame before our brethren of the other religious bodies with whom we are proposing to join in this movement for Christian fellowship and work. The second quarter of our apportionment will soon be due, making $2,500, that we ought to pay to the treasurer of the Federal Council early in the new year. What will you do, in helping in this work? Every preacher could give five dollars or ten, paying it in four installments. Many business men could give a hundred dollars. What you do, do now! Send your pledges to the treasurer of the Committee for the Disciples, Geo. A. Miller, 338 Tenth St., N. E., Washington, D. C., or to the chairman of the Committee, W. F. Richardson, 1016 Lydia Ave., Kansas City, Mo.

Dr. Chapman's Change of Method

EVANGELIST J. Wilbur Chapman's return from his Australian tour is being signalized in a number of American cities with mass meeting demonstrations by Christian people. Dr. Chapman's work has received great praise in the secular and religious press of Australia. In his Melbourne meetings the hall seating eight thousand persons was not large enough to accommodate the people who wished to attend. The number of converts in that city and Sydney is reported as reaching several thousand. Mr. Charles Alexander, who visited Australasia in company with R. A. Torrey some years since, accompanied Dr. Chapman, together with a score of other preachers and singers. During his absence, Dr. Chapman gave out a significant interview concerning his plans for future evangelistic work. He says that he is convinced a mistake is made in asking pastors to suspend their regular church services during the evangelistic meetings. He proposes to arrange his program so as not to interfere with the regular prayer-meeting and church services. There is no doubt that Dr. Chapman has discerned clearly a weakness in present day evangelistic methods. The union meeting is a thing apart. As a rule it is held in some building other than a church. The regular machinery of the church is not brought into play in operating the revival but a specially devised organization which has no function or existence after the meeting is done. Meantime the regular church machinery lies idle.

Afterward when the evangelist is gone the revival divides itself up into a dozen or a score or a hundred different churches. The regular order of service is resumed—but the new recruits are quite unfamiliar with it. The revival songs are abandoned for the church hymns—but these are new and strange. The people's manners are different in the church from their manners in the informal service of the tabernacle or public hall. The pastor's message seems to lack spice after the over-spiced preaching of the evangelist. The appeal in the evangelistic meeting was for a definite motor act, and the results could be easily counted. In the steady work of the pastorate, however, the appeal is much deeper than in the evangelistic meeting and the results cannot be measured in any definite act like coming forward or raising the hand. All this impresses the new convert as a reversion from the enthusiasm of the revival and he easily grows cold.

Apart from certain vices intrinsic to the revivalistic method in general it must be said that its greatest weakness is that the great meeting fails to fit itself up close to the regularly organized religious life of the community. The organization that is expected to take care of the fruits of the revival is not the organization that has made the revival. So far as the continuous organized activity of the churches is concerned the revival is an exotic thing. This is surely true of such a meeting as Gipsy Smith's in Chicago. One has an oppressive sense of waste as one contemplates the remoteness of what takes place in the Gipsy's auditoriums from the regular social soil of church fellowship in which these converts must be planted if their new life is to be conserved and nourished. But out of the alleged ten thousand converts in the Gipsy's meetings we would venture to say that not one-half of one thousand united with the churches.

We commend Dr. Chapman's purpose "to make more of conferences with church officers, and of heart to heart talks with ministers on topics of church life." And we believe that in the steady work of the kingdom of God the evangelistic meeting that fits close up to the pattern of the best church services, using the same organization, the same hymns, the same methods and, if possible, the same room, will count for more than the meeting that attracts with its novelties and sensations.

Are the new graded lessons for large schools only? Not at all. The new graded courses may be used to most excellent advantage in any Sunday-school, large or small, in city, town, or country.

Not The Same Question

AN editorial in the Christian-Evangelist quotes with approval our criticism of Colonel Church's utterances on the baptism question where we say, "His argument that the practice of both immersion or affusion according to the option of the candidate would bring us nearer the mark of a free church capable of including all Christians called forth our pronounced dissent. As a people seeking a basis of unity the Disciples are on the right ground in the practice of immersion only. So long as there is an immersionist conscience in Christendom there will be no union on an optional procedure in the practice of baptism." To these statements the Christian-Evangelist responds:

"These are wise words, and we are sure they will be gratifying to our readers, many of whom will recall the sharp but courteous discussion of this question which we had with Brother Morrison a few years ago. It is all the more manly and Christian in him that he now frankly avows his conviction as opposed to a policy which does not promise unity, as he says, but division and diversion of attention from problems which we need to study to a question which can only minister strife."

We rest very comfortably under the paternal approval of Dr. Garrison, but we are really startled at the news that we ever carried on a discussion of the baptism question with him. How could we ever have differed with him on this question? Our own views from the cradle up have been molded by the teaching of the Disciples. Did Dr. Garrison at one time hold heretical views on the baptism question? We are not able to account for a discussion of this question with him on any other ground. Perhaps our "sharp but courteous" handling of the subject in defense of the practice of immersion only, was the means of bringing Dr. Garrison back to his present orthodox position! Certainly our own mind has never entertained any thought contrary to that expressed in our recent editorials.

While we have no recollection of discussing with Dr. Garrison the question treated of in the editorial which he approves, we do recall a rather interesting passage at arms on another question, that of the practice of Christian Union. It is just possible that this is the discussion referred to. But Dr. Garrison's present confusion of the question of the practice of immersion only, with the question of the practice of Christian union helps to explain his failure to grasp the point of that discussion. We yield to none in our determination to obey the Lord's commandment, and we know that obedience to his commandment cannot conflict with any earnest plan to work out an effectual answer to His own prayer for the unity of His people.

Of course the new graded lessons will displace the uniform series; but that will be to the distinct advantage of the pupil. The Beginners' Course, now so well established in popular favor, abundantly demonstrates this fact.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett.

What are the reasons which have led the Disciples of Christ to the observance of the communion service in the manner in which they practice it? Reader.

The Disciples began their history upon the platform of as close an adherence to New Testament teaching and precedent as was compatible with the work of the church in modern times. Their purpose in studying closely the New Testament to adjust themselves to its ideals was the purpose to find the position on which all Christians of every age and practice might unite. It was evident that in matters of this kind there was only one place which could be free from controversy. That was the place upon which the apostolic church, regarded as exemplary by all modern churches, had stood.

The study of the New Testament convinced the fathers of this movement that the Lord's Supper was observed at first far more frequently than many of the churches in their day were accustomed to observe it. Passing over the suggestion afforded in the early narratives of Acts that the communion was observed daily at first by the happy and growing church, it seemed clear to them that at least by the time the Apostle Paul visited the church at Troas (Acts 20) the custom had become fairly uniform of celebrating on each returning first day of the week the service which commemorated the Saviour's passion. This was sufficient as an example. They did not wait to ask further questions, and indeed the New Testament was found to throw no further light on the matter of frequency of observance. But they felt that since each Lord's day was itself a memorial of the resurrection of Jesus, the communion, which brought to mind his death was not less valuable nor less worthy of frequent observance.

In this position of adherence to weekly communion the Disciples have the approval of concurrent usage on the part of many other groups of Christians. The Roman Catholic church has always administered the Lord's Supper every Sunday. The same is true of the Greek church, the Church of England and the Episcopal church. Many Baptist churches have the same custom, especially in England and Australia, where it is almost the universal practice. These churches do not insist that every member of the church communicate weekly, but they insist upon the propriety of spreading the table every Lord's day to permit all who wish it to enjoy the privilege of free access to the elements symbolic of the Saviour's death. On this point, therefore, the Disciples occupy a position which cannot be questioned by any individual or society of Christians whatever their own practice. There can be no objection on the part of any one to the plan of according the privilege of communion to such as desire it each Lord's day, while increasing numbers of Christians feel the satisfaction as well as the obligation of more frequent observance of the holy meal than the church has sometimes permitted itself, and still continues in many places to practice.

The Disciples observe the communion in company with all who have obtained like precious faith. At first there was a strong tendency among them to restrict the privilege of communion to those of their own persuasion, or at least those who were known to be immersed believers. In some of our churches even yet this is the tendency, though it is rapidly losing ground. Nearly all of our churches today practice open communion in the fullest sense. Some of them explain their attitude as that neither of invitation nor refusal, but simply as spreading the Lord's table to which those who count themselves his children are welcomed upon their own examination of heart and mind as to their fitness for the feast. The Disciples believe they have no right to debar any one from the Lord's Supper, and, in general, they find satisfaction in inviting all who rejoice in the privilege of communion to share with them in the service.

To the Disciples the communion service is not a sacrament, but a feast of love, of memory and of hope. It is not an act which secures merit to the participants, but is rather a means of grace conducive, when rightly observed, to growth in spiritual life. It is in a very true sense, though not with some of the superstitious meanings of the past, a feast of the Real Presence. Jesus is felt to be present not in the transformation of bread and wine into his body and blood, but in a spiritual power and companionship. The need of having the spirit of Christ in ever increasing measure is met in this rich experience of communion with the Lord in the holy supper. And thus as baptism suggests that birth into the life of spiritual enjoyment to which Jesus invites humanity, so the Lord's Supper suggests that nourishment upon which the soul of the Christian must constantly feed if it is to grow into the likeness of the Lord.

It is for these reasons and with this meaning that the Disciples practice communion in the manner that has been habitual in their churches from the beginning.

The story is going around the religious newspapers that ten barrels of grape juice were consumed at the Centennial communion service at Pittsburg. Evidently the writer in The Congregationalist did not stop to figure out the enormity of the thing or he would have seen the absurdity of it. Remember, brethren, it was a communion service! Mr. Warren had reported that 300 gallons of distilled water were consumed by the people while they were gathering and dispersing. In reply to our inquiry he says that 144 quarts of grape juice were used.

The Romance of Grace

heart so well that he never questioned the certainty of his welcome home. That conviction had been with him from the first, but this was the earliest moment in which he had gained his own consent to return, confess his sin and take once more his father's forgiving hand.

"I will arise and go to my father." In that word of his there shot across the murky waste of his life the light of returning hope and happiness. "I will arise and go to my father." Homesickness, misery and shame had conquered his last reserves of pride and self-will. So abject was his confession of sin that he determined to make no plea of any kind, to ask for no reinstatement to his former place as son. He would humbly beg for a servant's task in the home where the very meanest had food and to spare.

The father had never lost hope of his departed son. Through all the anxious days and nights he wished and hoped against hope for his return. But of these hours of brooding sorrow no record is made. It never is. The one who watches and waits at home until love has won its way is never chronicled. But the tragedy is there, none the less. Never had the father ceased to expect his son. Never was he unprepared for that happy event. Anxiously from day to day he watched the path along which the returning youth must come. He was as truly his son in the far country as when he had tarried under the roof-tree, but he was a son slighting the father's love and neglectful of the privileges of sonship. There was no resentment in the father's heart. He knew the allurements which life throws around an eager youth. But he knew as well the awful price which life exacts for its instruction. When at last the boy came back broken in spirit; haggard in feature, unkempt in garb and doubtful in mind as to the reception awaiting him, the father gave him no chance even to pour out the full tale of his self-reproach. It was enough that the one who was dead was alive again; the lost was found. The father knew that no luxuries of the home could ever make up for the bitter suffering of those wasted years. The child had paid the penalty in money and in blood. It was enough that the home should be made to him the most inviting and comforting place on earth.

This is the Romance of Grace, the secret of the gospel set to the music of a tender and enthralling story. It is the best interpretation of God's attitude to men ever given. To be sure it does not discuss the details of the atonement. But it does more. It reveals the heart of the Father who is ever making possible the return of his children to the light and the love of his heart. And through the ages this story will be told as the most precious of all of the utterances of Jesus, whose life and words and death made possible our knowledge of the Father's heart as of One who goes a very long way down the road to meet the returning child, and who welcomes him evermore to the best that heaven and earth afford, deeming that the wasted years, the agony and the regret of the far country must be obliterated as far as possible in the welcome, the love and the employments of the Father's home.

The Young Man's Money

He Should Earn It—He Should Save It—He Should Give It

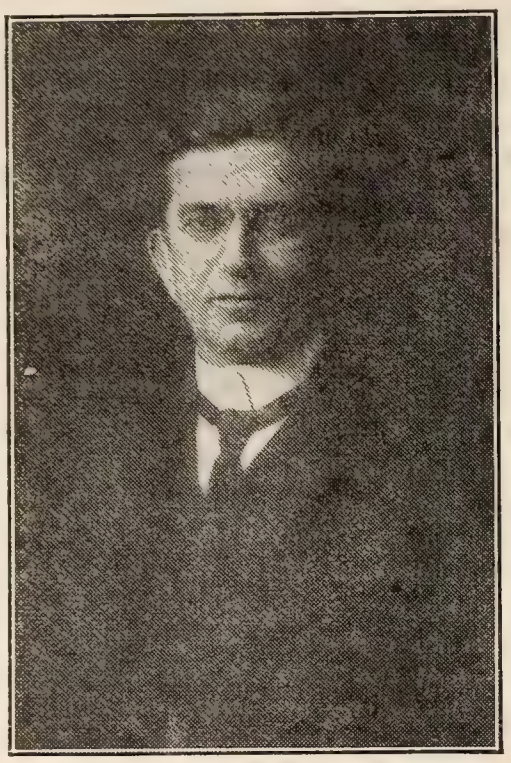
(From "A Young Man's Affairs," by Dr. Charles R. Brown,

There are four kinds of people in the world. There are the poor poor. They have no money, and they have nothing else in the way of intelligence, aspiration and affection to make life worth while. There are the rich poor—they have no money either to speak of but they have thoughts, loves, activities, appreciation for and joy in the sky, the hills, books, friends and God. Some of the happiest people I have ever known were rich poor people. There are the poor rich—they have money, lots of it, and nothing else. When you ask "How much are they worth," if you mean how much are the things they own worth, the answer might stretch out into six or seven figures. But if you mean how much are they worth by virture of the qualities of mind and heart they can show, they do not inventory very large. Then there are the rich rich—they have money and they have aims, purposes, interests, which make life full, sweet and noble. It is well to look over the field at the start and decide in which class you propose to live.

Money is stored up life. If you work hard for a day and receive five dollars for it, that gold piece is so much of your own life expressed in terms which all the world understands. You have put into it energy, intelligence, fidelity if you really earned the gold piece—it is that much of your life! And you can make it minister to your life in a legitimate reaction. The gold piece will put food in your mouth to repair waste, it will put a hat on your head, or offer books to your mind, or travel to your wish for a broader outlook and experience. You cast your effort on the waters and the gold piece brings it back to you in some other form which you prize.

Earn It Honestly.

There are four relationships which a young man sustains to money. First of all he relates himself to it by the money he earns—earn it honestly. I take it for granted that every young fellow who had strength enough of mind to come here tonight is either earning his own money or intends to earn it. If by any chance some parasite has come in, who is content to have his father or other rich relative give him money, or who is merely waiting for that relative to die and leave him all he needs, it is hardly worth while for me to waste powder and shot on him. He does not come within the definition anyhow—I am speaking to young men, and he is neither young nor a man, no matter when he was born or what kind of clothing he wears.



Do Not Steal.

Earn it—do not steal it! It ought not to be necessary to say that here in a Christian church nearly forty centuries after God said from the top of Mount Sinai—"Thou shalt not steal." It is necessary! My experience of twenty years in the ministry dealing with boys and young men, having them confide in me and appeal to me to help them out of terrible situations, has led me to know that when I stand before any congregation like this, there are young fellows present who are stealing from their employers. That young fellow is here tonight—several of him. The only salvation is for him to stop now, make restitution, and begin to walk so that he can look God and man in the face whenever his accounts are audited.

A prominent minister in a large Eastern city picked out twenty of the leading business men and addressed to them this question, "What is the greatest need of the business world today?" And when the replies came back every man of them, with not a single exception, said "Personal honesty." They knew something of the stealing which is going on.

A Good Spender.

In the second place a young man relates himself to money by what he spends—spend it conscientiously! Of all the fool ambitions which sometime have their hour with young men that of being known as "a good

CHARLES R. BROWN, D.D.
Author of "The Young Man's Affairs"
Thos. Y. Crowell & Co., New York

spender" is the emptiest. The young fellow who lets his money slip through his fingers easily, recklessly; the man who robs his employer, perhaps, in order to have plenty of automobile rides and road-house suppers, and then rides to prison to think it over for a term of years, is very commonly known about town as "a good spender."

Men laugh at them, and even girls have their own ideas on the subject. They know that the young fellow who sends them American Beauties when he cannot afford dandelions is simply indicating that he has more money than brains. When these very girls come to select husbands they prefer men who have more sense. There are lots of girls in this world who are not half as silly as certain foolish men think they are—they quietly laugh in their sleeves at the "good spenders," even when the money is being spent on them.

Saving Money.

In the third place the young man relates himself to money by what he saves—save prudently! You will see young fellows hopping around in society, chirping to the girls like so many canaries, each one dressed up until he would inventory one hundred and twenty-five dollars, perhaps, as he stands forth in his swallowtail ready for the Friday Night Assembly, and yet many of them hardly know what a bank book looks like. If any one of them went to open an account in a savings bank he would have to be told three times where to sign his name. He is having a good time, but he is postponing marriage and a home. He is putting the success which might be his a long way off—so far that he may never overtake it in this life. He is missing the larger things in growth, in travel, in enrichment for himself and for those other lives which are bound up with his own, for the sake of the mere gratification which may be in no sense wicked but is unworthy of such a sacrifice.

Giving Money.

And finally a young man relates himself to money by what he gives—give generously and systematically. Money is one of the most useful servants in the world, but it is a terrible and a degrading master. When money has mastered a man it puts a look in his eye that is like cold steel and it draws lines around his mouth which make it look like a trap. You may earn honestly, spend wisely and save prudently and still allow money to be your master instead of making it the servant of moral purpose, the messenger of good will. You must couple, therefore, with the other three habits formed early and steadfastly that of giving generously and systematically.

I would urge every young man to begin to give a tenth of his income. The Jews did it and they were blessed temporally and spiritually. They are still the bankers of the world and they formerly held the right of the line in moral insight and spiritual passion. The Mormons did it, and with all the moral defacements of their system they have transformed arid Utah into a garden of prosperity beyond the wildest dreams of the founders of that community. "Honor the Lord with thy substance and with the first fruits of all thine increase, so shall thy barns be filled with plenty and thy presses shall burst out with new wine." . . . Whenever a dollar comes to you set aside ten cents of it for charity and benevolence. Keep that fund sacredly, and then use the other ninety cents to spend or to save. You will find that you will be greatly blessed financially and morally in that systematic method.

I began to give that way twenty years ago when my own income was very small. I kept it up when it cost me a hard struggle. I have earned all the money I have ever had since I left my father's house. I have not stolen it, nor gambled for it, nor inherited it, nor married a dollar of it. I have been greatly blessed in that systematic giving, and I commend it to all men, young and old.

Guido, being asked where he found the model for a great picture of a saint, called a poor old servant, worn and wrinkled and trouble-worn, and said: "Behold the man!" The master, skilled and wise, had seen the glory behind the veil, the saint behind the servant.

Even as the sculptor's chisel, flake on flake,
Scales off the warble till the beauty pent
Sleeping within the block's imprisonment
Beneath the wounding strokes begins to wake—
So love, which the high gods have chosen to make Their sharpest instrument, has shaped and bent
The stubborn spirit, till it yields, content,
Its few and slender graces for love's sake.
But the perfected statue proudly rears
Its whiteness for the world to see and prize,
The past hurt buried in forgetfulness;
While the imperfect nature, grown more wise,
Turns with its new-born good, the streaming tears
Of pain undried, the chastening hand to bless.

Religious Education

By Harry F. Burns.

Training Teachers

If one should stand beside the avenues that lead to our public schools, colleges, and universities, and watch the crowds of children, young men, and young women, as they daily come to these training schools of life, he could easily believe that all the world's at school. The impression is deepened when one thinks of the provision now made for those who are not in the schools. There are the vacation schools, the night schools, the industrial schools, the correspondence schools—one of which enrolls 350,000 students—literary clubs, reading circles, lecture courses and public libraries. The University Extension lecture departments and correspondence study departments thread their way into every community. The lecture courses given in the more enlightened communities, are no longer the old lyceum entertainment, but are serious, systematic courses of instruction in special fields of study. Educational ideals are dominant in our life.

Educational Ideals and Church.

This educational spirit could not fail to affect the church, and she is awakening to the importance of her educational work. Awakenig, I say, for the church has not in recent years, thought of her work as educational. She has been evangelistic. She has sought to preach the gospel to all people, and tell them they must accept it or suffer the consequences. It was their risk; their responsibility. The church had done her duty in bringing the news to them. But now there is a different vision. The study of psychology has made clear to the mind of our day, the truth of the Apostle's statement that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Then we must take care of the sowing. This the church is attempting today. Therefore she is emphasizing as never before, the importance of the work of the Sunday-school. These schools are strong in that they meet on the day when people have leisure, they are strong in numbers; strong in the material that they have for study—the Bible, the most vital of all books; and strong in their ultimate aim, the development of Christian character. But the Sunday-schools of our day are weak, in physical equipment for their work, in efficiency of organization, in lack of graded courses of study, and above all in not having trained teachers. The fair haired, bright-eyed, attractive young lady is not on account of her social attractiveness prepared to teach a class in the Sunday-school. If she add to this attractiveness true piety, this does not yet fit her for teaching in the church school. Most of our teachers today realize this, and are not teaching because they want to, or feel prepared for the important work; but because there is no one else and they have been pressed into the service. On this account the work done in most of our Sunday-schools is absolutely unworthy of the name education, and does not command the respect of the thinking people of the community.

Coming Ideals.

This condition, I am glad to admit, is rapidly changing. Pastors and churches are seeking trained teachers, and leaders for the the Sunday-school. Not a few churches are looking for persons, of special training in the universities to direct the educational work of the church. Many of the leading universities and seminaries are preparing young men and women for this special work. Some pastors, who are themselves aware of the great problems involved in the work of the Sunday-school, and its importance are giving their time to training teachers for the work. This, they see, is a more profitable investment of their time, than pastoral calling, which so often degenerates into social simpering.

What Is Teacher Training?

Yes, you say, we must have trained teachers. But when is a teacher trained? "Teacher Training" is a good phrase, but what is it? What does it mean to train teachers? There are three factors in the teacher problem; first, the child to be educated, the goal or end which is to be sought in the education, and the material to be presented in attaining this goal. We hear much talk these days of a kind of "teacher training," which fails utterly to make the teacher a master of any one of these factors. But this superficial work does not commend itself to the best pastors nor to the best people in the churches. It certainly does not command the respect of educators. The teachers who are doing the work in the public schools, give years to the study of psychology, pedagogy, and to gaining a thorough knowledge, not only of the specific material which they would present, but all closely related subjects. Education with the public school teachers is fast becoming an exact science. It is more and more able to declare just what should be presented to the mind at each period of its development, and how it should be presented.

To expect such careful and thorough training on the part of those who teach in our Sunday-schools, is hardly possible, so long as we must depend upon voluntary service. But we should expect that our teacher training work should give the teacher three things: First, some knowledge of child nature and its development; second, some knowledge of the best educational methods of our day, and thirdly, a comprehensive view of the biblical literature, with the ability to choose those parts that seem most adapted to the needs of the pupil at any specific age. This is not too ambitious a purpose for the average pastor in any of our enlightened communities. The work could easily be planned that this entire field would be covered in three years, or two of the subjects might be carried in one year, and a more advanced course arranged for the following year. It will require time on the part of the pastor, but it is time well spent. It will save time for the pastor, for he will be getting about him a corps of trained workers thus multiplying his effectiveness. His position will be that of the general who directs the work of his lieutenants, or that of the business man who superintends a work each detail of which is being executed by men with special aptitude for their special task.

Other Advantages.

Not the least among the advantages to come to the church through this sort of procedure is the spirit that it brings into the work of the church. The church will come to see her task in a new light. Her gains can not be achieved in a day. High accomplishment here waits on the years. This calls for a permanent pastorate. The pastor must remain through many years to accomplish these purposes. Thus will his people come to know him, to see his visions, and to coöperate with him in working out his God inspired purposes. It brings people and pastor together in a rich service of teaching, and into fellowship with the Great Teacher, who said to those who had learned of Him, "Go teach all nations."

A Great Sunday-school Faculty

By Harry G. Hill.

In the extensive efforts that have been made for increased efficiency in our Sunday-schools, little or nothing has been said concerning the qualifications for creditable teaching, beyond the very inadequate Teachers' Training courses now offered to our schools. It must be admitted that even this is an advance over former attainment, but it seems that there are higher ideals at which to aim.

Another Slogan.

A recent article in the Century called attention to the desirability of getting "Big Men" for the church. Why not add to this slogan another, and insist on trained and capable teachers and officers for the Bible-schools? All will surely agree that the most important element of Bible-school success is the teaching force. This is true of all educational institutions and a real Bible-school is an educational institution. President Garfield is said to have defined a college as "Mark Hopkins on one end of a log and a student on the other." This hyperbole is not much wide of the truth. A college does not depend entirely upon location, building, endowment, equipment, or size of its faculty or student body. It depends upon the personnel, equipment and character of its faculty. Is not the same true of the Sunday-school, or Bible-school?

Success Depends on Teachers.

The real effectiveness and success of a school does not depend upon the suitability and adequateness of its quarters, the size of the classes and entire school, the music or collections or any other thing so much as upon the ability of its faculty. Though the school have separate class rooms, many pupils, good music, large collections, many and varied plans and schemes to promote its own welfare, and lack qualified teachers, it availeth nothing—or as many of us workers well know, next to nothing.

Not All Can Teach.

The idea that anybody who can be persuaded to accept the task is fit to teach a class, is false, as is amply demonstrated by the failures such an idea produces when carried out. The notion that some unprepared, inexperienced girl of sixteen, or some old man in his dotage is "good enough" to teach a class is entirely wrong. The truth is that few are worthy and none is too well prepared for this underestimated but important work. With this conviction those interested in the Bible-school of the Third Church, Indianapolis, have for three years planned and striven for a worthy faculty. The results attained may be worth the consideration of other schools.

Beginnings in the Third Church.

This school was very insufficiently housed, poorly equipped and not largely attended. At the start of its campaign for better things, the prospect for more adequate facilities was not at all bright. But the earnest people said, "We will do what we can do, and we can do the first things first." In a quiet, persistent and, we believe, a wise way, the effort to increase the worth of its teaching force began. We sought the one thing needful, and now all other blessings seem to be coming to us.

How It has Grown.

Our school is not the largest in the country but we have exceeded our limitations. The primary department occupies the original church building. The Junior and Intermediate and part of the Senior departments fill to overflowing the main church auditorium, and the large "Men's Class" has the public school auditorium across the street. We have the largest Home Department in the Brotherhood, enrolling 401 members.

Demand for Better Quarters.

The demand for better quarters and larger, for both church services and Sunday-school has grown so insistent that we are now erecting on a new site a building that can be made to house a school of over 2,000 pupils. We do not say this in the spirit of boasting but in the spirit of thanksgiving. We publish our success because we believe we have struck a keynote and desire the same good things for others.

Before listing a few of our officers and teachers, let us say we have met with the most cordial and ready response to the invitations to join our teaching force. It is considered an honor to do this great work and the position of teacher in our school is one that affords association with a select body of God's noblemen and noblewomen.

Faculty Meeting.

We have a faculty meeting once each month. We meet at 6:00 p. m., and after a supper furnished at a nominal sum, we have a review of the lessons for the coming month given by the pastor. This review never extends over fifteen to twenty minutes: no time is wasted on anything irrelevant, but stress is laid on the important and salient features of the four or five lessons to be studied. After this part of the program, the time is given up to a free and frank discussion of all matters pertaining to the school's welfare; recommendations are offered, weaknesses are dealt with and plans for remedy and progress are proposed, adopted and set in motion.

The Faculty.

We append a list of some of our officers and teachers with a brief statement of their educational qualifications and pedagogical experience. Not all are named or mentioned. It is only justice to say that many of our most faithful and efficient teachers are those who have no academic credits. These are possessed of personality, experience and character which become apparent on acquaintance but cannot be given in a few words in cold type. Those who are mentioned in this list are named because they have added to their Christian character the training which can be acquired in institutions of higher learning.

Our Church Men

By John Ray Ewers

"A Reply to the Reply"

Mr. Macfarlane is right when he says that my "criticism," or as I prefer to call it "suggestion," is not offered in an unkindly spirit. I have only love for the Men's Movement. I have always stood for it. In my paper at the Cincinnati Congress, three years ago, I advocated the formation of such an organization. I want to see the Brotherhood, with its auspicious beginning, rapidly become a world power. I am glad Mr. Macfarlane is such a royal, big soul, and that he understands my motive. I felt deeply that the hour had come for definite work and I expressed that idea.

No Time to Waste

I agree that it takes time to get such a vast movement under way. We want to allow all the time necessary, but we want to waste not a moment. The movement is young, but not too young to learn. Gradually out along the lines of real experience the way must be felt.

I agree also that many various minded men have to be dealt with. We do not all see alike. That is obvious. Men have various interests and intense passions. There are issues large enough, however, to enlist most men. The flag of our country gathers us all within its holy folds. The Great Commission includes us everyone.

Brotherhood Tasks

Now let us do a little very clear thinking about this matter. The Brotherhood has one of two tasks before it. Either it is its business to agitate, to marshall the hosts, to simply appeal to the men of our communion to organize, or, on the other hand, it is to mobilize the hosts, to direct the army in the field, to hit the ramparts of the enemy with deadly energy. If the work of the Brotherhood is simply to call the men to arms, very well, let us understand that. In that case its great commission would read like this. "Go ye into all the world and gather all the Disciples into a Brotherhood, teaching them to do whatever each group may please." The cry would be "Men, get together and do something." If on the other hand, the work of the Brotherhood is not only to arouse the men to action but to sound the challenging note of warfare, then the note must be found and sounded. And there you have it in a nut-shell and I think tolerably clear. The great commission would then read something like this, "Go ye into all the world and gather together all the Disciples into one vast army and hurl this disciplined host against the ramparts of heathendom, intemperance and social wrongs." Or more likely only one of these notes would be sounded at once. Yes, I repeat we must have some one great purpose to hold us together. That it is a great and glorious thing to gather the army I admit the magnificent work Mr. Macfarlane has done and is doing in this way. Perhaps too, I am a little early with my suggestion of definiteness. But it must come sooner or later. We do not want to send our troups naked to the battle, neither do we want them forever fighting men of straw. My point is simply this and I am willing to offer it and then sit down, "We must all get together and hit some one thing, and hit it hard enough to make a dent." A thousand different groups doing a thousand different things will never accomplish much.

Constitution Too Vague

That it is well for one group to educate a Chinaman I admit. That it would be better for the Brotherhood to build and man a college in China I venture to suggest. I yield to no man in my appreciation of the Bible and in the value of Bible study, but it seems to me that Bible study is but the discipline. The Bible class is the Christian soldier's drilling ground. I am insisting upon leading the drilled soldiers forth to definite battle. There are hundreds of excellent Men's Bible classes among us. There should be some great challenging note in the Men's Movement that would call them all forth to war. It is all well enough to call upon men to enlist, but usually a man wants to know for what purpose he enlists. The constitution says, "in the service of Christ and the church." I repeat that that is too vague.

A Concrete Case

To make the case concrete: Here in the East End Christian Church is a fine, large class of men. The class is well organized. It studies the open Bible. It has its social functions. It represents a company of power. Left to itself it will do fine work for missions, benevolences, civic betterment and temperance. Now, why should this class affiliate with the Brotherhood Movement? What has the Brotherhood got to offer as an inducement? Perhaps you will say that we ought to be unselfish and help to enlist other men. Yes, but for what purpose? On the other hand suppose that next Sunday morning I could go before the class and say that the Brotherhood of the Disciples is massing in a great fight on intemperance, or is planning to build a college in Bolenge, or is going to scientifically tackle the Tenement Problem or some other great, big worthy thing, how quick would be the ringing response. Men would line up on a thing like that. Not all of them, but enough to do business.

I do not care to press my point beyond reason. I believe there is solid truth in my suggestion. I believe the history of other movements teach definiteness and that the ultimate history of this movement will so read. I certainly hope that my position may be clearly appreciated. I am a friend of the Brotherhood. I am a friend of its leaders. I do not criticise, I suggest. Let the suggestion go for precisely what it is worth among our men of judgment, among whom none are more worthy to decide than Mr. P. C. Macfarlane and Mr. R. A. Long.

New Graded Lessons

The superiority of the new graded lessons consists largely in their increased simplicity. The horizon of children of beginners' age, from three to six, is exceedingly limited. They need the most simple truths, presented as attractively as possible, with frequent opportunities for review. See advertisement on page 4.

Each course in the new graded series naturally leads to the next above it, hence one gets somewhere by following them.

December.

BY EMMA A. LENTE.

The year has nothing left to give
  Of bud or bloom, or gentle breeze,
Or singing birds:—the other months
  Have taken each and all of these.
The harvests have been garnered in,
  And naught is left but frost and snow
And rifled fields, and leafless trees,
  O'er which the chilling North wind blow.
But, meek December takes his place,
  And holds it with a sturdy will,—
Knowing the Year is waxing old,
  Feels love and pity for him still.
And, though the earlier months were blessed
  With all the good Year could provide,
December has one jewel rare,—
  No other month has Christmas-tide.
And holding this within his heart,
  December like a loyal friend,
Foregoes all else and kindly keeps
  Step with the Old Year to the end.

Tiger

MISS Z. I. DAVIS.

"There's a pack of wolves coming," and the cowboy hurried into his garments while the tenderfoot gathered himself together from his midnight couch from whence he had been aroused. "We'll have to be quick if we save the horses," exclaimed the first speaker, leading the way with the lighted lantern and fuel for a bon-fire.

"How did you come to wake up?" came the question, sleepily.

"I heard the dog whine and knew something was wrong. I cautiously approached the corral and saw two wolves playing around the animals like kittens. As soon as they caught sight of me, they moved off into the sage brush. I knew that they were out for business and that we must bestir ourselves if we would save the mustangs."

"I have the guns with me and plenty of ammunition," replied Tenderfoot.

As the solitary ray of the lantern shot through the darkness, a number of shaggy, gray forms were seen skulking back into the shadows. When the beasts had fled far enough, both men loaded their guns and continued to shoot at them as long as the ammunition lasted.

Finally Tenderfoot said, "I do not hear one of the creatures howling."

"There's no trusting them if any are alive," replied the cow-boy as he vigorously piled up the brush and lighted a blaze. "I shouldn't be surprised if some of them had a nest close by," he added.

"Wolves' pelts bring a good bounty. Shall we go and see how many we have?" asked Tenderfoot, swinging his lantern high in air to make sure the way was clear. The flames of the brush heap were now mounting higher and higher, so that it was almost as light as day where they stood. The heavy rain of the day before would prevent the fire from spreading.

"We'll have to keep this brush burning the rest of the night, if we would save our ponies," exclaimed the cowboy.

But Tenderfoot did not hear him, as he was busy gathering up the wolves that they had slain, preparatory to removing their hides.

"That isn't a bad night's work," he answered between puffs for breath as he carried another large fork full of fagots to freshen the blaze. I'll be there to help in a few minutes."

It was almost morning before the hides were ready for market. "I'll cut across this piece of woods," said the cowboy, taking part of the pelts, "and have breakfast ready for you when you come."

Keeping along in the path around the clearing, Tenderfoot came to a turn in the road bordered by a bunch of copsewood. There were fresh tracks over the earth that lay loose as if some creature had been digging an opening. Laying down his bundle for a few minutes he stooped to examine the place. Drawing out several feet of earth, he suddenly came upon a bunch of warm fur. Yes, there lay an innocent looking little creature as cunning as a kitten.

Gathering up the skins in one hand and his strange pet in the other, he hurried on to the "study" as he playfully called the shanty of his friend. The odor of fried chicken and warm rolls helped to quicken his pace.

"Breakfast is all ready," greeted the cowboy, coming to the door at that moment to drain the potatoes. "Whatever have you there?" he asked, pausing in the open with his steaming kettle.

"Guess," he laughed, holding out the blinking creature for his closer inspection.

"A baby wolf as sure as I live. You have done well for a beginner. What are you going to do with it?" "Keep it for a pet," he replied. Tenderfoot was a college student, spending his vacation as a young supply preacher in the west. Unexpectedly he had met with a former schoolmate, now following the occupation of cowboy, and had stopped with him for a short time in his solitary life on the plains. He fed the young wolf milk and wild meat. It grew rapidly and thrived under his kind and systematic care.

"What are you going to name it?" asked his friend one day.

"How would Tiger sound?" he asked, with a smile.

"I presume it will not be a misnomer," was the reply. "No doubt it will grow into its title. But I hope it will never play Little Red Riding Hood with you," he added.

One day in late summer Tenderfoot was called to preach in an Indian village. They had recently erected a new church and today it was to be dedicated. The people came from miles around and as they expected to spend the entire day in services, Bible school and prayer meeting, they unhitched their horses, fastened them in the large roomy shed and fastened the door as a means of safety against any stray wild animal.

The pastor student had brought Tiger with him and had chained him just outside of the entrance at the rear of the church. When the hour for opening the services approached, the new church was packed to the doors. The minister had been preaching for about a half an hour when the cry of "F I R E" rang out on the air.

"The horse shed is burning up and the church is in danger," shouted the men nearest the door. The Indians swarmed out of the building to the scene of the fire. The roof was already ablaze. In vain they worked to get the horses out. The halters of the poor beasts were burned off, and they were all running up and down the floor of the long shed, kicking and whinneying with fright. The women shrieked and the men groaned.

The student pastor calmly approached the doomed building and was about to enter, but the men warned him not to go in. "No living being can get the horses out alive," they said. With a few quick orders, he sent some of the boys for water to prevent the fire from spreading to the church. Then throwing back the barn doors, exposing the poor, terrified animals to all eyes, he unleashed the wolf at his side and set him upon the horses. All the fury of Tiger seemed aroused as he took in the situation, and realized what was expected of him. He sprang into the enclosure, biting the horses heels, leaping at their throats and scrambling upon their backs, tormenting them with paw and fang until they were glad to rush into the open where they were quickly driven to a place of safety. He did not desert his post until the last horse had stumbled out of the blinding, suffocating smoke.

Not one of the animals was seriously injured. Finally after the horses were all safely tethered, Tiger, scorched and panting, limped to his master's side. The Indians, much pleased with the animal's faithfulness, gathered round him to stroke his sides, and give him a drink of milk, and rub oil on his wounds. But the poor creature was terribly burned. He gave his master a grateful look for the drink but refused to touch it. Licking his master's hand, he crouched at his feet and with a low, mournful howl, rolled over and died.

The Indians were deeply moved. They were so glad that their horses had been saved, and that the fire was put out. "We will never shoot another wolf," said they, "unless it is absolutely necessary."

The Cigarett-Smoking Boy

Prof. Wm. A. McKeever, of the State Agricultural College, Manhattan, Kansas, is publishing for the assistance of parents a series of free bulletins on the problems relative to the home training of boys and girls. The two numbers thus far issued are, "The Cigarette-Smoking Boy," and "Teaching the Boy to Save." This cigarette bulletin ought to be read by every school boy and by his parents, for it sets forth in a clear, scientific manner the serious effects of the cigarette habit. The author has made a study of 2,500 cigarette-smoking school boys and gives pictures to show how weak their hearts are, and other data indicating the mental, moral and physical debility of such boys. All interested persons are urged to order this pamphlet in quantities at one cent per copy and to distribute it where it will do good.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER III.

Alonzo Sustains His Reputation.

A week passed and Alonzo admitted that his suspicions of B. F. Mullins were unfounded. His visit to the Works brought no outward results, Dick Randall showed no anxiety, orders came in freely, they were running on full time, and there was not so much as a hint of reduced wages. He thought himself a great fool to worry over a trouble that never would materialize and he resolved, for the thousandth time, to cross no more bridges till he came to them.

After a rather trying day he reached home tired and discouraged. Several trifling things had gone wrong and he was glad to take his ease free from annoyances. He sat on the back porch in his shirt sleeves, cooling off, his feet thrust into a pair of loose, shapeless old slippers, and had read every word of gossip in the Carlinville Clarion.

Presently Susan joined him, her hands yet red and moist from dish-washing.

"Well, Lon, I'm glad to see you takin' it easy!" she said, cheerfully, as she seated herself on the upper step of the porch, work in hand, for there were yet some hours of daylight and she did not propose to waste a moment of it. "If a man ain't happy in his own home, I don't know what it's for, I say."

Alonzo was not expected to make reply or comment on Susan's remarks when they were of a general nature. Instead, he stretched his thin arms above his head and yawned prodigiously so that his face was twisted into strange contortions. He meant no disrespect to Susan's sentiments, it was merely an expression of perfect physical comfort after a long day's work in the hot engine-room.

"How well the garden's lookin'!" Susan went on. "Them beans grow so fast you can fairly see 'em; and we're goin' to have a sight of cucumbers; I'll have all the pickles I want and some to sell.

Alonzo scanned the garden with the slow, stolid gaze of a gentle ox, for much the same reason. It represented hours of spading and digging and hoeing; fighting beetles and cutworms and he took much satisfaction in its flourishing condition.

Ned was grubbing in a little patch where he was allowed to amuse himself, in imitation of his father's more serious labors. He was resetting some spindling plants which had undergone this process many times and yet miraculously survived. Long-drawn, wheezy notes came from the cabinet organ which proved that Eldora too was occupied.

The sun was setting; the [illegible] flushed with soft, opalesc[illegible] tints while in the zenith, still an unc[illegible], swallows darted and soared, now circl[illegible] close above the house tops, uttering their shrill, sweet cries. The brown toad that lived under a stone hopped soberly across the walk to his evening foraging among the young plants. There was a delicious coolness in the air from the chill of dew and the scent of lilies.

Susan's heart was filled with thankfulness; home, husband, children—all these were hers and she pitied the desolate everywhere to whom such blessings had been denied.

Soon Ned, tired of his labors, crept into her lap and pressed his white head against her ample breast. His limp little figure clad in blue overalls began to relax with the languor of drowsiness till he slept. Susan subdued her tones, gossiping of the affairs of the works, wondering if they would shut down during August.

Suddenly the door bell sounded a prolonged "C-h-u-u-r-r" which startled them.

"I'll go," said Alonzo, rising slowly. He entered the house, and presently Susan heard him say:

"Howdy! Won't you walk in?"

She knew from his careful tone that the caller was a stranger. She too rose, and carried the sleeping child upstairs to bed. She bent over him, fast asleep, and said tenderly: "Bless his little heart! He jess plays till he's all wore out."

Then she stole softly from the room and went downstairs again. She heard her husband's voice from the other room, and another—thin, raucous, monotonous—which did not impress her favorably.

"Some dead-beat tryin' to git round Lon, I know!" she said with conviction. "Somebody tryin' to sell him a book he don't need, or another plush album, or a washin' machine and he'll git took in—he always does—if I don't stop it!"

She joined Alonzo in the parlor, where she found the voluble visitor seated on the sofa, "makin' himself at home," as she at once noted.

"Susan, let me make you 'quainted with Mr. Gates; Mr. Gates, let me make you 'quainted with Mrs. Johnson—my wife!" he said, solemnly.

The visitor rose and extended a damp, bony hand which Susan took gingerly, as if it were a wet rag of which she was a little doubtful.

A close view of Mr. Gates was not reassuring. One of Lon's weaknesses, Susan knew from painful experience, was ready yielding to the importunities of traveling agents, evidences of which were the big plush album, "that he didn't need no more'n a cat needed two tails," as she said regretfully; fruit trees that failed to live up to their reputation; a patent rocking-chair that cruelly pinched the fingers of the unwary; a big swinging lamp, encircled by prisms that jingled loudly, and sent up clouds of ill-smelling smoke.

Mr. Gates handed Susan a card, which was none too clean, on which a bird of unknown ornithology,—a mass of fine pen strokes, with every appearance of swift flight,—bore in his bill a floating streamer inscribed with the name of the visitor. He had at one period of his career been a writing-teacher, and this was an example of his best "pen flourishing."

Susan took it and seated herself in a rocking chair, which emitted a sound of some sort of a disordered machine as she oscillated to and fro. She was "sizin' up" Mr. Gates, and decided at once that he was "shifty."

"Mr. Gates is the walkin' delegate from the National Board of Directors of the Olive Branch Court of Knights of Industry," Alonzo explained hesitatingly. He knew pretty well how this piece of information would be received and he was not disappointed.

Susan stiffened instantly; she elevated her round chin, her eyes flashed, and she cleared her throat.

"Ind-e-e-d! and where's he walkin' from and where does he walk to, when he leaves here?"

Her manner was unmistakable. Alonzo was uncomfortable; he knew Snusan's opinion of "walking delegates" only too well. "Jest fellers that go round the country representin' 'the cause of labor,' puttin' up at the best hotels, travelin' in Pullman cars, stirrin' up trouble. And workin'men that can hardly make both ends meet a supportin' 'em! And they believe all they say about bein' 'ground down' under the boss's heels. Think of anybody bein' ground under Dick Randall's heels! I reckon there's plenty more just like him; the world's a big place. When the walkin' delegate rolls up his sleeves and goes to work hisself I'll take a little more stock in him! There h'ain't half of 'em that could earn their salt in the shops!" she had more than once hotly protested.

Holding these extreme views, it may be inferred that Susan's greeting was not cordial. Alonzo stirred nervously, anticipating trouble.

"Mrs. Johnson will have her little joke, I see," said Mr. Gates urbanely, as if to humor Susan's facetious mood. "Many of the ladies are like that."

"Talks 's if he thought I was born a fool!" muttered Susan none too softly.

She looked at him steadily; she did not appreciate his cheap patronage and she did not want his approval.

"What trade was you brought up to, Mr.—Mr.—" and she consulted the card to refresh her memory—"Mr. Gates?"

"Well, ma'am, I've turned my hand to several."

"And what were they?" she persisted.

"Well, I tried it in the iron works in Ft. Wayne for a while, but my lungs was so weak that the iron filin's was bad fer me. Then I learned type-settin', and aftter that I clerked in a grocery a while and then I opened a business college."

"You ain't a very 'long sufferin' worker'—are you? Tried a heap o' things, ain't you?"

Alonzo cleared his thoat again; if she had only not come into the room.

"Yes,—he—he—he—! 'jack of all trades, good at none'!"

"I shouldn't have said that—myself!" said Susan with strong emphasis.

"Come, Susan! You're a little too rough," remonstrated Alonzo gently, at the same time thinking, "The sooner she gits her say out the sooner she'll quit!"

"How long have you been a labor leader?" was her next question.

"About two years, ma'am."

"You seem to have made it pay!"

"The laborer is worthy of his hire! You'll find that in Holy Writ."

"I know my Scripter!" she retorted acridly. "I'm workin' day in an' day out for the cause of Labor," said Gates. "The cause of the workin' man's dearer to me than life; I do my best, but I got to live!"

Susan gazed at him with a speculative eye. He was the glass of fashion and the mold of man. He was clad in a suit of fine summer serge; his linen was of the best and perfectly laundered. The shoes encasing his slender, arched feet were well-fitting and expensive and he wore upon the third finger of his left hand a ring of black enamel with a large set inlaid with a glittering "G"—the only false note in his otherwise harmonious toilette. He held a slender cane in one hand and a new straw hat in the other. He was not ill-looking in this expensive garb, except for his weak and somewhat vicious expression.

Mr. Gates was not sensitive. He had found long before this in the course of his varied career, "that the men were easy enough to manage, it was their wives that raised the deuce! While there were a few that turned in and fought with the boys, there wasn't many and if the women had their way there'd never be a strike, and they'd down every Union in the land."

It was yet light,—the long, delicious twilight of summer,—and Susan took out her knitting and fell to work with an energy that somewhat relieved Alonzo's anxiety. It would occupy her and give the walking delegate a chance; for he prided himself upon hearing impartially both sides of a case, the plea of indefinite natures who mistake irresolution for justice.

"These are perilous times, Mrs. Johnson," said Mr. Gates, in the oratorical manner of the platform, deciding finally that he must "get down to business." He addressed himself to her, perceiving that it was she who was to be convinced.

"It's the first I've heard of it. We seem to be gittin' along all right here," and Susan glanced around the little parlor which was the pride of her eye. Its Brussels carpet and couch to match, the green rep covered chairs, the center table with the plush-bound album which she secretly admired although she had scolded Alonzo for buying it; her own cabinet organ and the swinging lamp, all were regarded by her less fortunate neighbors as the acme of luxury.

"Labor and capital are now arrayed against each other," continued Gates impressively, "either the laborer must surrender or the capitalist be taught, once for all, that he cannot engage unrebuked in the sordid traffic in human flesh and blood." Alonzo's jaw had slightly fallen in amazement at his glibness but Susan said audibly:

"Ah, pshaw!" and knitted harder than ever. Gates talked fluently, he had been a fair scholar and he prided himself on his command of language and on occasions like this was apt to quote freely from his set speeches.

"I couldn't imagine a man like Dick Randall a-grindin' men under his heels!"—and Susan sniffed disconcertingly.

"Mr. Randall is exceptional; there are few like him, and you'll see that he'll not be able to stand out against the growin' influence of the times."

"I guess Dick'll manage to hold his own. Nobody's never downed him yet!" Alonzo proffered this remark, his first contribution to the conversation—or verbal duet—between his wife and Gates. His loyalty to Dick was touched.

"He can't help himself, when his time comes. It's smooth sailing now, Mr. Johnson, but when the trusts are ready to rake him in, if the Governor called out the whole State Militia he couldn't save him! The heads of the trusts don't fight with powder and shot; they kill with a freeze-out. It takes longer, but it's sure, and a good deal less noisy. I know that Mr. Randall's men have nothing to complain of," he added. "We keep a record of the way the shops all over the country are run. Our men are on the lookout and report to us. But we want the backing and moral support of just such men as his hands. We want you to come into the organization for the good it will do the Cause."

"We've never had no need of unions and lodges," Alonzo replied doggedly, "and from what I can find out about 'em they seem to be run by a few fellers that manage to feather their nests whichever way a strike goes!"

"That's so!" exclaimed Susan, heartily indorsing her husband's opinion.

"I never set up to be no scholar, and I never was good at argufyin'—I leave that to my wife"—and his plain features brightened with a faint smile of pride, "but I must say that I've never heard tell of a single case where anything was gained by all this everlastin' scrappin' between the men and the bosses,—I don't purtend to say that the men hain't never put upon and that they don't have to stand a lot of things that's hard to bear; but it seems to me that they're ready to take advantage too whenever thay can! And I hain't got a bit o' faith in the fellers they choose for leaders and spokesmen."

"That's what's the matter!" cried Susan, wagging her head energetically. "And," siezing her chance, "the men workin' in the shops pay the walkin delegates' bills, an' they live on the fat of the land an' wear good clothes all the time and put up at the best hotels as I've already said!"

"They must do credit to the working men's cause," said Gates, apologetically.

"There's other ways besides flingin' money right and left, that they couldn't earn if they worked by the day, to save their lives," she retorted tartly.

Gates was becoming tired of Susan's interference. He wished she would go away that he might talk to Alonzo alone. There was little prospect that he would succeed otherwise, but she showed no inclination to retire and he could not put her out of her own parlor.

Night was now drawing in, one or two stars glimmered where the lingering light of sunset was fading. The voices of children at play in the road were clear and distant. A robin upon the very topmost bough of the elm sung his plaintive good-night. Susan could no longer see to knit and she put aside her work.

"I never heard tell of any real, lastin' good comin' out of workin' men's squabbles," said Alonzo, taking up the thread of the argument at the point where Susan had interrupted him. "What, with the loss of wages, the injury to the business that forces the bosses to shut up the shops and quit—both parties gits wore out with it all. It costs more'n it comes to and it's usually over some triflin' thing,—pure silliness of fellers that think they're doin' somethin' big,—that really wasn't worth thinkin' about."

"That's mighty right!" ejaculated Susan admiringly.

"Well, I'm sorry I can't make you see it my way, Mr. Johnson!" said Gates rising.

He had learned to know his man, and he was conscious that nothing could be done with the husband, even if the better half were not to be reckoned with, as she obviously was. "But you will some day," he added.

"I can wait," replied Alonzo, "I'm in no hurry to find out. Mind, I'm only speakin' for myself. I don't want to join no organization. I can't pay dues and everlastin' assessments. I'd ruther pay the money into the Buildin'-and-Loan. The other men can do as they please but we'd hate to have strife stirred up, for we've always got along peaceable at the Works. Dick Randall's not goin' to hinder you, neither. All he asks of his men is to do the work he pays them for. What they do outside he don't consider any of his business!" Gates bowed distantly to Susan and held out his hand quite cordially to Alonzo, a difference the keen-witted woman noticed and chuckled over. She had made herself felt!

As he stepped briskly down the front walk and opened the gate she looked after him with strong disapproval.

"Them's the fellers that's at the bottom of all the trouble. I meant folks like him when I was a hintin' about it!"

"'Hintin,'" said Alonzo mildly. "It was a good deal more'n that! I guess he wasn't in no manner of doubt about what you meant, Susan!"

Woman's Sphere

—Mrs. Russell Sage has given $10,000 to the State Federation of Women's Clubs provided the federation will raise $12,500 more. The object of the gift is to provide an endowment for the federation out of which the expenses of the officers may be paid and to found a scholarship in some woman's college.

—Miss Gina Krog of Christiania has been nominated by the Radical party of Norway for deputy in the Parliamentary elections now pending. Miss Krog visited the United States last spring on her way to the International Council of Women in Toronto. She delivered several lectures to suffrage societies in New York and spoke to the Norwegian women in Brooklyn.

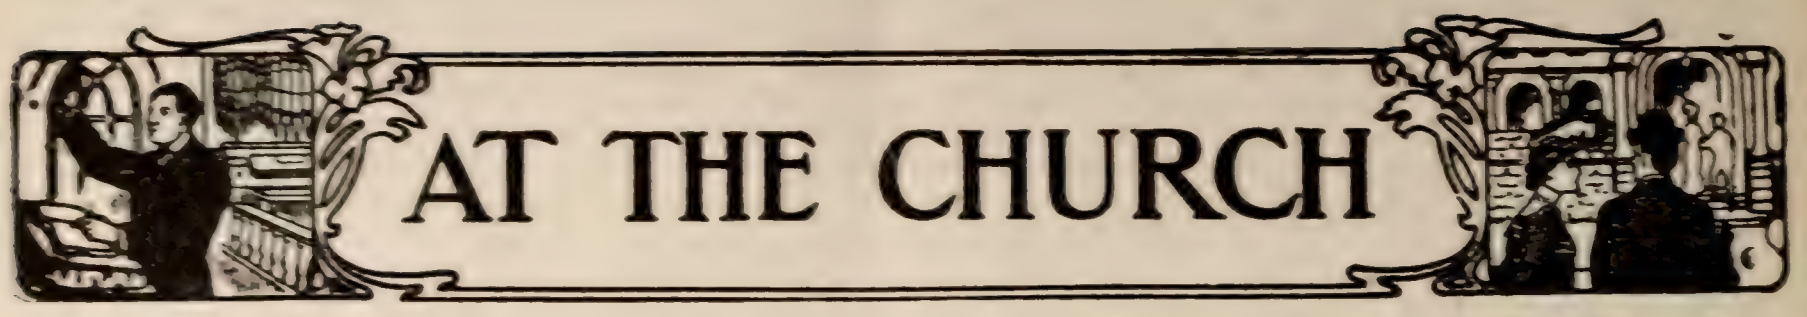
—"Queen Elena of Italy," says a contributor to a December magazine, "is one of the most unpopular queens in Europe. Her court, which, to meet the tastes of her people, should be bright, popular, brilliant, is really the dullest, the most stupid in the Western World. I have lived in many countries, and I am more or less familiar with all the courts of Europe, but never have I heard a queen so universally spoken of with disrespect and disapproval by her own court. Queen Elena in an American phrase, 'plays to the gallery,' then retires. She garners the wheat and ignores the chaff. She is quick to figure in dramatic exploits, but reluctant to submit to the daily grind."

—Recently a man employed in the royal Italian hunting grounds in the Stura Valley, while driving a chamois under the king's gun was badly hurt by a stone falling from the mountain. The poor fellow, a widower, had to be taken to a hospital, leaving his two children at home quite alone. On hearing of this pitiful case Queen Elena ordered the two children to be received as guests at the Royal Castle of Racconigi during their father's illness, and to be the playmates of the little princesses and the prince of Piedmont.

—The aged Dowager Queen of Sweden, who has arrived in London and will spend a great part of the winter in Great Britain, is a patron of the Salvation Army, which, owing to her support, has had considerable success in Sweden. At one time, short of actually wearing the uniform, she was an out and out member of the Salvation Army and contributed very largely to its funds.

—Miss Alice Fischer travelled all the way from New York to Cheyenne, Wyo., to cast her vote in the recent elections. The trip cost in the neighborhood of $200.

—Toiling at the windlass in her brother's clothes is the experience of Miss Laura White of San Francisco, now a wealthy mine owner in Nevada. She discovered the vein and worked it herself.



—Miss Stella Josephine Feiler of Harris county, Texas, lately received a fee said to amount to $150,000 from ten land owners upon whose property she located two productive oil wells. According to report Miss Feiler has accumulated $500,000 by locating oil in Texas.

The Wanderer

Upon the mountain height, far from the sea,
I found a shell:
And to my listening ear the lonely thing
Ever a song of the ocean seemed to sing—
Ever a tale of ocean seemed to tell.

How came the shell upon that mountain height?
Ah, who san say?
Whether there dropped by some too careless hand.
Or whether there cast when ocean swept the land.
Ere the Eternal had ordained the day.

Strange, was it not! Far from its native deep,
One song it sang—
Sang of the awful mysteries of the tide.
Sang of the misty sea, profound and wide.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Paul's Last Years*

In guessing at the life of the apostle Paul it is natural that we should be impressed by the journeys he made as a missionary of Jesus Christ. One of the most valuable records of his work is found in a book by Professor W. M. Ramsey with the suggestive title, "St. Paul, the Traveler and the Roman Citizen." This emphasizes the two elements of Paul's career that have been most prominent in the thought of those who have tried to understand his importance to Christianity. His journeys took him out from the center of his operations at Antioch almost to the limits of the world as men knew it then. In the Epistle to the Romans he asserts that his work has extended from Jerusalem to Illyricum on the Mediterranean coast, and he was at that time planning still further journeys as far as Rome and Spain.

Roman Freedom.

But Paul's Roman citizenship was of almost equal significance in securing to him the title of the "Apostle to the Gentiles." It was this Roman citizenship which no doubt gave Paul his broad conception of the importance of Christianity, as no mere Jewish reformation but a world religion which, like the Roman empire, was destined to conquer all things in its path, but, unlike the Roman empire, was certain to endure. Paul's Roman franchise made him a free man in the sense in which only the more fortunate of his generation could claim that badge of nobility. And it also aided him not infrequently in securing for himself freedom from persecution, or at least immunity from the infliction of corporal punishment where other men would have fallen easy victims to Rome's contempt for all things that did not belong to her life. To be sure Paul did not owe to his Roman citizenship the saving of his life in the temple court at Jerusalem, but he did claim the Roman privilege immediately afterward when, in the castle at Antonia, he called the officer to account for preparing to scourge him, a Roman and uncondemned. His appeal to Caesar was also made possible by this same right, and it secured for him the transportation to the world's capital which might otherwise have been impossible for him to attain.

Paul's Residences.

But Paul was more than a traveler and a Roman citizen. He was for considerable periods a dweller in some of the most important cities of the world. Our first impression from the reading of the second part of the Book of Acts is that Paul was constantly on the road, going here and there in the work of a preacher. But this is only a superficial view of the matter. Most of his time was spent in residence in some city where he was busy preaching the gospel. Such cities were Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth and Rome. In the lessons of this quarter we have the record of but one such experience. That was his stay in Caesarea. There he remained two years as prisoner in one of the apartments of Herod's palace. Almost nothing is told us of Paul's doings during this imprisonment. It was once thought that perhaps some of the letters of the captivity, such as Ephesians, Colossians and Philippians were written at this time. But this view no longer prevails. With the exception of those brief interviews which Paul had with officials, of which we have some partial record in Acts, we know nothing of the way in which he spent his time. And yet those two years in the prison at Caesarea and the two years in Rome up to the time when the Book of Acts suddenly closes the account of his life, occupy the larger part of the period covered by the lessons of the quarter. Paul was a resident of imperial prisons as well as of imperial cities. How interesting a narrative would these unrecorded experiences of his make!

Fragments of Biography.

We are very fortunate in possessing so full a record of Paul's career from the hands of his close friend and associate, Luke. To be sure the narrative in Acts is only brief, and as compared with the lives of other famous men it seems insignificant. The present year, for example, has seen some remarkable biographies published. Among them those of Carl Schurz, Henry M. Stanley and Dr. Washington Gladden. But these books run to hundreds of pages, every one of which contains material of interest. Yet here is the life of the greatest man who moved in the centers of the Roman empire, and the record that covers all we know of his activity and character would fill less space than the contents of the morning paper. This fact of the extreme brevity of the New Testament records makes every word of them doubly precious, and leads us to careful estimation of Luke's method in setting down the story of Paul's life.

Luke the Physician.

It is perhaps to Luke's fondness for travel and his wide acquaintance with seafaring experiences that we owe the careful details of Paul's voyage to Rome, which occupied so much of the quarter's study. Both in the Gospel and in the Book of Acts Luke displays his fondness for nautical terms and the details of shipping and water travel. Seaports seem to have had a fascination for him, and the vocabulary of the sailors of his age was familiar to him. There was only one other phase of life that seems to have so fully engaged his attention, and that was the physical condition of the people he met. Luke was a physician, and his knowledge of diseases and remedies seems to have been extensive. We have an example of this in the statement regarding the father of Publius, the chief officer of the island of Melita, and the work of Paul and of Luke in bringing relief to the sick people upon the island.

Paul the Sufferer.

Perhaps nothing gives us a more impressive idea of Paul's greatness than the fact that although almost every lesson of this quarter has some relation to experiences as a sufferer for Christ, there is nothing ain all the writings of the apostle wnie hrfeer spseifically to any event of this long series. His arrest in Jerusalem, the mob violence in the court of the temple, when he barely escaped with his life, the renewed effort to reach him as he stood at the top of the stairway leading into the tower, the orders for his flogging, his uncomfortable experience as a Roman prisoner in Jerusalem, his extreme danger as he went to and from the Sanhedrin and faced the animosity of its members, the long and hard night journey by which he was taken from Jerusalem to Caesarea, the two years of incarceration in the Roman prison at Caesarea, in an age when prison experiences were usually unspeakable, the dangers and at last the horrors of the long and desperate voyage to Rome, the cold, the exposure, the hunger and thirst of those awful days which were almost as dark as night, the tremendous hazards of the final hours when the ship went to pieces and its living freight struggled in the boiling sea, the wet and chill of the coast on which they landed, and the desperate efforts to find comfort in the fires that were kindled along the beach, the three months of waiting in a strange land while a ship was being found for the remainder of the journey, the launching afresh upon the sea that had treated them so unkindly, and the passage through that narrow channel between Sicily and Italy, which had seen the wreck of so many ships, the land journey on foot from Puteoli to Rome, the peril of interview with the emperor Nero, a tyrant whose caprice might have cut short almost without a word the career of the man who had gone through such perils and suffering to win the right of speech in Rome, the years of prisonerhood under constant surveillance of a Roman guard, and the tragic end, whatever it may have been and whenever it may have occurred—these are some of the events which have found chronicle or suggestion in Luke's narrative.

And yet of not one of them does Paul speak directly in any of the writings left to us. He thought not of himself but of the cause that was upon his heart. His interests were not those of personal comfort, but rather were connected wholly with the faith which he preached. He sought not great things for himself, but for the Christ whom he loved. Indeed, he sought not even the commonest comforts for his own weakened body and tired brain, but only the privilege of spending the remnant of his days in the glorious task which he counted above all reward.

The Epistles.

The writings of this period we fortunately possess, at least in part. The four letters of the Roman imprisonment, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon and Ephesians, give us some idea of what was passing in Paul's mind during these months. The most beautiful of them is Philippians, with its tender recital of Paul's own experiences as prisoner which he counted as nothing, for the furtherance of the gospel. The one to Philemon is the most intimate, and was perhaps never intended by the apostle for any eye but that of his good friend, the leading member of the little church at Collossæ. The Epistle to the Colossians, addressed to that same church that met in Philemon's home, is far removed from any indications of regret or complaining, and moves in those far uplands of rapturous contemplation of the life and work of the Master he so tenderly loved. The letter to the Ephesians seems little like a message to the church where Paul had spent three years of his active life. And for that very reason it has been thought by many to be a copy of a circular letter that Paul sent to all the churches, the Ephesian draft of it being the one that survived.

These epistles supplement very essentially the fragmentary narrative of Acts, and show us the heart of the apostle Paul during those years when he ought to have been most depressed and discouraged as human enterprises are reckoned. But with him no day was wasted. The great balance sheet of his life is struck in the Epistle to the Philippians, where, after enumerating some of the difficulties which confronted him as a missionary, and setting down some of the joys which belonged to the great task, he draws the balance in the words, "Rejoice evermore, and again I say, rejoice."

Waiting for the End.

No wonder that such a man, so intent upon the diffusion of that message which had been committed in an especial sense to him, could feel that after he had used these restless and feverish years to preach that gospel to the full limit of his strength, he was entitled to such confidence in the outcome as suffered no moment's eclipse of doubt or fear. He had run with patience the race set before him. He had kept the faith as the Roman soldier kept his shield. He had fought with all his strength, and knew that in such a conflict he could not lose. At the end of the race there was the palm of triumph. Seated upon the throne of the universe was his Lord, holding in his hand the diadem which rewarded faithful service. He was ready to go. His work was accomplished; his task was ended. He was not without hope that some further time might be allotted for the continuance of his work, but he could not expect much further lease of life. In the cold of the Roman winter he only hoped that his young friend Timothy might reach him with the cloak, the books and the parchments from Troas before the end should come. And thus we leave him in the twilight, watching the setting sun, but knowing that the morning shall be more glorious with the rising of a sun that shall never go down.

SING ME A SONG.

Sing me a song of the happy days:
Lilting the notes of some joyful lays;
Sing me a song that is fresh as dew;
Sing me a song of the good and true.

Sing me a song of the glad and bright,
Filling my pathway with hope and light.
Sing me a song that will help and cheer;
Drive from my heart ev'ry lurking fear.

Sing me a song of the brave and strong,
Ready for battle against each wrong.
Sing me a song of the strength of right;
Sing of the victory in the fight.

Sing me a song of beauty and grace;
Shining in life, and from face to face.
Sing me a song of sweet peace and calm;
Soothing my soul with its healing balm.

Sing me a song that will help me on;
Banish the night and bring radiant dawn;
Sing till my soul mounts the upper blue;
Heaven's more real, and man more true.

THE PHILIPPIAN CHURCH'S TREATMENT OF PAUL THE AGED.

Topic, Dec. 15: Phil. 4:10-20.

"The dignity and tact with which Paul treats this delicate subject have been remarked by all expositors from the Fathers down. Lightfoot has justly observed that Paul had given to the Philippians the surest pledge of confidence which could be given by a high-minded and sensitive man, to whom it was of the highest importance, for the sake of the great cause he had advocated, to avoid the slightest breath of suspicion, and whose motives nevertheless were narrowly scanned and unscrupulously misrepresented. He had placed himself under pecuniary obligations to them. With his tone of manly independence and self-respect, mingles his grateful recognition of their care for him and a delicate consideration for their feelings. He will not doubt that they have never ceased to remember him, and have never relaxed their eagerness to minister to him, although circumstances have prevented their ministry. Yet he values their gift principally as an expression of the spirit of Christ in them, and as evidence of their Christian proficiency. He can give their generosity no higher praise, no higher mark of appreciation and gratitude, than to say it was a sacrifice of sweet odor to God. He is not raised above human huffering. Their gift was timely and welcome: yet if it had not come, he was independent of human contingencies. They have not only given him money, but they have given him Christian love and sympathy and ministry-fruit of his apostolic work."—Harvin R. Vincent.

Self-Respect and Giving.

Giving to save the face does not promote self-respect on the part of the giver. Some give money in order that they may not be disturbed in their pursuit of gain or of pleasure. The disciple of Jesus gives money because he has first given himself to the service of his Master. It is the need of men, not their importunity, that moves him to act for their relief. He is therefore as careful in his selection of the persons and institutions that are to receive his aid as he is in the selection of his partner in business and of his bank. Men who complain that their generosity has been abused are often themselves to blame. They have given in order to get rid of a troubleosme solicitor or from mere impulse. They cannot foresee all the results of their actions but they are under obligation to see as far as they can. Giving is a part of the main purpose of an intelligent Christian. He gives for the same reason that he chooses his occupation, that he may confer some benefit upon somebody. He will not engage in a business that depends for its success upon the degradation of human beings or one that compels others to toil for him without receiving what is their due. The Philippians, after they became Christians, felt that it was their business not only to live in the spirit of Jesus before their neighbors but also to share in the life of the church universal. Their contribution went, not to Paul the man, but to Paul the apostle of Jesus Christ. He represented to them the missionary spirit of the church. In helping him they were helping to extend the influence of Christianity.

Self-Respect and Receiving.

It was as a servant of Jesus Christ that Paul accepted the bounty of the Philippians. They were partakers with him of a grace in the defence and confirmation of the gospel. In the past men have willingly supported armies to fight for them and the soldier has accepted this support as a partial reward for his services. In the more civilized parts of the world the teacher has come to be regarded as more important than the soldier and democratic communities willingly spend their money for teaching. The support which the church gives to its ministry is a measure of its appreciation of the ideals for which the church stands. The ministers are men called by the church to interpret life in terms of religion, to warn men against forgetting what is worth while and to keep alive faith in the eternal goodness. Does the church believe the ministers are doing their duty? Does it believe they are of any value in the world? It will provide for them in accordance with its estimate of their worth. And they, if they are real men, will

Church Life

The Christian Century seeks to be discriminating in its publication of news. It would discourage the spirit that finds great satisfaction in seeing one's name in the paper; but it wants the items of news that really have value for the readers. Many are responding to our recent request that church bulletins be sent the office.

The department "Religious Education" appears again this week after several weeks' absence, caused by the demands made on our space by the material relating to the Centennial convention. The Christian Century is now prepared to fill orders for the best graded lessons.

The Christian Century, December 30, will publish excerpts from Christmas sermons. To help us to this will our friends not send to the office by Thursday, December 23, the topic of their sermon with as much of an excerpt or outline as can be written on a postal card. Copy must reach the office by Thursday, December 23.

R. W. Abberly has recently assisted W. M. Long and the church at Clarkesburg, Mo., in a meeting, in which there were sixty-five additions to the church; many of these the pastor says came from other denominations, and yet the work of the evangelist was such that no animosities were aroused. The men's club of the Methodist church attended the meeting in a body one evening.

Joseph T. Holton has but recently closed a meeting at Blanche, Ky., in which there were forty-four accessions in fifteen days. Twenty-one of the additions were by confession. There were twenty-three accessions to the church, and the minister writes that the entire community as well as the church were greatly helped by the ministry of Mr. Richardson.

The Central Church, Boise, Ida., has for a time freed its pastor, L. A. Chapman from the duties of calling and other engagements during the week and sent him out to places where new churches are needed, to hold meetings, and rally the religious forces of the towns, returning to his pulpit on Sunday. While the pastor is away the calling is taken care of by the membership itself, and this is further supplemented by letter writing on the part of nearly every member.

F. W. Collins, Garnett, Kans., is being greeted each Sunday by large audiences, and everything in the church is moving encouragingly. There has been a notable increase in attendance of the Sunday-school, which is thoroughly graded and using a thoroughly graded system of lessons. Richard Martin, national evangelist, of the "Martin Family" of Chicago, closed his year's work with two lectures in the Alva and McAlester, Okla., Opera House, at Alva, Okla., with over a thousand persons attending each lecture, on "Life's Saddle and How to Climb It," and "Cuba and the Caribean Sea." Illustrated songs at each service.

Two weeks' gospel service at Kentland, Ind., closed November 29. The pastor, J. Newton Cloe did the preaching, assisted by Mrs. J. E. Powell as singer. The weather was against the meeting. There were three confessions. Mr. Cloe preached the Thanksgiving sermon for union service at the Presbyterian Church, and the collection, amounting to $15, was sent to the Cherry mine sufferers. There is talk of uniting the country congregation, at Pleasant Grove, with that of the First Church of Kentland. This will make a strong and active congregation.

There is a small congregation at Durange, Calif., which deserves more than passing notice because of the decided and radical stand it has taken in regard to church finance. At a recent meeting the church voted unanimously not to raise any money by means of socials, suppers, etc., and every man in the congregation signed a resolution to give to the church for the next three months the tenth of his income. That is a resolution that will prove a source of strength and joy to the church. R. H. Newton is pastor.

The First Church, Warren, Ohio, has added another "day" to its calendar. It is called "Church Treasury Day," and is to be observed this year December 12. On that day the members of the church will come prepared to make their subscriptions for the work of the coming year, and to pay any balance that may be due on the past year's subscription.

The Sunday-school of the First Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., has been thoroughly graded from Kindergarten to adult department. A new series of graded lessons will be introduced the first of the new year. The pastor, E. M. Todd, teaches the "John Aylesworth" Bible Class which is just beginning a series of studies in the social teaching of Jesus entitled "What to do in Social Reform." It is the series edited by Dr. Josiah Strong, and published by the American Institute of Social Service. The class has set its mark for an attendance of one hundred by January 1.

S. S. Jones, has now come to be numbered among the men who have held long pastorates among the Disciples. It is now fifteen years since he began his ministry at Danville, Ill., where he began with only one small church, and has seen and led in the organization of three other churches, all of which have grown to self-support. Mr. Jones recently celebrated his fiftieth birthday by entertaining the pastors of the other three churches and their wives. These men, W. E. Adams, First Church; J. S. Hyde, Second Church; and T. L. Cummings, Fourth Church, have all recently come to Danville and enjoyed Mr. Jones' welcome to the city.

A good recommendation made in the columns of the local paper to the members of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, is worthy of note here: "If your friends whom you desire to remember are not supplied with a Standard Revised Edition of the Bible, nothing would be so acceptable as a gift. Get the boy or girl a Children's Bible with the matchless Bible stories, put into form for children to read and enjoy. Another good present for Christmas is to give a year's subscription to one of our religious papers. We would recommend the Christian Evangelist or the Christian Century as the best. Either one costs but $1.50, and comes fifty-two times in the year.

W. E. Harlow, evangelist, lead in a meeting at Blandinsville, Ill., which lasted twenty-five days and brought eighty-four people into the church. Fifteen of these had been members of a church before, and nearly all were adults. The Sunday-school had been carefully gleaned by other meetings. The pastor, C. R. Wolford, speaks words of highest commendation of the evangelist and says that the church expects to recall him for a meeting next year.

Another of our Chicago preachers has yielded to the call from less strenuous demands of the church in the smaller town. R. E. L. Prunty, who has been pastor of the church at Chicago Heights, a little less than a year, has accepted a call to the church at La Belle, Mo., where he began his ministry the first Sunday in December. Mr. Prunty has always labored in Missouri, and has attained a large measure of success in every church. On this account the Chicago Heights church assisted by the Englewood church, asked Mr. Prunty to come to Chicago, hoping that he might be able to solve the difficult problems of the Chicago field. Mr. Prunty has labored faithfully as preacher and pastor, and gained for himself a place of high esteem among the other pastors of the city; but the work of the churches in Chicago demands more than good preaching and pastoral work. It becomes more and more apparent that more adequate equipment, and perhaps a different type of work is the only way out. The Chicago Heights church worships in a cheaply constructed tabernacle. This is the discouraging condition which must be met by the help of the churches throughout the state and the brotherhood. Mr. Prunty entered heartily into the fellowship of the churches of Chicago, and in leaving expresses his appreciation of that fellowship, and the Chicago men all hold him in highest esteem, and wish him every success in this new work in his native state.

Grenville Snell has held a fourteen-days' meeting at Orrich, Ray Co., Mo.

Chas. C. Smith is in an interesting meeting at Jeromeville, Ohio, where he preaches half time.

The Men's Bible class at Urichsville, Ohio, enrolls 250 members. The Sunday-school attendance is 337.

E. P. Wise, of East Liverpool, Ohio, has just held a good meeting with the church at Columbiana, the same state.

The men of the three churches of Springfield, Ill., were entertained Monday evening, December 6, by the Men's Club of the First Church.

The First Church, Marion, Ind., has moved into the basement of their new building, and begun a meeting under the leadership of G. W. Johnston.

Bowman Hostettler preaches for the churches at Brink Haven and Welcome, Ohio. He has just closed a good meeting of two weeks at the latter place.

Perry J. Rice, pastor of the church at El Paso, Texas, preached on a recent Sunday the following sermons: "Conditions of Growth" and "The Religion for Today."

The Sunday-school of the Central Church, Des Moines, counted 735 pupils present November 29, and immediately set out for 800, with 300 in the Auditorium Bible Class.

The congregation at Clyde, Ohio, dedicated a new church house November 21. This is a mission supported by the Endeavor Societies of the state. C. T. Fredenburg has been the only pastor of the church.

The Central Ohio Ministerial Association will meet at Mansfield, Monday, December 13, at 1 o'clock. C. A. Freer, of Millersburg, will read a paper on "The Purpose and Value of a Ministerial Association."

The church at El Paso, Texas, has engaged Miss Pansy Robertson, a graduate of the School of Music of Drake University to sing at each service of the church and assist in the work of the Sunday-school.

By request of the official board of the church at Lincoln, Nebraska, Herbert Yeuell repeated his lecture, "Shipwrecks and Sunsets of Life," and was given a larger audience the second time than the first.

Annual meeting of the Central Church, Des Moines, was held Wednesday evening, December 8. The election of officers was thoroughly democratic, not even a nominating committee being appointed to propose names.

H. G. Bond, who has done successful work as pastor at Girard, Kansas, resigned the last Sunday in November with the purpose of closing his work there December 31. The church by unanimous vote declined to accept the resignation, and asked the pastor to reconsider, but he insists that he must leave.

Success is attending the work of Dean L. Bond at Marietta, Okla. A building committee is at work preparing to break ground for a new church about the first of the year. The pastor has been preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on "The Second Coming of Christ," which have been enjoyed by the church.

The meeting at Shawnee, Okla., in which the church had the assistance of Ben. F. Hill of Okmulgee, closed November 28. In the three weeks there were twenty-nine accessions to the church, about one-half the number by confession and baptism. The pastor, Frank L. Van Voorhis, gives unqualified commendation of Mr. Hill and his work.

The Men's Bible class of the East End Shurch, Pittsburg, held a banquet recently when there were just 110 men present. There were no outside speakers. None were needed for this church is rich in having many good strong men in its membership. Addresses were made by Dr. Evans, Col. Church, Dr. Neff and the pastor, John Ray Ewers. The class has set as its watchword a membership of two hundred.

The Men's Brotherhood of the First Church, Elkhart, Ind., has been holding meetings on Sunday afternoons in one of the best theaters of the city. Their meeting for Sunday afternoon, December 5, was given over to the Anti-Saloon League and the Brotherhood furnished the speaker, Attorney Ralph Smith of La Porte, Ind. S. G. Buckner is pastor at Elkhart.

The Disciples of Christ were represented on the program of the annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ of America, held in the city of Louisville, December 7-9. Harry G. Hill, of Indianapolis, read a paper on the temperance work of the Federation. J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, will presided at one session. Mr. Hill has recently been appointed to the Executive Committee by Bishop E. R. Hendrix, president of the Federation.

A Man Every Inch

Story of the California Work of Grant K. Lewis, New Secretary of the American Society.

By Oscar Sweeney.

Rev. Grant K. Lewis of Los Angeles, after five years faithful service as corresponding secretary of the Christian churches of Southern California and Arizona, was elected one of the secretaries of the American Christian Missionary Society at the Pittsburg convention.

He has signified his acceptance and will enter upon the duties of his new office about the first of the year.

He has been promoted—our Grant. We are proud of that. But he is going to leave us. Going from sunny Southern California to smoky, sooty Cincinnati, and that makes the tears come.

We have faith in him. We know that though he gets a smut on each cheek and one on his nose every day of the year he will keep his heart pure and his life clean.

Everybody loves Grant K. Lewis. We love him for himself and for his work's sake. He is one of Christ's men. We never think of him as a "clergyman"—perish the thought! He is rather the frank, jovial boy preacher a little older grown, the friend of every preacher and every church and of every man in or out of the church.

Since I came to California three years ago Grant K. Lewis has been with me in three meetings. He has dedicated one church for me and assisted in the dedication of another. He has been in my home for weeks at a time and I have come to know him well.

As a man he is one of the kind you have confidence in. He radiates sunshine and good will. He has confidence in men, in his message and in Him who gave him the message.

As a preacher he is simple, direct, forceful. He is a man with a message. This message from a loving Savior he tells in loving, ardent words to a world which needs to hear it. His evangelism is of the highest present type. People of every church and no church hear him gladly. His meeting in Oceanside last winter was the most fruitful that has been held in this place for years. And he didn't leave a bad taste in the mouth of the community or cheapen religion, or give the scoffer a mass of working material.

He is one of the strongest preachers and one of the sweetest spirits it has ever been my privilege to labor with.

While we love Mr. Lewis as a man and appreciate him as a preacher, it is as secretary, looking after the churches, that he especially shines. This passage, referring to himself in his last report to the Long Beach convention gives a glimpse of his spirit. "Loving every Christ's man and feeling an affinity for every God's church I pray to be delivered from every prejudice, liberated from every opinionism as I walk down the King's highway, keeping in the middle of the road, ready and eager to strike hands with any and all who would forward the King's business."

It is about eleven years since Grant K. Lewis came to California from Denver. For two years he was pastor of the Pomona church. Four years he preached for the First Church, Long Beach. Since he began his full time service as state secretary five years ago the churches in southern California have increased from fifty-five to seventy-six. During this period twenty-five churches have become self-supporting. Five years ago the gifts of the churches for state and home missions were $2,040. This year the gifts for home and state missions were $14,400. Last year there were added to the churches of southern California 3,440 persons. The 14,000 persons constituting the present membership raised for all purposes $188,541.09. Only three churches were without regular preaching, for the most part by settled pastors. There are eight living link home mission churches, and a lerger proportion of missionary pastors employed in conjunction with the A. C. M. S. than in any other state.

Now after serving southern California so well all these years he is going to leave us. Because he has been faithful and fruitful in his state secretaryship he is called to the national work. It is characteristic of him that the office sought the man not the man the office.

Said he, "No bolt out of a clear sky could have surprised me more than my election at Pittsburg. It was only after long and careful meditation and consultation with many brethren that I could decide to accept."

Responding to the call of his brethren Grant K. Lewis goes to Cincinnati as one of our national secretaries. He is worthy to be a co-laborer with McCash, McLean, Rains, Corey, for he, too, is one of God's noblemen. He will serve faithfully and well the larger interests of the Master's Kingdom. In his service he will not do a Christian thing in an un-Christian way.

So, while we feel it a personal and state loss to have him go, not one of us would have him stay. To him we say as we smile through our tears, "go and God bless you, Grant."

To all the churches and to every interest in the great brotherhood we say, "receive Brother Lewis, love him, work with him earnestly, diligently as we have tried to do, and the Father will bless us all."

Chicago

A Study of Short Pastorates

By Orvis F. Jordan.

The most common social functions among the Chicago Disciples these days is the farewell dinner to the departing minister and the welcome feast to the incoming pastor. So frequent are the changes that we are now compelled to double up somewhat and at a recent dinner we welcomed four new ministers all at once. During a year, there have been changes in ten out of our twenty-two churches. Those making changes are Armitage Avenue, Chicago Heights (two changes), Douglas Park, Gary, Irving Park, Jackson Boulevard, Metropolitan, Monroe Street, West End, West Pullman and a resignation is soon to take effect at South Chicago. We do not have a minister in town with a consecutive ministry of fifteen years. The patriarchs in our ministry are George Campbell and C. G. Kindred, Mr. Campbell being the dean of the group.

True of Others Too

Not only do the Disciples have short ministries in Chicago, but the men of other religious bodies as well. Professor Graham Taylor is responsible for the statement that there are only two ministers in Chicago in any denomination that have fifteen years of consecutive ministry. These are Rabbi Hirsch and Jenkin Lloyd Jones. He added facetiously. "And these are both heretics." We have sometimes felt called upon to question the itinerant plan of the Methodist ministry. Methodist ministers probably average a somewhat longer pastorate in Chicago than do our own. It is manifest, however, that there is great loss to every religious body by reason of this itinerant quality to the work of the minister. Men must live some time in any community to understand it, and in Chicago the change of environment is so marked that it takes much longer to become acclimated. A preacher in Chicago for two years has but touched the fringe of the problem. We are all saying now that we need longer ministries in our churches. How shall we bring this to pass?

Causes of Changes

The causes that bring about changes in our ministries are various. The roster of churches making changes the past year indicates that the cause is not theological as some have wished to say, thus finding an easy way out of the problem. One of the first of the reasons for the shift in our ministry is the financial obligations of life in our great city. The cost of living is greater and the temptations to the spending of money for semi-luxuries are infinitely more varied. Our churches usually call young men, full of ambition who are taking their training or have just completed it. As soon as the family is larger and there are children to educate, the preacher without means must be untrue to his family life or depart. Some leave before any financial crisis arises, discerning it in the distance. Our people have low salaries as things go in the city. Only three of our churches pay over two thousand dollars a year. Most of the salaries are under this, ranging from five hundred dollars per year to three thousand. No minister has ever gotten rich in Chicago and it may be doubted if many have ever saved anything for old age. The ministers are to be pardoned for exercising ordinary business prudence and making provision for not ending their days in want.

Disturbances in the Churches

Another fruitful cause of change is disturbance in the churches. If city people are less given to gossip than country people owing to the variety of their interests, they are even more given to faction. The history of the church in Chicago from the beginning has been one of division. There is probably less of it today than ever before in its history. Long before the arising of the odium theologicum among us, the old churches on the South Side and the West Side had divided and divided again. The city political life is full of faction. Business corporations organize cliques within cliques to oust those in power. The city man breathes division and strike with every hour of the day. When he goes to church his habits persevere. Our doctrines of Christian union—which, by the way, Paul made an exhortation to a local church—is much needed yet in Chicago. The word "coöperation" which is making headway against the tooth and fang methods of modern business must also be the key-word for our churches. Chicago churches coöperate with each other perhaps as much and more as in other localities, but the facts of our city life demand even more closely articulated forms of life.

Baffled Ministers

A third cause of removals is that the minister confesses himself beat and retires of his own accord. Too many men bring cut and dried programs which have worked elsewhere to try in the city. Each situation must be made to develop its own program by the wide-awake minister. There is no cure-all for the physician of souls any more than there is for the physician of bodies.

New Special Ministry

We will never have a permanent ministry until we make one especially for the city. We ought to get young men in the colleges to volunteer for our city work as they volunteer for foreign missions. These should attend a good seminary in the city or rather journey about from seminary to seminary in the city enrivonment seeking the best in each place. They should have the clinical practice that young physicians have by assisting in some great church or settlement. It would be even better if these young men were of the city born. The city in the end must save herself. The churches that are succeeding are in many cases doing so even now with the city man at the helm. At the Evanston church five of the six men who assist in the serving of the emblems of the Lord's table were baptized in that church and are city men. The man who preaches would be more at home in his city environment if it were the only one he had ever known.

Respect for Expert

We will never have long ministries until our churches learn to respect the expert. Business men who pay large sums to engineers and chemists for advice that comes from special training and knowledge, will assume to "boss" a preacher who has goven the best part of his life to becoming an expert in his special line of work. A "one-man pastor" may not suit our conservative friends, but only the use of expert help in leading the church will bring the results in religious work as it does in the great enterprises of the world. The "ruling elder" must rule his own spirit first and learn from competent sources the fundamentals of the great task that heretofore he has assumed to direct. With more knowledge he will do less ruling and more working.

Some of our preachers have not moved in a long time. They exhort each other and pray that they may not be led into temptation. For some the city has a great fascination. Many of our preachers feel more at home in Chicago than anywhere else in the world. Here they are daily stimulated to their very best. Here is the great throng that needs to be saved and the great need. Here is task big enough for any man's steel. Some of us will stay because we have been caught in the wheels of the city life and cannot escape. May the group of those who love the city and devote themselves to it in true missionary spirit ever grow larger.

Chicago Church Notes

A meeting of all the official boards of Chicago at a restaurant in the loop district is our most important innovation. This is to take place on the evening of December 14. At this meeting plans for common work will be discussed and it will be proposed to inaugurate a plan to stimulate the building of church buildings in Chicago.

A. W. Taylor is the president of the Ministerial Association this year. He has promised us a course in sociological heresy this year and already a number of interesting meetings have been held. Mr. Farwell of the Law and Order League spoke to us recently and Mr. Shields of the Anti-saloon League.

Meade Dutt of East Las Vegas, New Mexico, is in the city looking over the field at the West End church. He was extended a call by that church.

The Douglas Park church is now engaged in a strenuous campaign to cut their Church Extension debt in two. There is some promise of success.

Nelson Trimble has opened a reading room at Metropolitan church and furnishes the boys of a nearby high school a place to eat the noon lunch.

Irving Park church is at work creating a building fund. They have no definite plans formed out, but are getting ready. A. W. Taylor is much encouraged over some of the late developments of the work.

Sheffield avenue church is going to install a stereopticon for use on one Sunday night of the month and for lectures through the week. W. F. Shaw is just back from a meeting in the country.

The C. W. B. M. quarterly meeting was held at the Armitage avenue church on Thursday of last week. The ladies of the church served lunch to the visitors.

The Austin church will be ready for occupancy by Christmas. Dr. Willett spoke for them to a large audience in the Baptist church recently.

The national convention of the Anti-saloon League is in town and is the center of thought for the Christian part of the population.

Austin Texas Bible Chair

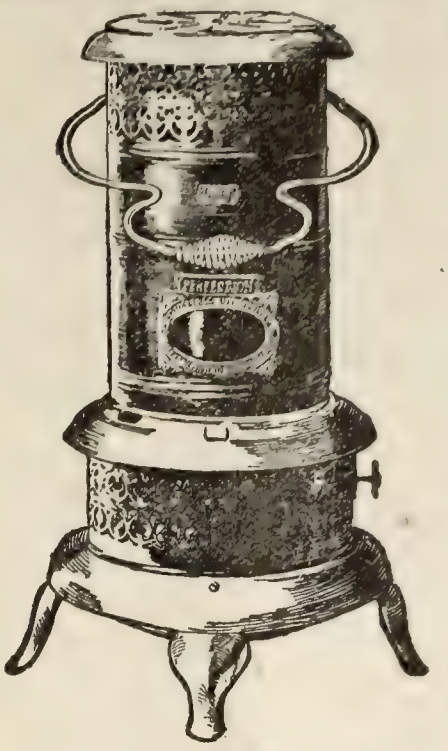
The missionary women of the Christian churches of Texas support the Texas Bible chair as their state special, through the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. These women determined that the future men and women of Texas who were to be their physicians and lawyers, and teachers and homemakers should have the opportunity to have trained Bible teaching along with all other studies. If the state provides everything else, they would see that this was not neglected. So Mr. Jewett was engaged to do this Bible chair work. It is given freely to all students who will accept it. There are a hundred students in the Sunday morning classes now.

Mrs. M. M. Blanks of Lockhart, Texas, gave a $17,000 building for the work this year—and counted it all joy to make the gift. It is a double building—a home and a school building together and yet separate, thoroughly equipped and quite adapted to its work.

All C. W. B. M. day offerings in Texas go for the support of this work, unless specially ordered otherwise. Mark: For Texas Bible Chair and send to Mrs. M. E. Harlan. Missionary Training School, Indianapolis, Ind.

The Varneys and Marks Meeting at Ash Grove

By J. H. Jones.



This evangelistic company has closed a twenty-six ways meeting, resulting in fifty-seven accessions. This field has for many years been regarded as difficult for many reasons and it was with grave fears and great doubts that the church was persuaded to enter upon an evangelistic campaign. We were more than fortunate in securing these evangelists and the prejudice existing in the church and town against evangelists was soon overcome and all speak much praise for the Varneys and Marks. Mr. Marks is a sweet soloist, a good chorus director, and a most excellent personal worker. His wife, who is a splendid pianist, was a great help. These young people left many warm friends in Ash Grove. Mr. and Mrs. Varney are both preachers of the word. With them Christ is Lord and they are ready to go with him all the way. The sermons preached by Mrs. Varney on Lords Day mornings will be remembered long by the Ash Grove Church. Her lecture on the Life of Christ, gave to our people a mountain-top view of our Lord. Besides her pulpit work that work that will have the most lasting effect was her personal visit to the homes of the mothers and wives of our town. Mr. aVrney's sermons were scriptural, logical and forcefully presented. His dialect was not that of one who had been raised with our plea, but this was one of his great helps as an evangelist. He gave us the same old truths in new garments. At a special consecration service on a Lord's Day evening of the meeting a call was made for Christians to give themselves to some special work of the church. Four noble souls responded. Perry Cameron, a deacon in the church, and his faithful wife gave themselves to the ministry of the word. Dr. Omar Smith a leading physician of our town, who a few evenings before, was buried with his Lord in baptism, consecrated himself to the work of a medical missionary on the Foreign Field. Miss Leota Ewing, a teacher in our public schools, gave herself to Christ as a medical missionary to India. These we regard as some of the best fruits of our meeting.

Mr. Varney remained over after the meeting and delivered his lecture, "Apples of Gold," to a large and appreciative audience, the proceeds of which were left with the church treasurer to be used to help defray the expenses of sending a missionary from the Ash Grove Church to a missionary training school. All the members of this evangelistic company are cultured and pure. They appeal to the best in men and women. With them evangelism is not professional but a life work.

Smokeless

Until science discovered a way to construct the Automatic Smokeless Device, and make it completely dependable, all oil heaters had one common great fault—smoke.

With the advent of the Automatic Smokeless Device, and its practical application to the PERFECTION Oil Heater

(Equipped with Smokeless Device)

the smoke problem was successfully solved.

The Perfection Oil Heater is the only heater equipped with this which insures a steady, full-glowing heat, with the wick turned up as high as it will go, without a shred of smoke. Reverse the motion, turn the wick down—there's no odor.

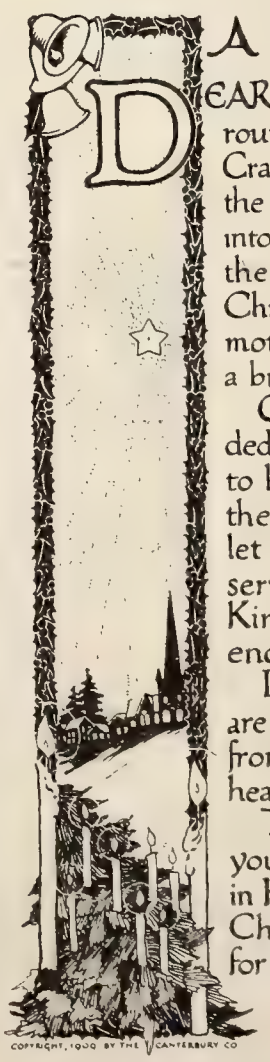
The smokeless device automatically locks and prevents the upward movement of the wick beyond the proper exposure. That is the secret. This splendid result gives leadership to the Perfection.

You may now have all the heat you want—when you want it—and where you want it—without the annoyance of smoke or odor.



Brass font holds 4 quarts of oil, which permits a glowing heat for 9 hours. Brass wick tube—damper top—cool handle. Cleaned in a minute.

Reports from Eureka College

H. H. Peters, field secretary of Eureka College, has recently issued two important leaflets. One deals with the matter of college attendance. It shows that Eureka College has graduated 441 people—306 men and 135 women. The college has granted only eleven honorary degrees in all its history. This gives the college an Alumni family of 452. But forty-two of these have passed beyond, leaving an active membership of 410. In this group there are 109 ministers, sixty teachers, six bankers, nineteen physicians, twenty-seven lawyers, ten missionaries, twenty-nine in commercial pursuits, ten in public service and reform work, and five newspaper men. The college has enrolled 2,300 different pupils during the past ten years. This makes an average attendance of 230. The total attendance in the Collegiate Department for this time is 643; in the Preparatory Department, 941; in the Bible Department, 405; in the Music Department, 656; in the Art Department, 230; in the Commercial Department, 367. The average per annum in the various departments shows the attendance as follows: Collegiate, sixty-four; Preparatory, ninety-four; Bible, forty; Music, sixty-five; Art, twenty; Commercial, thirty-six. With the vigorous campaign that is now being carried on from the office, together with the field work, it ought to be an easy matter to run the attendance up to an average of 400 within the next year or two.

The other leaflet is the financial statement about the college. This shows the college property to be worth $115,000. The present endowment is $53.950. This is in three forms: $30.000 of this is in real estate, $17,400 in real estate mortgages, $6,550 is in personal funds. It has seventy-six acres of land in Indiana, that is regarded as non-productive, worth $1,800 and two other pieces of real estate of unknown value. The total indebtedness of the college is $20,493.66. There has been an annual deficit of something like $5,000 for several years. This has been met by voluntary contributions and offerings from the churches. The present eampaign looks towards the endowment of the school to the extent of meeting the deficit and providing for the enlargement of the work. $30,000 has been pledged toward the $125,000 proposition, and the campaign is waxing warm. It is expected that the entire amount will be raised by September 1, 1910.

Children's Day for Missions

The offerings from the Sunday-schools for Children's Day for Home Missions shows a gain of $1,000 for the first month of the fiscal year; 141 new schools are lined up already this year; 106 schools have sent greater offerings than last year and only forty-one have had the temerity to send anything less than they sent last year and we are very glad to say only ten schools have stood still, marking time, giving the same as last year. The state secretaries are still "rustling in the brush" for the slow moving schools. Indications are that the bulk of the offering will be in by the first of the New ear, and the offering for the year will probably be the greatest we have ever had.

Superintendents and secretaries are asked to remit promptly in order that the gathering of the offering may not delay other appeals. Remittances in every case should be made to the American Christian Missionary Society. All drafts, money orders, checks, etc., should be made only to the American Christian Missionary Society, and not to the secretaries.

We can furnish The CHRISTIAN CENTURY, COSMOPOLITAN and AMERICAN MAGAZINE for $2.80.

The Bethany Graded Lessons

-International Course-

For All Your Pupils Under 12 Years Old

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to reorganize the whole School at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching children the same lessons provided for grown-up people.

The best way to grade your school is to do it by "installments." Begin at the bottom now—in the elementary grades. Provide elementary teachers and pupils with the equipment offered in The Bethany Series and later on, when the International Committee puts forth a course for higher grades, you will be ready to carry the graded principle a step higher, and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for these higher grades. In this way the most beneficent improvement which could take place in your Sunday-school methods and aims will be accomplished without the slightest risk.

The Elder Brother

The parables of Jesus are like gems set in the coronet of a king. Every story of them all is a complete and flawless jewel. Each one has its own lustre and each reflects some values of that wonderful central light of which Jesus so constantly spoke. Sometimes two of them are grouped very closely as if they were really twin stones. An example of this yoking of two narratives is found in the dual story of the lost son and his elder brother.

The sentiment of the reader is almost instantly enlisted in behalf of the son who went astray and returned at last to his home. While he is not the hero of the parable, a place that must be accorded invariably to the father who welcomed him back, still there is a certain romantic interest in the experience of the boy who went out to seek adventures in the wide world. More prosy and commonplace seems the character of the other son. He was the plodding, faithful, unromantic member of the family. And his astonished protest when his brother returned to receive the tokens of the father's affection rouses at once our regret and disapproval. Why should he not have been more generous? Why should he have failed to give due value to the hard and bitter experience of his younger brother? We cannot quite forgive this grudging and inhospitable attitude. And this is of course the very emotion that Jesus sought to rouse in the hearts of his hearers.

That there is much to be said in favor of the elder brother goes with the saying. He had never forsaken his father. He had remained to perform his duties as a son and helper. No anxieties ever need be felt concerning his conduct. In contrast with his brother, he had brought the father only satisfaction and never regret. There is far too much tendency to clothe the younger brother's career in romantic sentimentalism and miss the true nature of his offense against the father's love.

There is a strong inclination on the part of many emotional people to put, somewhat unconsciously, a premium on crime. There is a sickly sentiment that is moved to pity over the criminal and finds its satisfaction in shedding tears and strewing flowers when justice is invoked in behalf of honor and law. It is this sentiment that forgets crime over soon, and is either lethargic in bringing it to justice or quite compliant when premature efforts are made to remove the pains and disabilities which law has pronounced upon the criminal. Nothing is more disgraceful nor unsocial than the delays incident to the punishment of wrong doing, the maudlin exhibitions of weak emotionalism aroused by the honest administration of justice, or the outrageous haste manifested in the interest of imprisoned criminals to turn them loose again for the resumption of their evil work.

This type of emotion condones evil deeds, glorifies murder, apologizes for treachery, pleads for offenders against law and morals, especially if they are able to command the assistance of shrewd and unscrupulous advocates, and refuses to probe into the careers of polite and resourceful debauchers of the public conscience if they are safeguarded by money or political influence. All such efforts to make heroes out of knaves is indefensible and un-Christian. It puts a false glamor about evil and dresses it in the garb of the romantic. Worst of all, it obscures the quieter and more valuable traits of character which are possessed by the majority of earnest, industrious, and useful men, and fails to recognize the fact that it requires much more pluck and courage to live a modest, sober and useful life than to go away into the far country or plunge into any attractive form of immoral conduct.

There is nothing more admirable than a young man who, with the ample opportunities which our age affords for misuse of time and misdirection of energy, maintains his covenant of honor with himself and all the world and is happy in the quiet attainment of honesty, integrity, and goodness in his daily life. Those who read character will find much more of romance in such a life than in the mock heroics of the superficial knights errant who imagine that the coast of Bohemia is a desirable place in which to tarry for a time, and that the sowing of wild oats is a natural preparation for a harvest of good opinion and real success. The story of the centuries is of a different sort. No man ever comes to a strong and useful manhood who has not paid the price in quiet maturing of character amid the discipline of hard work and the proper use of all opportunities for self enrichment.

It is the glory of the gospel that it voices the welcome of the heart of God to every man who turns at whatever stage of his career from evil to good, and seeks with whole-hearted penitence the repair of his broken fortunes. But nothing is less true than that the gospel condones the waste of life and promises anything but the legitimate fruits of evil to men who make wrong choices. No years of labor and humility could ever repair in the later life of the prodigal son the waste and ruin of his youth. "Second childhood may come," declares Ruskin, "but second youth never." The bird with the broken pinion never soars so high again.

The son who devoured his substance with evil companions never lost the taint of that degraded life. It is always a question with the student of human nature whether a man who has given himself to evil courses is ever completely the master of his own career thereafter. Certainly in his own strength he is not capable of resisting the onset of temptation as it masses itself before the weaker gates of his life. It is only by the grace of God that such a character retrieves in some measure its fortune. But let such a man well understand that every day of his life he is paying something of the exacted penalty that sin always asseses.

So much, then, needs to be frankly confessed in our judgment of the elder brother. He had every advantage over the unhappy boy who went away and left the opportunities of the fother's home. The sin and mistake of the elder brother lay in his jealous and grudging attitude toward his unfortunate brother when he returned. He did not stop to consider the fact that no comfort or love could ever quite make up that awful deficiency which lay in the past career of the returning boy. He had no excuse whatever for envy. It was his own failure to rightly estimate the blessings he daily enjoyed that left room for any such lurking grudge. In comparison he stands, therefore, under the reproach of this unsocial and unbrotherly attitude. And it was the lesson of such conduct which Jesus wished to impress upon his hearers.

For the two great dangers of that age and every age are on the one side, the waste of character through evil courses; and on the other hand that self righteousness and pride which too often grows out of conscious compliance with accepted custom and the attainment of respectable standing. Both of these errors blot and stain character. The one can never wholly be compensated for by any later effort for good, though large, amends may be made for wasted years by serious and high minded efforts. The danger of the other is the hardening of nature into stiff, formal, and ungracious self-esteem, which is even more difficult to penetrate than the calloused conscience of a sinful life.

It is that fact in Jesus' teaching which so much shocks the casual reader of his life. In his estimate of different men he felt that the self-righteous Pharisee who was really a fairly good man in his public and private life was more in need of repentance and humility than the man who had been an open and headlong sinner. The latter was open to conviction and reproof; the former thought himself above correction and therefore stood in the greater danger. Jesus always dealt kindly with the objects of social condemnation, because he knew they had already suffered under the ban of public disapproval. For publicans, drunkards and harlots he felt all the sympathy of a great nature for outcasts. But he reserved his sternest condemnation for the men whose station, gifts and opportunities were so great, and who yet held aloof in self-righteousness from all effective redemptive work. We must not fail to get Christ's point of view. The lost son came back out of bitter beggary and self-reproach and met the whole-hearted welcome of his father. The elder brother, arrogant, envious and unwelcoming in his attitude, stood in shamed silence to receive with humbled pride the kindly rebuke of the same father. Both sons had sinned. And who shall say which sin was most in need of forgiveness? But throughout the story the father, loving, generous, suffering, anxious, but always just and forgiving remains the hero and the ideal.

Cleaning Up Municipal Business

Boston, New York, and Chicago have experienced or are experiencing a searching inquiry into the business methods of their municipal administrations. In New York it was found that where real graft did not prevail the utmost extravagance did, and that there were underground ways of paying the powers in politics without committing crime under the law. Contracting is the rotten spot in it all. Under guise of contracts the men who do the dirty business get their pay. They may be the contractors, or stockholders in the contracting firm, or get their graft through the contractor, but it all comes in the letting of contracts. The investigators found some $20,000,000 annually wasted in the city of New York.

In Boston a like story was told. The committee of one hundred followed up the revelations with a campaign for a new city charter. The legislature recognized the inevitable and gave the people of the city a chance to vote on a new charter but craftily, at the behest of the wire pullers of both old parties, offered them two plans for a choice. One was designed to represent "Conservatism" and provided for a convention system, the delegates to come from small districts. This was plan One. The other was a compromise with the progressive demands of the committee and provided for nominations without party tickets and by petition, a council of nine members with a four-year term for the mayor, he being subject to recall after two years. Under the plea of "popular representation" both old party machines worked for Plan One. The Committee of One Hundred headed the campaign for Plan Two and it won by a good majority.

Chicago is in the throes of an investigation of its system of municipal business transactions. Last spring the good people of Hyde Park elected Professor Merriam of the University of Chicago to the city council. He is a teacher of subjects relating to administration and thus a qualified expert. He immediately brought in a resolution asking for a commission to investigate the city's method of doing business. It was passed upon popular demand and he was made its chairman. It took but a few days for the most startling revelations to be made. It was found that the bidding system was defeated by giving out orders for material under the exemption for bills of $500 or less and by accepting a low bid and then accepting material that did not fulfill the contracts as to quality. Materials amounting to tens of thousands were purchased of favored firms in $500 lots, amounts of $500 and under not being subject to competitive bids, such lots being purchased on consecutive days and even several in a single day. Favored firms were paid for shale removed where nothing but hard pan had been encountered. Lumber was accepted as the best that would hardly be classed as the worst. Pavements were accepted that had no such foundations as the specifications called for. It will be interesting to find out all about coal contracts and especially about the deposits of the $13,000,000 the city carries.

When an administration is elected for the sole purpose of favoring corporations and the people line up behind it at the behest of so called "business interests"—a slogan that drowns conscience in our large cities—and elect the old time machine politicians to perfect their cause they must expect that the gentlemen that they elect will use the principles of their trade and line their purses. Dick Croker haughtily asked the Lexow committee what they thought he was in the business of politics for. So all the people should ask before they elect ward politicians rather than public spirited men to office.

"Trespassers in the Land of Their Birth"

The significance of Lloyd-George's famous phrase is shown by the fact that the Lords who dared the deluge by vetoing his budget own 16,000,000 acres of England's land, and that their power over it is absolute. The tenant can be disposed at will of the owner and all the improvements he has made go to the owner. The tenant pays all the taxes practically and if he gets an increase in crops by his intelligence or industry, the land immediately becomes more valuable and the rental is raised. "My Lord can ride down his crops with his hounds and there is no right of protest and the man who loses from his crop thereby must accept such compensation as he can get. Millions of acres are shut up to hunting preserves for "my lords and ladies" pleasure. Many times the tenant is evicted that his fields may be turned into hunting parks or turned over to cattle. Yet England does not produce one-sixth of her own food stuffs and poverty claims from one-fourth to one-third of all the people.

Lloyd George proposes to lay a tax upon all this uncultivated land and force it into use. He proposes to let all the people share in the increase that is brought to land by social cause—the "unearned increment." But most horrifying to the "noble Lords" is the provision to put a value on their estate. It has been 200 years since the assessor laid a value on their land. It still pays a pitiful tax on the value of two centuries ago. Our railroads object also to a valuation of their actual and tangible properties in order that a just rate may be determined. So does privilege always stand against any scrutiny of its affairs. The lords cry "socialism" and "confiscation" and call George and Churchill terrible names but they produce no argument, except the argument that their own inanity brings against their cause.

Not a Creed But a Platform

Evidence multiplies that the church is devoting herself more to the formulating of platforms for action than to creeds for acceptance. It is a debatable question as to just how far the church as an organization can devote itself to any current reform but there is no logical debate, under her constitution, as to how far she can go in the work of justice and charity and all that makes for the help of humanity. She is not privileged to preach the single tax or socialism but she is bound to preach against the saloon and all specific social evils that have fallen under the ban of our rising civilization. She may not advocate the claim of any one political party but she must educate a civic conscience and raise a prophetic voice against civic corruption, naming the man and the place. She cannot be either the special organ of the employer or employee as a class but she can demand justice and plead the equitable cause of the weaker.

The great Federal Council of Churches adopted a magnificant set of resolutions on the social question. Just what will be done under them must be awaited with patience and hopefulness. The Protestant Episcopal church led all others in specific plans by organizing its Association for Improving the Condition of Labor. It is a frank advocate of labor unionism. The Presbyterian churches have the most virile department for specific social work, largely because of the virility and genius of the man at the head of it, Chas. Stelzle. It is a Department of their Home Missionary Society and does a very broad work in relation to trades unions, imigration, and all working world problems. It has recently made a religio-social survey of the city of Newark and is now engaged in a like study of the immigrant in New York City and will make a like study of an immigrant section in the heart of Pennsylvania. Here we have an effort to come at the religious problems with some statesmanlike foresight. The national Congregation Council has a committee on industrial problems as have also several of their state associations. Both the Congregationalists and Baptists have had to meet the same technical objection that the Disciples meet in the plea that they have no central body of jurisdiction and no organization representing such demands. They might learn from the Presbyterian experience that it is a logical part of a home missionary propaganda. The Baptists made a marked advance in their last state convention in Illinois when they adopted a platform declaring their sympathy with the workingman and adopting a series of specific planks such as advocacy of industrial arbitration and conciliation, protection from dangerous machinery and occupational diseases, abolition of child labor, suppression of the sweating system, a ten hour day and a six day week, and a more equitable distribution of profits between captial and labor. It is a platform that does the heart of the sympathetic social student good and negatives much of the current criticism of the church's indifference to the crying questions of the hour. The Disciples adopted Ex-Congressman Pence's resolution as presented to their Brotherhood meeting at Pittsburg, demanding the repeal of internal revenue laws and the enactment of the income tax instead as a revenue measure. The Methodists have a League for Social Service and declare for essentially the same program that is given above in the Baptist platform. Various Congregational bodies have adopted like programs and there is an advance all along the line from the abstract plea for a good conscience to the concrete demand for some of the things in which that good conscience must consist.

The church cannot do all that all reformers demand of her, but she can and is doing much for reform. The charge that she does not adequately represent the will of Christ can be all too readily substantiated by her critics, but here are some signs that indicate wholesome improvement in her attitude toward present day problems of social welfare. When the church becomes sufficiently sympathetic with the workers they will flock to her portals for they are moved most by fraternal principles. The appeal of the Chicago Federation of Labor for the sympathetic help of the churches in the fight for the ten hour law for women workers has met a most hearty response in the ministerial associations of the city. It is hoped that the Federation will reciprocate by inviting the associations to send fraternal delegates to sit in its councils.

Commissions of Inquiry

Intelligent consideration of social and economic problems is being greatly forwarded by the custom now prevailing of appointing commissions to make inquiries into specific things. We have been too busy making money to inquire of one another how it was being made. We have proceeded on the laissez faire—the "let-alone" theory and intensified our individualism to the extent of turning the strong loose to their own devices and asked no scrutiny or restraint so long as physical violence was not done nor the old canons of petty thieving disobeyed. But we have discovered that stealing is more effectively done by manipulation under apparently legal methods and by gentlemen who wear silk hats than by physical violence or petty larceny. We have also found that the old individualistic law will not answer for an age of social complexity. The condition that most delights the "rich malefactor" or the man who could willingly become one is to make no attempt to restrain the new forms of crime that arise under the complex life arising out of the new conditions of our socialized era beyond those found in the old laws, made for an era in which relations were simple and business done between man and man.

We are also finding that it is better to forefend than to defend after the wrong has been done. So commissions of inquiry are being appointed on every sort of public problem. Many of them are to investigate after suspicions arise and to find out where or whether a wrong has been done. Now we are forefending by appointing commissions that will find out where wrongs may be done. We have been so committed to the "let-alone" idea that we have thought we have no right to make previous inquiry and have looked with smiling indulgence and slight contempt upon the men who have advocated new ways to meet new conditions and damned them with the faint praise of "visionary," "dreamer," "idealistic," etc., if indeed we have not tried to be malignant and crush life out of the men of vision by wrathfully crying "socialist" or some other word that would shut out consideration by appealing to prejudice.

Why Is Beef So Expensive?

The Agricultural Department has been making an inquiry into the prices of beef in the cities. Everyone knows of the enormous increase in prices within the last few years. This inquiry does not go into the production cost, but only into the price after finished at the packing house. It reports that in Baltimore the margin between wholesale and retail price is 17 per cent, while in Chicago it is 46 per cent. New York's margin is but 20 per cent. The report points out the very obvious fact that our system of neighborhood shops where orders are telephoned in and deliveries made on short notice and for small orders makes for increased cost to the retailer. But that does not explain the difference between Chicago and the eastern cities named. Another fact is apparent and that is that when profits are large, dealers will multiply until each does but a small amount of business and then profits must be kept at a wide margin to support the many small establishments which are duplicating each other on the same territory.

But here are some facts that require consideration. The Armours recently sold bonds in New York, making affidavit that they made 35 per cent of an investment of $20,000,000. At the same time they are taxed on an investment of but $5,000,000. The manner of marketing beef in Chicago should also be inquired into. Do the retailers do business for themselves or are they but agents for the packing trust? The Federation of Labor in Chicago proposes to make further inquiry into the why of this 46 per cent margin between the packer and the man that eats the beef.

The Ratio of Preventable Diseases

Census Mortality Bulletin No. 104 is startling in its revelations of the possibilities of scientifically preventing infant mortality and presents both facts and suggestions that are pregnant with hope for the future of infant lives. It is estimated that not less than 100,000, and perhaps twice that many, little lives that are snuffed out each year might be saved. One-fifth of all deaths are of babes under one year of age. Fully a quarter of a million of these little ones die each year in the nation. Of those under 5 years of age fully 400,000 find the untimely grave. Prof. Irving Fisher, in his report to the National Conservation Commission, estimates that 47 per cent of all deaths of children under one year of age could be prevented, and that of those from one to eight years at least 67 per cent of the cases are avoidable. Dr. Wilbur, Chief Statistician of Vital Statistics for the Census Bureau, concludes, after his investigations, that there is no reason why healthily born children should die at all aside from accidents that are not preventable. Prof. Fisher's conclusions are summed up in the following paragraph:

"Out of every 100 deaths that occur from each disease in which the median age at death is under 5 years, there could be prevented the following numbers: Premature birth, 40; congenital debility, 40; venereal diseases, 70; diarrhoea and enteritis, the most important cause of infant mortality, 60; measles, 40; acute bronchitis, 30; bronchopneumonia, 50; whooping cough, 40; 'croup' (which means diphtheria), 75; meningitis, 70; diseases of larynx other than laryngitis, 40; laryngitis, 40; diphtheria (under its proper appellation), 70; scarlet fever, 50."

In our agitation about Conservation we have heard all to little about this conservation of human life. Again it is illustrated that we are more easily stirred to action by property interests than by human interests. The report asks that methods of more accurately and inclusively registering births and deaths be officially made in order that light may be thrown upon all questions of mortality, as the first step in a scientific movement for prevention of death by avoidable or curable disease.

Editorial

OUR reformers are just awakening to the fact of the immense moral power residing in the fraternal orders which gather into themselves such large numbers of men and root themselves firmly in every community. It has been the fashion in some quarters to criticise the lodges because their moral teachings were good but not good enough. A better attitude will be for society to demand of the lodges that they live up to the principles they do profess. No doubt there is moral and social dynamic here if once it be taken out of the lodge-room and made to function helpfully in the social order. The Peace movement is laying hold of the lodges. By spirit and by express principle the lodge man is a peace man. When the lodge-conscience is formed with respect to its obligation not only to cherish brotherliness as a personal virtue, but to spread it in society, it will be found that the lodges may wield most potent influence against war. Mr. Joseph H. Burt delivered an address at the Peace Congress in Chicago last May, taking for his subject "Fraternal Orders and Peace." This same interpreter of the social obligation of the fraternal order read a paper last week at the Anti-Saloon Convention in Chicago on the attitude of lodges toward the saloon. Some hint of his thesis may be found in certain extracts from his Peace paper bearing on the lawless Sunday saloon. He says:

"Most of these fraternal orders proclaim the doctrine that a man cannot be true to his fraternity and at the same time violate the law of the land. In other words, these orders have laws which provide for the discipline of a member if he violates the law of the land. A violation of the law of the land is a violation of the laws of the order of which he is a member.

"At least one of these orders in Illinois is now seriously trying to expel from membership some of its members who openly and persistently violate the criminal code of the state of Illinois by keeping their saloons open on Sunday. This order is rapidly taking an advanced stand in educating its members away from the old tribal feeling of the past that it is right to protect a fellow tribesman although he is in the wrong.

"It is the duty of all fraternal men to expose all law breakers in these fraternal orders. Fraternity and open lawlessness cannot flourish in the same household or in the same nation. When fraternal education advances to that point where the members of these orders fully realize that open lawlessness means death to true fraternity much of our present lawlessness will disappear and the peace of the world will thereby be better secured.

"Men engaged in occupations which tolerate lawlessness are now excluded from all but one of the fraternal orders in the United States."

If the spirit of militancy can be developed among lodge men on behalf of good laws, law-keeping and peace there will have been released into the social conflict a tremendous energy for righteousness.

The Daily Altar

A people developing so rapidly in all of the competences of a great brotherhood like the Disciples of Christ stands in constant need of many new elements of experience. During our centennial period we were frequently reminded of several of these needs in the emphasis placed upon the different aims selected for achievement. But among all of the needs recognized by the most thoughtful among the Disciples, one stands easily chief. And that is the need of larger attention to the cultivation of the worshipful spirit and the practice of the presence of God.

Our people have grown so rapidly and their attention has been so largely fixed upon the constructive work of organization and development that they have not always taken sufficient thought for the culture of the spirit. It is true that the fathers of this movement were men of devout and pious mind. They felt the need of constant prayer. Their families were reared with due attention to household worship. But this cultivation of the spirit of devotion has been too little regarded by many of the people who followed them, and it needs present restoration to its true place in the daily program of the church.

One of the sad features of our modern life is the decay of the family altar. Like that which Elijah found at Carmel, it is broken down and neglected. In the homes of many people who were reared in an atmosphere of domestic piety no heed is taken to the culture of heart and mind in the great essentials of Bible study and prayer.

There are many reasons for this fact. The rush and hurry of our modern life pushes aside all too easily the deeper values of daily experience. Children are sent out into the world with none of those safeguards which family worship provided for an earlier generation.

Many other reasons might be assigned for this decline of family religion, but one reason further may be suggested. In not a few homes the parents do not quite know how to proceed. They have not had training in prayer that is listened to by any other members of the family. And nothing is more difficult for a father or mother than the experience of attempting to pray before the children if this has not been an acquired habit of years. Even Christian people who can take part with some degree of ease in the public services of the church or in prayer-meeting find themselves somewhat hesitant and diffident before the members of their own household in the domestic circle.

We have long felt that encouragement ought to be given to parents to practice the art of family prayer. And years have deepened the impression that some simple aids to such exercises would help to solve the problem in many households where now family worship is neglected. For this reason we propose two plans:

1. Will not our readers who are interested in this matter of family worship write to us giving frankly their own experience as to the prevalence of family worship, and the reasons why it is not more generally observed. Also, we should like to have them suggest some simple and practicable plans for family worship. These we believe will be of great value to the Christian Century household. We are not anxious to have the names of those who write to us for any public use. In fact, if greater freedom can be found without giving any names, that will be entirely satisfactory. What we want is the frank statement of experiences such as throw light upon the present problem of family worship.

2. With the first of the year we propose providing a series of brief helps which can be used for the purpose of restoring the family altar to its rightful place in the homes of such Disciples as are anxious to make use of our help. We shall have a department called "The Daily Altar." For each day of the current week there will be provided a brief exercise suitable for the use of any household. It will consist of a text of scripture, a fragment of poetry or some other utterance upon the same theme, and a brief appropriate prayer. The whole can be read in from three to five minutes. Instead of the prayer supplied, the Lord's Prayer may be used when so desired. Thus in any family where the Christian Century is read, this simple and usable plan for family worship may be employed.

In addition, we shall be glad to furnish copies of that section of the paper called "The Daily Altar" for any minister to use in his congregation. These reprints will be furnished at the cost of printing them, our only object being as far as possible to promote the practice of family worship throughout the brotherhood. Meantime we hope to hear from our readers regarding the matter suggested in this statement.

Shall The Discriples Make Good?

The Centennial convention marks a consummation and a beginning. The story of our first century is written. Its results are known. It was the general feeling at Pittsburg that on the whole the history of the Disciples through their first hundred years manifests a number of very remarkable elements. Their growth has been exceedingly rapid. Their insistence upon the value and authority of the Bible has been prominent. Their exaltation of Christ has been continuous, and their emphasis upon the ordinances of the church has been unremitting.

By the side of these elements of power have been certain others not so encouraging, which were perhaps an inevitable part of that first century's experience.

The early devotion to Christian union object which called the Disciples into being, gave place a little way down the story of that century to another interest, that of the restoration of primitive Christianity, which practically eclipsed the real purpose of the movement. The restoration of primitive Christianity was interpreted in terms of insistence upon immersion and weekly communion.

To be sure, these were not the only elements of emphasis, but it was at these points that the message of the Disciples became most insistent. Later on there arose controversies over inconsequential features which greatly retarded the realization of the first ideals. And in recent years the attention of the churches has been largely diverted from efforts at Christian union to the passion for numerical enlargement through evangelistic activity.

In all these ways and many others that might be noted the Disciples have given but a small part of their attention to the essential task which called them into being. As many of the speakers at Pittsburg said, the Disciples have come with a fair degree of credit through their first century, although at many points their course has been a twisted and indirect one. They have always kept somewhere at hand the familiar watchword of Christian unity, but they have worked at it only intermittently, and often with a totally wrong conception both of its character and the means by which it was to be achieved.

Perhaps a somewhat fuller statement of these side currents of controversy and distraction may put the matter in clearer form. Putting aside minor influences, such as those of millenarianism, soul sleeping and the doctrines of times and seasons, which have here and there sporadically played so significant a part in the activities of some of our people, it is worth while to consider some of those more prominent interests which have diverted attention from our large and serious task of uniting the people of God.

There has always been a running fire of controversy over the ordinances. The struggle through which the Campbells, father and son, passed at their abandonment of affusion and their acceptance of immersion gave to the movement at its very start a strong impulse toward controversy upon baptism. There has probably been no field in which the Disciples found themselves occupied with so congenial a task as in their disputes with their religious neighbors on this question. It was a question peculiarly suited to their mind and temper. The facts are little less that disputable. Those who have attempted to refute the positon of the Disciples on the question of the character of baptism have been compelled to fall back upon conjecture and hypothesis. The Disciples were the people of fact. Their appeal was to the law and the testimony. And this gave them a peculiar advantage in their controversy over the nature of baptism.

Quite forgetful of the fact that this was not their work, and that another great body of Christian people, the Baptists, were set for the defense of the primitive rite of initiation into the Christian Society, the Disciples have unconsciously counted this their first and most impressive work. This statement need not be argued and cannot be disputed. The Disciples have a conscience on the subject of baptism such as on no other theme in the whole range of their interests. Their insistence upon the authority of the Word of God has been chiefly for the purpose of proving immersion the rightful baptism. Their championing of the imperial and all-compelling truth of the Lordship of Jesus has in the end issued in the all-too-evident purpose to claim that authority for the solitary dogma of immersion. These are embarrassing and humbling facts which it is difficult for us to confess, and yet they are so evident as to be incontrovertible.

But the controversial spirit carried farther than the nature of baptism. With the Baptists we were in entire agreement on that point, but we could not agree with them as to the design of the institution, and hence a new series of controversies arose, if anything, more bitter than the former. And in the course of the hostilities our true and normal relation with the Baptists was obscured and our separation from them widened and deepened so that the institution which was intended to be the most simple and beautiful custom of the church became the occasion of hostilities which have left wounds upon the body of Christ too deep to be closed for generations. During all this time Christian union was either forgotten or held as a mere shibboleth, chiefly valuable in enforcing once more the doctrine of immersion as essential to the communion of all believers.

Another of our foolish and sinful diversions was the long debate over missionary methods, which has not yet closed in certain sections of the brotherhood. The tendency to controversy was apparently inherent in the blood of the Disciples. The early protests of Mr. Campbell against human methods carried much farther than he anticipated or could have desired. The freedom of personal interpretation of Scripture became so thoroughly a part of the private confession of faith of all Disciples that the divisive effects of different ways of looking at the great essential problem of world-evangelism gave rise to parties as truly hostile to each other as were the Disciples and the sects around them on other questions. Whether there should be missionary societies, and how they should be administered, occupied the mind of the brotherhood through years that should have been given to the more important issues of missions and unity, and, in the meantime, just in proportion to the exaltation of that subordinate detail, missionary interest itself was limited, and the great plea for Christian union was forgotten or slighted.

Then came the controversy over instrumental music, back upon which the present generation looks with amusement, astonishment and chagrin. Echoes of the old controversy are still heard, but they only point the moral that when a people forget their essential business in the world, they fall into the danger of foolish by-play, and waste their strength upon things which serious-minded men consider the follies of children.

More recently the Disciples have been passing through a period of adjustment to modern views of the Bible and the whole of Christian truth. In this matter they have shared the experiences of all their religious neighbors. The rise and prevalence of the doctrine of evolution was met among them as among all other religious bodies, with suspicion, alarm, and opposition. The study of the Bible in accordance with the principles of criticism and historical interpretation which was resisted, denounced and retarded, has at last become the accepted method among the most effective preachers and teachers of the brotherhood.

These were inevitable changes. They have taken place throughout the Christian world. They were as much a matter of inevitable growth as the acceptance of the Copernican astronomy, the change from sailing to steam and electricity in navigation, or the emergence of democracy in the political life of the modern world. But this transformation, gradual and inevitable as it was, has been the occasion of bitter controversy and reactionary efforts to stay the tide of progress precisely as in other periods. And these controversies have diverted attention from the main purpose of the Disciples, just as have the other side-currents of our history. In the presence of exciting and passion-rousing disputes over matters which are so interesting as the interpretation of Scripture, it is easy to lose sight of one's real task and to waste strength on problems which are only of secondary character, and which the Christian world is in the process of solving without the assistance of the half-trained host who substitute invective for information, and imagine that unless the old and traditional defenses be maintained unchanegd, the very constitution of things will be hopelessly shattered. Today we are happily emerging from this period of anxiety and diversion. Our people are beginning to see that the story of the past ten years has been duplicated in every religious body, only that in some, more than others, breadth of view and absence of legalistic presuppositions have greatly hastened the acceptance of the more rational and satisfying conceptions of Scripture which are destined ere long to prevail and are already accepted in most countries.

In the meantime, what is the prospect that the Disciples will make good in the great enterprise of securing Christian unity, the one purpose which gave them being, and whose insistent advocacy can justify their existence as a separate communion? To this question we wish to give further consideration.

The true laborer is recompensed by his labor, not by his employer. Industry is its own wages. Let us not suffer our hands to lose one jot of their handiness by looking behind to a mean recompense, knowing that our true endeavor cannot be thwarted, nor we be cheated of our earnings unless by not earning them.—Thoreau.

The Difference the First Coming of Christ Made

BY PROFESSOR SILAS JONES.

"There is something touching in the anxiety which every one shows to rediscover himself with his own point of view and his own circle of interest, in this Jesus Christ or at least to get a share in Him. It is the perennial repetition of the spectacle which was seen in the 'Gnostic' movement even as early as the second century, and which takes the form of every conceivable tendency of thought for the possession of Jesus Christ?" Thus does Harnack give his testimony to the abiding influence of Jesus of Nazareth. We cannot escape this influence. Even the unbeliever finds, if he examines himself, that his standard of judgment is in part derived from Jesus.

The Open Door

The open heavens mean the open door for men. The pedantry of scribe and Pharisee make religion something to be carried, not a faith that sustains the heart. The burdens of legalism are intolerable. Jesus says to men, "Come and find rest to your souls." He bids them come and avail themselves of the mercy and forgiving love of God. Of course, if they have wasted youth in foolish living, the lost days cannot be restored. If they have broken the hearts of fathers and mothers, the sorrow they have caused cannot be forgotten and become as if it had never been. Those whom they have led into sin will bear the marks of sin upon them. But in spite of the evil they have done, Jesus bids them use the opportunities that remain. A life of usefulness and self-respect is still open to the sinner who trusts in the God of our Lord Jesus Christ. Such a man is urged to give his attention to the service he is yet capable of rendering rather than to the havoc his past conduct has wrought.

Simple Goodness

The tendency of every movement to degenerate into formalism is fully illustrated in the history of religion. The zeal for truth which burns in the heart of the prophet gives place to zeal for petty rules of conduct and the ritual of worship. As soon as a religion becomes organized, men without piety will seek places of responsibility in the organization and then the process of eliminating vital faith begins. At every stage of Christian history it has been possible for earnest souls to turn back to the Master and learn the spirit of religion that suits all races and all ages. Jesus served the people of his day. He did for them what they needed to have done. He did not ask whether it had ever been done before and he did not ask what the scribes would think about it. If we live Christian lives, we shall be found following Jesus in this matter of service. What is the "Old Jerusalem Gospel" demanded by the conditions confronting us? It is the gospel of redemption, the gospel of divine love that reaches down and lays hold upon the soul of the outcast and gives it the freedom of the truth. But how is this gospel set forth? It has to be spoken in terms of present experience. Confusion comes from attempts to keep alive customs that have outlived their usefulness.

Peace on Earth

The angels sang of peace. Has the song meant anything for the warlike races? Are we nearer the reign of common sense and fraternalism in international relation than were the nations of the ancient world? In spite of the warlike preparations of Europe and America, we may believe that there is a growing horror of war and a growing dislike for building warships and fortifications. The machinery of government is yet in the hands of men who have left in them some of the sentiments of barbarism. These men like to strut about in military toggery and to wear the titles of war. But the majority of the people are becoming tired of the burdens of militarism. They still allow themselves to be fooled into voting taxes for guns and ships, but some day they will find a way to get rid of useless armies and navies. The religion of Jesus has taught universal brotherhood. It still teaches it. He came not to kill but to make alive. The killing business is less popular than it was when Jesus began to teach. The disciple of Jesus thinks of his welfare as a part of the welfare of all. His fight is against disease and injustice and vice. Peace with these is impossible until they are overcome. Their destruction will bring the peace of God.

Mid-week meeting topic for December 22. Matt. 3:16.

The appeal of the conscience is a solemn summons in the life of every man. It cries, Art thou ready? Give an account. Give an account of thy years, thy leisure, thy strength, thy studies, thy talent, and thy works. Now and here is the hour of great hearts, the hour of heroism and of genius.—Amiel.

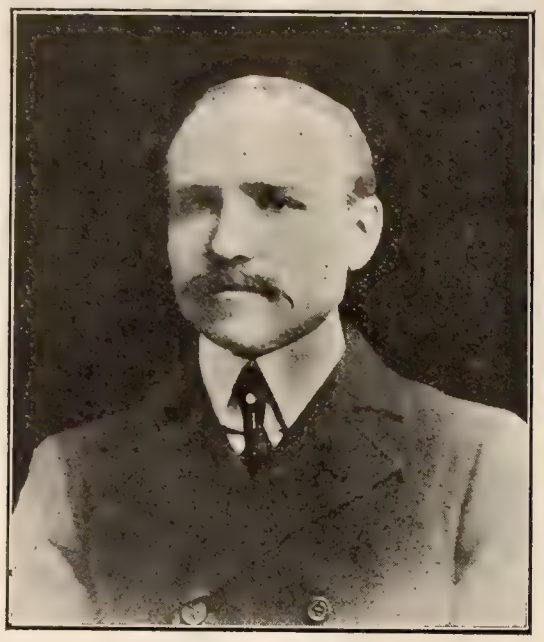
America as Seen by ar American from England

By Leslie W. Morgan

An editor's sanctum is a dangerous place, whether one enters of his own freewill to offer, say, spring poetry, or in answer to an invitation to "hear something of mutual interest to us both." In the case in point the invitation was couched in such gracious terms, as to make the famous one, "come into my little parlor etc.," seem uncouth in comparison. But if there was a wooing note in the invitation, combined with a subtle persuasiveness, this was nothing to be compared with the absolutely irresistible combination of argument, eloquence, appeal and adroit tactics, and of indifference, threats and independency, of ye editors when they got their victim face to face. The net was so carefully woven that he who had thrown many a letter, containing suggestions of like import into the waste paper basket, with easy grace, when he sat in his study 5000 miles away, now utterly collapsed and capitulated, lest a worse thing befall him. The very persistency with which one of the editors went on with his work, in the midst of compositors clamoring for more copy, turning occasionally to relieve the flagging energies of his brother who was leading the attack, made it all the harder to resist.

And why all this effort? Not that there had been discovered a literary genius; not that the paper itself was languishing for want of correspondence from Iowa and Illinois, or even Texas; not that excellency had not shown itself in its columns already to the point of brilliancy. It was simply that a man (not too much emphasis on that word, please), a man had been discovered, living in the center of the universe,—not Boston, nor yet Chicago, but London, who might be useful in supplying news from the world's metropolis. And so may it be. "He that is but little in the Kingdom of Heaven is greater than he" is not the greatness of individual worth, but vantage ground.

The Visit to America.



Three months in America, after ten years absence, with only a flying visit in the meantime, is a privilege to be highly prized. This has been the experience of the writer, thanks to an indulgent church and the generosity of the Christian Association in granting an extended vacation. And when there is added to this the privilege of bringing one's wife to his native land showing his friends and countrymen what there really is to be had in foreign waters, it is a joy long to be remembered. Lest any bachelor friends should be led astray, it may be well to add that in this case the old adage does not apply, that there are fishes in the sea just as good as those that have been caught. It may be giving away a trade secret, but it is just as well to admit that the sample shown, was a sample only, and that it cannot be expected that the general supply will equal it. However, there are fishes little and big, speckled and striped, and there is no knowing any one's taste.

Reflections Upon the Visit.

How do you like America? Have things changed in ten years? Would you like to live here? Do you prefer England to this country? These were questions asked alternately, over and again, of the American resident abroad, and of his English wife. That there was some opportunity to gather data for reply, will not be denied when it is stated that the journey included such cities and states as New York, Troy, Niagara Falls, Toledo, Ft. Wayne, Chicago, Des Moines, Lincoln, Tulsa, Oklahoma, St. Louis, back to Chicago and then North Dakota and back, on to Pittsburgh and then again to New York via Washington.

Criticism and Compliment.

It would be easy to criticise on the one hand, but on the other it would not be difficult to compliment. It may be well to mingle the two in the reply. There have been great changes; scarcely any thing has stood still; even the Statue of Liberty looks different when one enters the country than when one leaves, and the foreigner is sometimes made to wonder whether it means what it says; the country regions have improved and greatly prospered, and facilities for contact with the outside world have greatly increased; the cities have developed,—some of them in boodle and some in municipal reform; there is an unfinished appearance on many hands that gives good promise for the future, but is not reassuring for assets; there is a temporary character to many structures that does not give promise for the future, but may contribute to present profits; there is a slackness in the enforcement of law and a looseness in local regulations, at crossings, on street cars, at railway stations, with their platforms on a level with the tracks, that make the Englishman wonder if he will get out of the country alive; there is at least a surface lack of politeness that makes the European wonder why his presence is offensive, or in the restaurant, whether his tip has been too small to deserve a "thank you"; the sight of spitting and chewing affects an Englishman very much as does a rough sea in mid-ocean, and he would as soon have an open sewer in his basement as a spittoon in his office; that the cities are suppressing this is a hopeful sign and the entire country will do well to follow suit; there is abundant evidence of universal education, but an apparent lack of culture; there is a growing disposition of slackness of discipline in the home, and a seeming absence of any system of training or standards of behavior for children; there is a precocity of youth, where they are fully twelve by the time they are eight, and sixteen before they are twelve; there is a consulting of the child as to what he would like to eat or wear or where he would like to go or what he would like to do, and the resigned way in which the parent says, "Very well then, you need-n't," would be amusing were it not so serious in its effect upon the future of national life; (these experiences were by no means universal, but were not uncommon in train, street car, store and restraurant); the increase in prices is something appalling to the purchaser and doubtless just as gladdening to the seller, unless it nas cost him double to produce it; the awakening of the people on every hand to the iniquity of a high tariff, is a hopeful sign,—not one word of sympathy having been heard for it, or even an attempted apology offered, except among the custom officials in New York, sixty of whom have just been dismissed for dishonesty in collecting it; the religious activity is hopeful and refreshing, with perhaps the exception of an overemphasis on doing and an underemphasis of being; the Sunday-school revival is tremendous, and if genuine Bible study is fostered to even half the extent that enthusiasm and numbers are exalted, the future should be bright with hope; there are signs that some day missions will be supported as a matter of fact and not merely in response to a passionate appeal that we must be quick or the heathen will die before we can get to them; our people give hopeful signs of adjustment to the needs of the second century of our history, as accurately and as faithfully as did our fathers to the needs of the first century; the country as a whole seems to have only begun, but to have well begun, the development of a land that has within it the possibilities of almost no other land.

Leslie W. Morgan, London, England.

But the questions, are they answered? If any thing remains, perhaps it may be inferred from the fact that immediately upon our return we began negotiations for the purchase of a permanent home, and by the time these lines are read we hope to be settled at the address given below, for many days to come, and where the latch-string will always be out to our many friends both old and new in the land of the "biggest," "highest." "longest," "richest," "costliest," and "fastest" things in the world.

Returning Delegates.

All of the English delegation to the convention have returned, the last two only yesterday. Five of us came back together at the end of the week in which the convention closed, and have begun giving reports in our churches. All were impressed with the size of the gathering, with the reverence at the communion service, with the enthusiasm of the men, with the genuine good-fellowship everywhere and with the generous hospitality so freely extended to the foreign delegates by kind friends in Pittsburgh, and by the genuine interest manifested every where concerning our work in England. The English tea at the Hotel Schenley and the conference which followed were amongst the most delightful events of a memorable week.

Current events in England just now are full of interest. We are on the eve of deciding mighty issues. The next fortnightly article will deal with the Budget and the significance of its rejection by the House of Lords.

Do not fail to read the announcement of the Bethany Graded Lessons, in this week's papers. The introduction of these lessons will greatly improve the work of any school. There is nothing better. Order of the New Christian Century Company.

The Religious Outlook

By Errett Gates

Prof. Briggs on Church Unity

Prof. C. A. Briggs, of Union Theological Seminary, has been for many years an earnest student of the history and principles of Christian unity.

Since the writer was a student in the Seminary in 1891-94, the Professor's interest and information on the subject have developed into a course of study which he calls "Christian Irenics." Union Seminary and the Disciples' Divinity House are the only institutions of learning that have elevated this theme to the dignity of a scholastic discipline.

Interest in Christian Union.

Prof. Briggs' pre-eminent interest in the subject has given it this recognition in Union Seminary. He is usually thought of as a Hebrew scholar, and that is the field in which he has won international distinction; but he confessed to the writer in an interview two years ago in New York City, that his deeper interest has always lain in the practical problem of Christian reunion, and to the solution of this he has come to consecrate his later years. It might be said that the Professor regards this as a real apostleship to which he is called. No other interest claims so much of his time, strength and affection. For years he has been diligently collecting literature and data upon its history, and no man in America is more deeply imbued with its spirit. Those who have enjoyed a personal acquaintance with the Professor know of his long cherished plans to publish the results of his inquiries and reflections; and it is to be hoped that he will be given time and strength to carry them out.

The book which Prof. Briggs has just published, entitled "Church Unity," consists of articles previously published in various American periodicals. It is neither a history of Christian union nor a plan for its consummation, but, as the sub-title indicates, "studies" of its most important problems. The book does not deal with a single theme, but many themes, all more or less closely related to Church unity.

The Quadrilateral Basis.

It is well known that when the "Quadrilateral Basis" of church union was proposed by the House of Bishops of the Episcopal Church in 1886, Prof. Briggs adopted it as a providential solution of the problem of unity, and became its stout advocate in the pages of the "Presbyterian Review" of which he was then editor. When he lost his ministerial standing in the Presbyterian Church, after his trial for heresy by the General Assembly, he took orders in the ministry of the Episcopal Church. While he still holds to the "Quadrilateral Basis" as the only practicable plan of reunion, and is now a member of the Episcopal Church, he is not blind to the difficulties of the plan or to the shortcomings of Episcopalianism. In the task before us his appreciation of the "Historic Episcopate" is moderated by sharp criticisms of its abuses and extravagances.

This task makes it perfectly clear that the problem of Christian union is not one, but many problems, and that its solution for one section of the church would not be its solution for all sections. A plan which would satisfy the Roman Catholics, would not satisfy the Congregationalists, and a plan that would meet the approval of the Church of England would not meet the approval of the Baptists. The movement for unity resolves itself into various movements, sectional and restricted.

The form of government and the validity of orders are most serious problems to Roman Catholics and Episcopalians in the settlement of a basis of union; they are no problem at all to Congregationalists and Baptists. The form of baptism is a most serious and sensitive question to Baptists and Disciples; but it is no problem at all to Congregationalists and Methodists. It depends upon which churches come together to discuss a basis of union, as to what questions will be forced to the front and made the issue.

Not Ready for Union.

It is fair to say that the Episcopalians are not yet ready to discuss union with Congregationalists, or the Lutherans with the Disciples. They represent differences without a bond of sympathy for each other's peculiarities. There is no common starting point. The Congregationalist moves aside at once as immaterial the question of Apostolic Succession. But the Episcopalian makes it the question of a standing or falling church. He has fought for it all his life, and it would be difficult now to convince him that it was as idle a question as the mediæval question of the number of angels that could stand on the point of a needle. The Congregationalist laid that question of Apostolic Succession on the table many generations ago. He has settled it once for all by declaring that the only kind of succession at all worth while is the succession of the apostolic spirit and not the apostolic office. It would be difficult for him now to treat the discussion of it seriously, unless out of a momentary consideration for the feelings of a misled priest. The question is simply out of date, along with its companion questions of ministerial dress and precedence. They are interesting as curiosities of ecclesiastical history, like the mastodon and the five-toed horse of geological history.

Curiosities of History.

It is to be feared that Prof. Briggs is treating to a serious discussion in his book some of the curiosities of ecclesiastical history. He has raised up what a very large section of the church has agreed to treat as an extinct problem, namely, the question of "The Validity of Orders." Who cares anything about it anyway, except a bespectacled English curate dressed up in his day-collar. The apostles have no successors, no matter how many episcopal honors have been laid upon men, if they are not touched with the apostolic spirit. There have been too many apostolic men in the history of the church, outside the supposed "Apostolic Succession," to make the church greatly concerned about the consecration of priestly houses. Her most apostolic men have received invalid orders, or none at all.

Prof. Briggs' discussions would represent the progress of Christendom and have a wider interest if he had had in view the wider circle. It is needless to say that he speaks out of his own Episcopalian circle, and has in view the problem of union as it appears to the Episcopalian. The issues he raises are Episcopalian issues, and such issues as are raised in the approach between Romanists and Churchmen.

It may be that it will be necessary to settle the question of "Apostolic Succession," "Orders," and of "Jurisdiction" agreeably to Romanists and Anglicans before there can be a union between them; but there will have to be another settlement before there can be a union of Protestant and Anglican. It is but a temporary makeshift to reconcile Romanist and Anglican to their petty differences and confirm them more deeply in them. It might be economy of time and effort to let the solvent power of Christian progress reconcile their differences by showing them that they are not important differences and are not real to the thought of a wider Christendom or vital to a more essential Christianity.

The Kind of Unity.

Prof. Briggs is looking for an institutional or sacramental unity. That is because he is looking for a basis of union between Anglican and Romanist, and must needs concede the importance of the sacramental contention between them. If he were in quest of a basis of union between Congregationalist and Quaker he would never raise the question of "Apostolic Succession" or Episcopal Jurisdiction." Such a thing is not named among them. How is Prof. Briggs going to fit his discussions to the point of view of the non-episcopal bodies in Christendom and make his book worthy of the serious consideration he seems to think it deserves at the hands of an impartial Christian public?

His book may help on the reconciliation of Romanist and Anglican, but he has not gone deep enough to make any contribution to the ultimate reunion of the whole of Christiandom. That far off, divine event awaits a solution that goes back of that which is Roman and Anglican to that which is simply and purely Christian. The Christian world has, as a whole, moved past Prof. Briggs' point of view some three hundred years. It is idle for him to expect the church of the Twentieth Century to go back and take a very keen interest in sixteenth century controversies, much less adopt them as her own.

Religious Education

By Harry F. Burns

The Graded Lessons and the Teacher's Task

The need of the graded system of lessons in the Sunday-school has long been recognized by leaders of thought in the church. Before the organization of the Religious Education Association in 1893, but little progress had been made toward the preparation or introduction of such courses of lessons. Since the organization of this association which brought together and into coöperation leading thinkers from all parts of the country, interested in religious education, the progress has been rapid. There was at once conscious and united effort to secure more efficient work by all engaged in the cultivation of the religious life of others. The subject has come prominently before the whole people. The need of a graded series of lessons has become more and more apparent. The more progressive schools of all denominations have long since faced the question of finding a series of lessons that would meet this recognized need. Within the past two or three years the subject has been so much before the people that all Sunday-schools, except those to which the epithet "backwoodsy" might be applied, have come to recognize the need and face the problem.

Publishers have been ready to meet this growing demand, and already no less than a dozen different courses of lessons, all claiming to be graded have been offered the churches. Many of these are a series of text books, adapted to the different grades. Others follow the old quarterly idea with an attempt to grade the lessons. Most notable of all has been the appearance within the last few months of the graded lessons of the international system. These do not supplant the old lessons, but are offered to the schools which are demanding that the lessons which they use be in a graded series. The appearance of these lessons has brought the problem definitely before many schools that had not faced it before.

When this problem is first presented to a school, many a good earnest teacher hesitates to indorse a change to a graded system because she feels that it will make more difficult her work. The graded lessons idea is related to genuine systematic education, and many a teacher in the Sunday-school is too modest to think of herself as a real educator. Let every such trembling teacher quiet her fears. The graded lessons will not bring a heavier task, but will rather simplify the problem of teaching.

Lessons Adapted to the Class.

The writer of this article was called upon not many weeks ago, to teach a class of girls under ten years of age. The school was using the ungraded lessons. The scripture for the day was from Paul's letter to the Corinthian Church. Paul had written to grown Christians. These children had not lived long enough for the Apostles words to have interest and meaning to them. There was but one thing for their teacher to do. This he did. He took a suggestion from the lesson and called upon his memory for material to elaborate it, and illustrate it. He thus taught the children, but not the lesson which was before them for the day. The inventive teacher, thoroughly familiar with the whole field of religion can do this occasionally: even such a teacher would not like to face, the task every Sunday. Such a lesson is no help at all for such a class. The teacher who really teaches must disregard the lesson given, and make her own. Now the graded system of lessons places in the teacher's hand a lesson for each Sunday that is adapted to just the class which she is teaching. It simplifies her task.

Lessons are Systematically Arranged.

The ungraded lessons have been "scrappy." They have been as texts for exhortations and not systematic series of lessons leading the pupil from one point to another. The teacher of the ungraded lessons must spend much time keeping up "the connecting links," a task which she can not hope to accomplish. Graded lessons while they may use different scripture passages from Sunday to Sunday, yet they are closely, and progressively related in thought, and on that account each lesson prepares the child's mind for the succeding one. Therefore, again, the graded lessons simplify the teacher's task.

Helps Adapted to the Class.

Not only is the teacher helped in her task by the selection of scripture material which is adapted to the needs and capacity of the children she is teaching; but the helps published with the lesson are prepared by persons who are experts in working with just the particular age. This was somewhat true of the ungraded lessons, but much more so of the graded. In these lessons the teacher and the one who prepares the helps, consciously attempt, not primarily to interpret a given passage of scripture, but to bring to the mind and heart of the pupil a certain truth, a certain ideal, in which that pupil is now at the age to be interested, and which it is now old enough to appropriate to its life. The object of the endeavor is the development of the religious life of the pupil. The scriptural material is used as a means to this end. This again simplifies the teacher's task. The helps that are given her, are helps indeed. The teacher who feels her lack of preparation for teaching, and knows herself crowded for time, for the preparation of her Sunday's work, and therefore hesitates to adopt the graded lessons, which sound so formidable, is unduly alarmed. When she has used the graded lessons she will wonder how she ever performed her work at all without them. By presenting to the teacher material adapted to the child's ability, material systematically arranged with reference to its interest, and with helps prepared specifically for each age of the pupil's life, the teacher's work is greatly simplified.

of all Jesus is called Saviour and when I say, "My Saviour," as I do say honestly, I pay the highest tribute. Jesus, Saviour—sweetest words in the anthems of triumph.

Timeliness and Timelessness.

Jesus used the vehicles of his age and time. The skilled physician used the awkward instruments at hand, and still got his results, like Dr. Grenfell in the Labrador. He did not come as a professor in geology, astronomy nor even scriptural criticism, he came to give new life and a demonstration of that life. The new life was the wine that burst the old wine-skins; that shattered the old legalism. Friends, Jesus was the great soul, the great spirit, loving, tender, brave, pure, healthy, Whom to know was life eternal. Whom to know was either to love or to hate. Jesus split society in twain. He swept his fan over the threshing floor and separated grain from chaff. Even today he is the magnet, which moving our society, attracts the steel and leaves the dross.

How He Thought of Himself.

What was Jesus own conception of his mission? Will you open your gospels and let him answer for himself, rather than impose your own notions? "I came to seek and to save the lost." "I came to give the abundant life." "I came to fulfill, not to destroy." In the synagogue when the book was handed to him he read the thrilling words from Isiah. He felt the Spirit of God upon him and in a spiritual way he was to preach to the poor, to release the captives bound in legal fetters and in sins, to restore sight to the spiritually blind (the blindness which knows only dead legalism and is unconscious of the beauties of spiritual life), to set at liberty those who were bruised by the frightful social wrongs, to proclaim the time when God's will would be done on earth. In his own words Jesus conceived of his mission as a spiritual-social life.

Again, when John the Baptist was imprisoned and his eagle nature was chaffing because Jesus was not allowing himself to be made king, or because he was not doing some spectacular, world-challenging thing, but was quietly going about doing good, John sent his disciples to ask him, "Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?" Jesus was living his plain, natural, simple, democratic life, bringing good things out of his own good soul. It seemed to John that some mistake had been made. When the delegation arrived Jesus told them to stand by for a while and watch him. Then he told them to return to John and tell him precisely what they had seen and heard. His great spirit had been healing, blessing, teaching, uplifting men. Jesus was a great soul, thrilling all who came in vital contact with him. Jesus lived the radiant life. He was "A cathedral filled with light." Jesus lived the refreshing life. He was a cup overflowing with the water of eternal life. Jesus was the satisfying life. He was the bread which eating, our hunger is appeased. Yet again, turn to Jesus' great sermon and read his account of the qualifications of the citizens of

By John Ray Ewers

A Sermon for Men: "Jesus the Great Soul"

(On the morning of October 31, the elegant class of men, of the East End Church, Pittsburgh, was invited to remain for the morning service and the minister, John Ray Ewers delivered the following sermon. Text Rom. 8:9. Other Scriptures read were, Luke 4: 16-22 and 7:18-23.)

Loving Jesus, we never tire of singing his praises. The more we study him, the deeper we meditate upon him, the richer our experience in him, the nobler he becomes. Standing upon the porch of a western hotel, a traveler remarked, as one of the famous mountains was indicated on the far horizon, "Why that is no higher than a man's head." Entering his train he rode until noon, when stepping to the platform he was amazed to find the mountain rising above him half way to the zenith. In the evening he stood at the base of a great cliff that seemed to pierce the very sky, while still above rose the colossal piles of the incomprehensible mountain. He was lost in wonder, an insignificant atom at the base. Thus a man may say, with little reflection, "Jesus is no larger than a man." But studying that marvellous life through the years he at last finds himself lost in the vastness of Jesus' regal personality. Above the greatest men in history Jesus towers a glory crowned peak. Divine? Yes. Bring to him all your noblest adjectives; paint him in your most glowing colors; stretch your imagination to its utmost reach and then know that you have but touched the fringe of the garment which Jesus wears.

Jesus' Simplicity and Democracy.

More wonderful yet was Jesus in his simplicity, reality and democracy. We exhaust our best figures and symbols in trying to describe him. We call him a king. He was also the great commoner. He was great enough to be plain. We call him teacher-philosopher. Not like the philosophers who strutted in the porches and groves of Greece was our Lord. In his democratic reality he spoke of sowing, bread-making, sheep tending. He wrote no book, and I am heartily glad that he did not, for had he done so we would today be worshipping the book rather than the personality who produced it, even as now we make an idol of the gospels and epistles and often forget the great spirits that wrote them.

Jesus Satisfies.

We call Jesus the Bread of life. Hungering, he alone satisfies us. We call him the Water of life, bringing refreshment to thirsty men, driven along the dusty highways. We call him a Vine, out from which flows the fruit making sap. We call him the Good Shepherd, who cares particularly for the injured and lost of his flock. We call him the Rose, filling all the atmosphere with heavenly fragrance. John calls him the Light. superb figure of his mission. Jesus is the Great Physician, bringing all of man to perfect health. His value is therapeutic. Best his new kingdom. These elements seem just the opposite of the worldly-wise-man's view. Conscious poverty of spirit, sorrow, meekness, soul-hunger, mercy, purity, peace, persecution for righteousness sake—these are the homely virtues that Jesus came to inculcate and to demonstrate.

His Mission.

In a word Jesus came to give us the religion of the spirit, as contrasted with the religion of legalism. He came to teach fellowship with God whom he revealed as a spirit. As free as the winds of heaven is a man to be. In this religion there need be no hiding behind ecclesiastical forms. Crosses, robes, altars, images are not needed by the man who worships in spirit and in truth. In the jostling thoroughfare, by the rolling sea, or in the sweet-scented hay field he lifts his soul acceptably to God. Jesus was and is the Great Soul and he will mold us into great souls if we will allow.

We all know how noble personalities help us and inspire us. Meeting such, the domes of our heads are lifted up. We see a larger world and we thrill with holier ambitions. Carry such an inspiring life out to infinity and you have Jesus, the great soul. Paul says, "If any man hath not the spirit of Chrst, he is none of his." This text mu-t strike terror to the heart of the empty formalist. It may well cause all of us to pause and most seriously consider. Jesus himself made fruit bearing the final test and we know kell what the fruit of the spirit is: love, joy, peace, long suffering and the rest. (See Gal. 5:22). In the old Harvard chapel recently a man of God prayed, "May the spirit which was in Jesus be now in us." I would change one word for to me Jesus is not a dead man, but a living Lord. "May the spirit which is in Jesus be also in us." Oh, Jesus thou great soul breathe upon us and fashion us also into thy likenes.

The unpardonable sin is to persistently refuse to yield to the inspirations from Jesus. What a challenge he gives us! How his great soul speaks to us! How admirable he is! What a life he offers! Oh, holy Savious, how can we longer resist thy charms?

A Golden Opportunity

By Alva W. Taylor

The Disciples of Missouri are presented with the most golden opportunity just now given to the whole brotherhood. R. A. Long's offer of $50,000 to the Bible College at Columbia if $50,000 if raised in good notes is not only a challenge to brotherhood generosity, but is signficant in our whole educational movement. The large sum sum that may be thus claimed for education is but one-half the opportunity. Here is a chance to do a unique work and one that will challenge the attention of all religious communions and of all state universities if properly supported. It is not altogether new for Canada has tried the plan at Toronto University and found it more than satisfactory to both the state and the churches. It was the original idea of Jefferson, in founding the University of Virginia, that the churches should plant their seminaries around the university campus.

The state university needs the Bible College. Biblical and religious instruction is as much a requisite to a rounded out education as is literature or mathematics. Our sectarianism prevents the state from paying for it, so the church must furnish it or fail just so much in her duty. If we be nonsectarian the duty is all the more ours than others. The University of Missouri is very liberal in its co-operation with the Bible College and offers all credit possible for work done under its instructors. As the courses are enlarged and increased in number more credits will be given. Even now a student in the University of Missouri can obtain as much credit for work done in the Bible College as can the students in many of our own colleges for work done in their own Biblical departments. The fact that nearly two-hundred are taking advantage of the arrangement by taking courses in the Bible College is ample demonstration of the feasibility of the plan and the efficiency of the school.

From the standpoint of the church there is both an efficiency and an economy. The income of the State University of Missouri represents the equal of an endowment of millions. The appointments of a state supported institution are better than can be obtained by none but the great denominational institutions. The citizens of the state pay for all of it just as they pay for the public schools, and it is made the crown of the public school system. Like the public school it is offered freely to all who come. The church thus effects the same economy that it makes when it sends its children to the graded and high schools instead of building parochial institutions of education.

The testimony of such schools, as that of our own people at Eugene, Oregon, the seat of the University of Oregon, is that the older the Bible College grows the more will students of the Bible seek its instruction, together with that of the State University. Their testimony also is that the mingling of the ministerial and missionary students with the students and in the life of the state institution, fits them admirably to meet the problems of our times when they are once on the field. There they mingle with the men who are to be the leading lawyers, editors, physicians, teachers, scientists, and men of business of their generation. They find their viewpoint, learn their way of thinking, are confronted with their problems and find the way to meet them with the claims of the Christian religion. They go to their work with a practical equipment that makes their seminary instruction more adaptable. In the university also they are provided with courses in sociology such as few church schools are yet able or willing to provide and by supplementing them with such specific courses in the Bible College as the work of the church demands, the ministerial student is equipped on this latest and most necessary discipline for the work of the chureh in our time.

The endowment and support of such a school means no less loyalty to the church college. There will ever be a place for it, and doubtless an enlarging place, but there is a duty to the thousands who attend the great state universities that cannot be ignored and that no loyalty to the small church school can ever supply. Neither one means the exclusion of the other. Let us have both. But just now is the unique and opportune time for the endowment of the Bible College at a great state university, one that means not only the adding of $100,000 to the equipment of one of our most efficient educational institutions, but an enlargement that will bring other added thousands in the course of time. The great brotherhood of Missouri cannot and will not, we feel sure, allow the chance to be lost.

Christian Endeavor

By W. D. Endres.

OUR RESPONSIBILITY FOR HOME AND FOREIGN MISSIONS.

Topic, December 26, Matt. 28:16-20.

The division of missions into "home" and "foreign" is unfortunate. It may be convenient for working purposes but there is no difference between home and foreign missions from the point of view of Christian service and evangelism. When, therefore, we talk about our Christian obligation the subject might be better called, "Our Responsibility for Missions."

The genius of Christianity, the work of Jesus and His Apostles, the teachings of the Scriptures, and human experience, all declare in chorus that we have the greatest of responsibility to this work.

Christianity was born to serve. It presupposes a need and it seeks to supply it. The very coming of Jesus was that we might have a well rounded full and complete life. It was the confused, bewildered, enslaved, selfish, lost man whom he sought and ministered to. Jesus sought to give the true interpretation of life to men and so long then as there are those groping without it it is the obligation of his followers to minister to them. This is the Christian spirit and it knows the bounds of neither home or foreign—as a matter of fact all are home the wide world over.

The work of Jesus bears abundant testimony to this truth. True he gave his commission the lost sheep of the house of Israel but he later gave it to the people of all nations. He spoke the parable of the good Samaritan, he spoke forgiveness to the sinful woman, he ate with publicans and sinners, yea, he commissioned his disciples to all the world. He sought all men of all estates that he might render to them the service they so much needed and which they alone could give.

If we look upon Jesus as a ministering servant to all mankind, the experience of the race imposes the obligation of missions. The man or the nation which has lived longest and most in the world and made the greatest permanent contribution to the world's progress and happiness, has been the Christian man or nation. Glance at human experience in a single panoramic and assess the achievements which have stood the test of time and the failures which others have made. It has been the individual or the nation which has nearest approached the ideals of our Lord that made the richest personal life and given the most to those in need. There are two truths here for us. That life is richest which gives most, and judging from the experience of the past, in this ideal only is the hope of the nations of the future.

Here the field of opportunity spreads out before us in limitless expanse. There is the invitation of the foreign land with its teaming millions of ignorant, hungry, lazy, half-naked people laden with unspeakable habits, customs and practices. Their dishonesty, their filth, their vice and their crime, are most incredible. Then there is the crying need of the home land. Thousands upon thousands here in the boasted land of freedom and opportunity who are groping in ignorance, struggling against hunger, battling half-clad against the bitter cold, and denied the privilege of books and pictures, music and enjoyment. Their habits of life rival those of the jungle in their degradation in the vice and filth. So long as such is the case there is need, there is work to do. So long as there is suffering the cry of the suffering is made to Christians.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Counter Opinion

Editors The Christian Century: It would be hard to tell you how much astonished I was to read your leading editorial in the Century for last week: "Reopening the Baptism Question," and, of all sources, to see such teaching proceed from the Christian Century. It is strange and discouraging to me to know that you would so well and clearly set forth the fairness and justice of our position, recognizing the responsibility of the individual for his own views, and the propriety of our considering them with as much respect as we demand of him for ours; and yet that you should say the only basis of union is upon the practice of immersion. How this Augsburg and Westminster attitude and feeling of keepership of the consciences of others can persist in an editorial atmosphere that otherwise seems so free of the dogmatic, and creed imposing spirit, I cannot comprehend. It seems like abandoning the principles just where we are called upon to apply them—truly at the point where they have most application for us.

I take for granted you believe absolutely, as I do, that immersion is the only baptism taught by the scriptures. But why refuse fellowship and communion, and Christian recognition, calling for our fullest coöperation, enrollment on the church membership register, if you please, to those who believe differently, and give evidence of as much honesty and sincerity in their belief as we can show in ours? Or are we, the collection of congregations that have organized under the teachings of Alexander Campbell and others, vested with authority to pass upon the titles of the members of the Church of Christ? I think this is assuming too freely a responsibility we have not been called upon to discharge.

Of course, we can segregate ourselves upon the immersionist platform, and say, with Martin Luther: "Here stand we. We can not otherwise. God help us. Amen." But then we can no longer claim that in that segregation we give equal respect to the opinion and conscience of every follower of Christ, nor can we deny that we claim a superior faculty in ascertaining the Divine will, nor that we have organized a subdivision of Disciples upon that claim.

Besides, could we win any more persons to the truth by such segregation? And do you think it was the practice of the early church to hold aloof from those who appeared to honestly seek the truth? Here the line seems a very narrow one, and one of policy: Whether we can accomplish more for immersion by associating with or disassociating from those unimmersed; and whether, abandoning our disclaimer of creed, it would accomplish more to maintain an organization upon a creedal basis for the extension of this our belief and practice. It seems to me like this: If an unimmersed person applies for membership in "our church," we say to him we consider immersion necessary, and the only proper method of baptism. He replies: I have made my own investigations, and have come to my own and a different conclusion. We then say: We look at it this way, and are positive the Scriptures permit no other way. There is no escape from the truth of his rejoinder: Your church in this particular is founded on your views. You have no more right to call yourselves the Church of Christ than my church, founded upon my views, has the right to call itself the same. If we wish to have a church that is maintained for the purpose of emphasizing the necessity of immersion as the only form of baptism (or the indispensability of the historic episcopate, or the essentiality of transubstantiation, or predestination, or anything that is less than the whole of Christian life and service), for truth's and consistency's sake, let us say so; and let us not profess to have a church unbound by creed, and ungoverned by convention. Let us merely say that we have the necessary creed, or the "irreducible minimum" creed, or the strict and net biblical creed.

Please understand, I am not arguing for those who disbelieve in sprinkling to practice it; for those who believe in immersion to cease preaching it. But sprinkling may be solely for those that believe in it; and its practice should not debar, nor excommunicate them, nor cause us to "rest uncomfortably" in the church as though we were the vice regents, responsible for the faith of the flock. You say: "In a church which practices it." The whole question is what is the church: Are we the church, or are they the church, or does "the church" pratice it at all? Let it be understood as it actually is, that the individuals practice it. It is presumptuous for us to think we can mark off the boundaries of the Church, or that it is given to us to limit and define the church. If our belief is not acceptable to the unimmersed, we can do no better than to offer them our opinions as frequently as they care to hear them; and this can not be more successfully done than in the bonds of Cnristian fellowship

Your distinction between the practice of immersion, and the dogma by which this exclusive practice has been upheld, seems to me too refined and delicate for a working proposition in the unification of the sects. Your question, How can a minister with an immersionist conscience practice affusion, seems to me very insufficient as an obstacle to the logical consequence of our general position. It is unity with those who are already sprinkled, and who, in the union would continue that practice, and with those, like Quakers, and others who do not recognize the necessity of baptism in any form, that is the pressing question.

In my opinion you have absolutely fallen down in this. I cannot understand what has gotten wrong. I had hoped the Century would lead forward and beyond the line where some persons prescribe beliefs for other persons, and assume to themselves the speakership and interpretation of the Divine Word. In the Century I saw the chief hope of progress that, should increase regardless of bands that were tied a hundred years ago. Now I fear there may be nothing to prevent our great organization, in the power of its numbers and the prestige of its property, entrenched in the self-assurance of the propaganda that has made it what it is, from feeling the conservation of these doctrines, ordinances, practices, traditions and mottoes, given us by the fathers, to be the end of our aspirations. I feel you have yielded your ground, that the rabbis have taken what you have surrendered, and that they will be aggressive and uncompromising for the elimination of even the measure of freedom for which you have contended.

But, perhaps I do not understand what you have meant by the editorial, nor what you consider to be the proper attitude of the Christian Church (as restored by Alexander Campbell and others) toward the "pious unimmersed." If the meaning of the editorial has been misapprehended, I shall be glad to have a correction made.

The Scandal of the Young Man's Unbelief

In a conservative religious journal of recent date there appeared the letter of a distressed and heartbroken father telling with pathetic earnestness of his son's loss of faith through contact with a great modern university. Reared in a religious home, fed on the orthodoxy of his day, the young man found that his religious convictions came into such radical conflict with the intellectual spirit of the university as to preclude any chance of agreement. And then unable to give up what appeared to him to be the plain results of modern scholarship he abandoned his religious faith. The cause is a pathetic one. Far from being an isolated instance it is but typical of many thousands that might be written in the same vein. But it is none the less pathetic on this account. Here are the elements of a tragedy. A father's heart is aching, the church of the young man's boyhood is grieving, the young man himself is torn with doubt and distress.

But the worst is not yet told. Back of the superficial elements of the story is the scandal of a recreant and helpless church. The supreme tragedy of the whole affair is that the theological professor to whom the letter was addressed and the religious journal in whose columns the letter was published had for father or son not one word of help, much less of comfort.

A slur on the university as a breeding place of infidelity, a word of caution to parents not to send their sons to such places and the whole matter is dismissed. And meanwhile the tragedy is re-enacted over and over again. And meanwhile the church meets the situation as helplessly as ever—argument is met with anathema, and intellectual enthusiasm such as the world never before has witnessed is met with the empty form of an impotent authority. Consider the spectacle of a church that is afraid to meet honestly and courageously the intellectual spirit of the age, whose faith is so insecurely grounded, that when its pet bases of authority are seen to be tottering, it cries out in panic that the whole structure of religion is threatened. Oh, the shame of it.

Is Jesus to go wounded and bleeding into the intellectual centers of our age while his followers either flee or at best seek to defend him with the antiquated weapons of thirteenth century authority? The scandal of the young man's unbelief is pre-eminently the scandal of the church.

Thank God, the church is not altogether recreant. Prophetic souls of God's own choosing are interpreting the abiding truths of our Christian faith to just such men as these in a language that is intelligible and in a spirit that is satisfying. The time is not far distant when these young men, children of our best universities, will no longer make shipwreck of their faith, but led by the wise counsel of strong men, will come, intellectually satisfied, into conscious relationship with Him Whose spirit is yet to redeem the world. A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

CHAPTER IV.

Commencement Week.

Commencement was the solemn high festival in Carlinville. It was ushered in by a series of class exhibitions and Baccalaureate Sunday. The visiting alumni returned in force.

On Baccalaureate Sunday during the sermon, an impressive exhortation of the old President to the young graduates, seats on the platform were reserved for distinguished visitors, and on this lovely June morning Brainard sat among them, a notable figure, Eleanor readily admitted. He had seen her almost at once, so quickly and mysteriously does the eye single out the object which occupies the mind when it comes within the radius of vision.

Her face had an expression of pensive sadness, and as he turned away, fearing that his steady regard might be observed by others, his attention was attracted by a swarthy, arrogant man, who entered late, and was shown to one of the few unoccupied chairs in a side aisle. Brainard's heart gave a dull throb—an emotional weakness that one would not suspect in a learned judge. He had no difficulty in recognizing Horace Bannister. Long ago, when Bannister was a dissipated sophomore, he had heard rumors of his engagement to Eleanor Crofton, and stories of his wild exploits were yet among the traditions of Carlinville. Mrs. Crofton had been Bannister's staunch ally, but for some reason the engagement had been suddenly broken, and Bannister left college.

Brainard had forgotten that Bannister was to attend commencement this year, having been invited to respond to one of the toasts at the alumni banquet. He had visited the college but once since leaving it and was then accompanied by his newly-made wife—a florid, overdressed woman some years his senior, who had, however, substantial charms as the widow and legatee of a wealthy western mine-owner. Bannister found this marriage a short cut to fortune, for she died after a few years and left to him all she could of her vast possessions.

Brainard suspected that he had now returned to make his peace with Eleanor, whom, he believed, no man could forget, once having known her. He wondered painfully if Eleanor was aware of his presence there, but was soon convinced that she was not. At length he perceived that her eye also rested on the man's changed countenance. aimlessly, at first, and then with puzzled effort to fix his identity. When she finally did so, he observed with satisfaction that she betrayed neither surprise nor embarassment, but turned away and gave her attention composedly to the sermon.

At the close of the exercises the audience slowly dissolved, streaming out into the shady walks of the Campus. Brainard joined his sister, who was waiting for him while chatting with Eleanor, whom he shook hands with, making some comment on the sermon. As their paths lay in the same direction, they moved onward together. Bannister was waiting at a little distance along the path, as Brainard suspected he would be, and he stepped forward briskly and nonchalantly extended his hand.

"How do you do, Miss Crofton?" he said, effusively, entirely ignoring the brother and sister, who immediately made way for him.

"I dare say you are surprised to see me?"

Eleanor smiled mechanically and made a conventional reply.

"I need not ask after your health; you look radiant! And, your mother—how is she?"

She replied briefly and coldly, making it evident that she was not especially pleased with his inquiries or his company.

Turning from her Bannister nodded carelessly to Miss Abigail and Brainard, the first direct notice he had taken of them. There had been little friendship between the two men, their dislike dating back to boyhood, when Bannister meaningly taunting Brainard with his poverty, learned that he was the stronger of the two.

They moved homeward, Bannister keeping the place beside Eleanor—the brother and sister falling back—with an assurance that barely escaped impertinence.

A life of intermittent dissipation and idleness had told on him; his face was flushed and heavy; he had grown stout and had acquired something of the swagger and vulgarity of the hack politician. Since leaving college he had tried a dozen occupations, for none of which his superficial acquirements fitted him; brilliant and ready, he had little depth of resolution. With his easy indifference, his happy-go-lucky methods, he possessed a streak of blunt, inconsistent frankness that was a serious disadvantage to a man whose success depended upon his power to please the majority. In time he degenerated into a professional office-seeker, accepting at last a small clerkship at Washington. Then followed his marriage. His associates—the worthier among them—held him in a sort of good-natured contempt, and spoke of him as a man "who was wasting his life."

Brainard had learned that Bannister now seriously hoped to secure the nomination for the Senate should his party be successful in the coming autumn elections. And he could not but reflect that while he was most unsuitable, he was little less fitted for the high office than the majority of those chosen. For with many thoughtful men Brainard frequently contrasted that body today with what it once had been, and was forced to acknowledge its sad deterioration. The plutocrat shrank small in the shoes of the patriot.

Brainard and Miss Abigail purposely delayed to let Bannister and Eleanor pass beyond hearing. He perceived the effort the man was making to regain Eleanor's favor. Bannister's face was turned toward her with a sort of eagerness; he was plainly happy in her society, and was making the most of what he believed, no doubt, to be the opportunity to atone for his past shortcomings. Brainard, blinded by his fears, was more misguided than others of his none too discerning sex on like occasions; for he did not see that Eleanor tolerated Bannister but coldly, and was never less responsive. It was not gratifying to her that he thus openly showed his desire to return to his old allegiance. She could not dismiss him without marked rudeness, and he persisted in accompanying her home, and asked permission to call upon her mother, which she was forced to grant.

At the parting of their ways Brainard and Miss abigail turned into a side street, and the latter remarked wrathfully:

"It's a sin and a shame for that fellow to come back here after all he's done! The effrontry of it! to try and make up with Eleanor. Everybody thought that last scrape he was expelled for was only a way he took to break the engagement!"

"She bore it very well!" said Brainard, dryly.

"Yes, she held up her head—what girl wouldn't? But everyone could guess that she was deeply mortified—a proud, high-spirited, modest girl like her—to become the scandal of the town for such a fellow?"

Miss Abigail turned and cast an indignant look after the two walking away in the other direction.

"You are warm in your wrath, after so long a time," said Brainard, with a smile.

"I know a nice girl, if others don't. Her mother always sided with Bannister, too—and blamed Eleanor for everything!—even for not making it up. As if she could have done that!"

Miss Abigail's tone was quite tart and carried a fine sting of reproach that Brainard felt. To mollify her he said pacifically: "She was everything in that affair that a self-respecting girl could be, as you say."

"She is the last woman in the world to want to hold any man to such a compact if she suspected that he wanted to be released. I don't think she could have had much respect for him when they finally parted. It's lucky she found him out, I've aways said!"

"It's outrageous that he should return to persecute her and revive the old scandal, if she does not intend to marry him," observed Brainard musingly.

"And how could she prevent it, I'd like to know? He's one of those vain fools that like to be talked about, no matter what the talk is. He cares mighty little for her feelings in the matter—making her conspicuous in this way!"

"I think you wrong him. As far as I could judge he was happy to see her again; so much so that he was oblivious to all else!" Brainard replied with sly intention, for he saw that Miss Abigail's pride was hurt by her own cavalier treatment.

She ignored the thrust and said: "Well, if he comes back now with serious intentions she'll have a hard time of it. Her mother is dreadfully 'set,' for she is so fine and helpless; and now that they are poor and Bannister has money she'll make Eleanor marry him, if she can; and there are plenty of ways she'll work on her to do it!" She looked at him with stern disapproval as if he were in some sort to blame.

She had put Brainard's fears into words. He was very silent all through dinner and remained in the seclusion of his library all afternoon, where Miss Abigail supposed him to be absorbed in some knotty case that required profound uninterrupted study, and she did not break in upon him.

Substitution

I'm almost sure when Santa Claus
Was young, he kept a store
As papa does. Why? O because
I wrote the week before,
And asked him if he please would bring
To me a baby brother.
I wanted that p'tic'lar thing;
Not any, any other.

On Christmas morning there it was Beside my mamma's bed;
A little note signed "Santa Claus,"
Pinned on its blanket said:
"Dear Beth, of brothers I am out,
So bring—you can't resist her—
What you will find, I have no doubt,
Is just as good—a sister."

The Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Nativity*

One of the oldest churches in the world is the Church of the Nativity at Bethlehem. It was built first by the devotion of the early Christian community of Palestine, in the fourth century of the Christian era, upon the spot which tradition had already marked out as sacred. The building was set over the little grotto which was believed from the earliest days to be the place of our Lord's nativity. It is a tiny cave in the rock on which Bethlehem is situated. At a short distance there is the rock-cell in which St. Jerome spent thirty years of his life, and in which he translated the Scriptures into the Latin tongue. The church has been many times repaired, and to this task western Europe made extensive contributions, especially in earlier centuries.

The great event of which the Christian season is the annual reminder took place in the closing years of the reign of Herod the Great. This king, the most illustrious of the monarchs of that name, was an able administrator of affairs in his little kingdom of Palestine, but his jealosy, tyranny and cruelty made him a dreaded figure in his court and land. He had made Jerusalem a beautiful city by the erection of the temple, the third of the sacred buildings upon the same site, and by building other structures, castles, forts and walls, which enriched the capital. But the people feared and hated him, and his death was a moment of rejoicing for the whole nation.

The Date of the Nativity.

As the golden milestone in the Roman forum was the point from which the great roadways stretched east and west, so the birthday of Jesus is the golden milestone of history from which the centuries are measured in either direction. To be sure, the world was quite unconscious of so momentous an event in the days in which it occurred. It was not until centuries afterward that Christendom conceived the idea of dating the new era from the birthday of the Lord. By that time it was difficult to fix the date with accuracy. Dionysius the Little in the fifth century prepared a calendar embodying the best knowledge of the age. And the date fixed at that time, the year 753 of the Roman era, has been accepted by the western world as the date from which the modern historical era is to be reckoned. This date was actually some four or five years later than the real time of Jesus' birth. But when the error was discovered, the records of Europe had become so fixed that it would have wrought great confusion to attempt any change, and so we have gone on to this day dating our records from a point not quite exact, but still commemorating in a general way the greatest event in the annals of the world.

Royal Hopes of Judah.

It was an event not unexpected. The Jewish people had looked forward for centuries to a new epoch in their history. During their successive subjections to Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Greek and Roman rulers they had always dreamed of liberty. That liberty they had found for a brief and brilliant period under the Maccabees, but it could not last. For Judas the Hammer found it necessary to appeal to the growing power of Rome to save his little state from the plundering Syrians, and Rome thus became the protector and presently the possessor of Palestine itself. This made the Jewish people subjects of another great world power, and the exactions under which they groaned made them ever eager for that liberty which the prophets had dreamed of and which had been described in the golden visions of Messianic forecast. Writers of Apocolypse, a peculiar form of imaginative and predictive writing that began to make its appearance some two centuries before, had awakened glowing hopes in the hearts of the people regarding a new era of liberty and power, and the rise of a king of the dynasty of David who could restore the glory of ancient Israel, and become a world ruler and deliverer of his people. This was the form which the Messianic hope largely took in the days immediately preceding the advent of Jesus. The Jewish people in their dispersion by exile, war and commercial migration throughout the empire had carried these hopes with them. Expectations grew ever more eager and confident. They believed the time was at hand for the coming of their Messianic king.

The Magi from the East.

Such hopes must have impressed the people in whose countries they lived. At least some fragments of Messianic prophecy seem to have come into the hands of a group of eastern sages whose interest was thereby awakened in the progress of events taking place in the West. Students of the stars as they were, and believers in the influence of the heavens upon human life, they had marked the coming of a star more brilliant than the rest, which seemed to them the sign of the King about to be born on the coasts of the Mediterranean. In the fragment that has reached us through the First Gospel in regard to the birth of Jesus, we have the story of the wise men who came to Jerusalem seeking the new born child, and declaring that they had seen his star and were concerned to pay him their homage.

Bethlehem-Ephrathah.

When these magi arrived in Jerusalem and made inquiries regarding the birth of the new King, intense interest was aroused in their story, and most of all in the heart of Herod the king, to whom any rumor of a rival was sure to bring disquiet. He summoned the leaders of the Jewish people and asked them what their beliefs and traditions had to say regarding the birth of their Messiah, of whom he knew they were constantly in expectation. They told him without hesitation that the birthplace of the expected One was Bethlehem. That was the home town of David's family, and since the coming King was to be of the Davidic house, Bethlehem was of course his birthplace. Even so the prophet Micah had affirmed in his graphic words, "But thou, Bethlehem-Ephrathah, though thou be too little to be numbered among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall come he who is to be the ruler of my people, whose goings forth in promise and in hope have been from old, even from the beginning." (Micah 5:2.)

What Kind of a King?

Accordingly it was to Bethlehem that the king dispatched the sages, telling them to make careful search for the child and to bring him word again when they found him. His alleged desire to come and render his homage to the expected king need not have deceived any one. No danger to an aged and unpopular king could be greater than the advent of another claimant to the throne, and Herod's methods were well understood by his people. But of all this his eastern guests were unconscious. On the part of the Jews there was no organized preparation for the coming of the new Prince for such would have brought instant reprisal from Herod, and moreover no one dreamed that the future King would be born in obscurity and poverty. Every one was looking for some display of divine power or some manifestation of military strength in connection with the rise of the new age. They could not conceive of the Messiah as born from an unknown family and in such obscurity as marked the advent of our Lord. They were thinking of political and not of religious changes. They were not particularly anxious for a Messiah who was merely a mild and gracious teacher. They wanted a king who could assemble armies, make war upon their enemies, expel the hated Herods, throw off the oppression of Rome, and found a permanent dynasty of wise, beneficent and efficient rulers. It is not strange that with these hopes in their hearts they had no appreciation of an event so obscure as the birth of Jesus.

To Bethlehem.

Meantime the travelers made their way over the six miles that lie between Jerusalem and Bethlehem. Some time had passed, apparently, since the birth of Jesus. That event which, according to tradition, took place in the rock grotto underneath the khan or lodging place for travelers, had been followed by other events of which the First Gospel makes no mention, the flight into Egypt, the residence in that distant country until the end of Herod's life, and the return to Palestine. The fragmentary character of the stories of the nativity in Matthew and Luke leaves many matters in doubt and puzzles us in the attempt to construct an ordered narrative of these days. But it is not necessary that we should have a complete account. It is enough for us to know that the loving memory of the early church gathered about the events of Jesus' birth and set them forth in such terms as seemed to them most reverent and impressive. The great fact that lies beyond the borderland of all conjecture is that Jesus "was born of the seed of David according to the flesh," and that he entered fully into the experiences of his fellowmen in his gracious attempt to interpret to them the life of God.

The Little Child.

The wise men found the little family in the home at Bethlehem, and there in the presence of the child whom they had sought in the long journey across mountains and deserts, they brought out the gifts which they carried all the way to lay at his feet as the tribute of their grateful hearts. Though he was not of their race, yet they hailed his coming as the realization of their hopes in some way which perhaps it would have been difficult for them to describe. But those offerings which they brought were only the first of the vast treasury of gifts which the nations have been evermore bringing to him; not because he has need of the offerings of gold and silver, of frankincense and myrrh, but because, in the recognition of his perfect manhood and of his divine mission as the interpreter of God, humanity reaches its surest knowledge of the divine and its most complete awareness as to the means by which man's life may be made one with God. The first Christmas centuries ago brought to the world the fairest and most precious bestowal of God—the gift of a Little Child. So may the new Christmas bring to all of us such cleansing of soul, such deepening of faith and such quickening of love as shall renew within us—the Heart of a Little Child.

Why Johnny Failed

Johnny had a little mind
  It was his very own,
And nothing could be put in it
  Except by him alone.
It wasn't very big, its true,
  But there was room inside
For lots of fine things, chosen out
  As Johnny should decide.

Mother and father gave to him
  All sorts of good advice,
But Johnny never put it in
  Or thought about it twice.
But all the ugly things the boys
  Upon the corners said,
Why, Johnny picked them up at once
  And put them in his head.

At school the teacher tried her best
  To give him facts and rules
Of every useful sort—but, no!
  For Johnny hated schools.
He picked up brag, and vulgar slang,
  Dime novels, too, ten deep,
And filled his mind till it was like
  A tainted rubbish heap.

So when the day of manhood came,
  When Johnny searched his mind
For skill and power, it played him false,
  And nothing could he find
But worthless trash and ugly thoughts,
  And so he failed, alas!
Is any other boy who reads
  Coming to Johnny's pass?

A Little Christmas Heroine

By Fred Myro nColby.

It was during the days when the patriots were losing ground in the Carolinas in the Revolutionary War; the British held possession of Charleston and Tarleton's troopers were riding over the country terrorizing everybody. Only a few brave men like Marion and Sumpter held out, and they were in hiding, waiting patiently for a chance to strike a blow at the hated British.

In the late fall of the year Captain John Eager, an officer of Marion's legion, obtained a leave of absence and went to his home on the Santee for a few days' rest. From the best information it was believed that Tarleton was in another part of the colony, and as the Christmas season was approaching it was not expected the British would be dangerously active for some time to come. It was then with no little feeling of security that Captain Eager settled down with his family in the comfortable mansion which he had built before his marriage, and where his wife and two children made the time pass very pleasantly for the patriot.

The eldest of Captain Eager's children was a girl—Mary Eager, though everybody called her Polly—a little maid of twelve, and as fiery and true-hearted a patriot as there was in the colonies. She and her father were great cronies, and Polly liked nothing better than to sit and work on a sampler and listen to her father as he told of the forays of Marion's men and of the life of the "Swamp Fox" among the fens and forests of the Carolinas.

And thus were they engaged one day—the Christmas of 1781, the captain smoking his pipe on the porch while he was recounting one of Marion's exploits, and Polly sitting at his feet, stitching her sampler, when they were interrupted by the sound of pounding hoofs coming up the road. Presently the rider appeared, a lank, sandy-haired and complexioned young fellow, riding a wild, Shetlandish looking pony, and going like the wind.

"Tarleton is coming! Tarleton is coming! Flee for your lives! he shouted, and the rider dashed on to carry the dread tidings of the ruthless raider's coming to other neighborhoods.

"Oh, father, what will you do!" cried Polly, as the captain rose to his feet and glanced hastily around.

"I don't know, child. I must hide somewhere, I suppose, but I don't know where."

Mrs. Eager came to the door, her face pale with suppressed emotion. "John, you must fly," she said, "or that terrible Tarleton will hang you. And our Christmas dinner is almost ready, and we could have been so happy, oh, it is too bad."

"The dinner will keep, mother," replied Captain Eager, bravely, "and I don't believe the rope is braided yet to hang me. I may conclude to stay.—"

Just then Polly uttered a cry of dismay. "Oh, father, they are coming!" and she pointed to a cloud of dust not more than half a mile distant.

"It's no use for me to try to escape by flight," said the captain. "Tarleton's troopers would soon overtake me, but there must be some hiding place in the house. Any way we must risk it."

"Papa, may I speak a word," cried Polly, as the captain turned to go inside the house. "Tarleton's men will search for you in every likely hiding place from cellar to attic, but they might not look for you here right under their very noses."

"What do you mean, child?" asked her father.

"I mean, why not hide in one of these barrels on the piazza? They will never think of you taking refuge in one of these," and Polly pointed to two large barrels or tierces which had been brought out of the cellar a few days before and were standing empty on the very piazza on which they were talking.

"It's the very thing, child," declared the captain, "and I will get down into one of them as you say. It's my last chance."

It took but a moment for the captain to bestow his somewhat bulky form inside one of the empty casks where he crouched quite comfortably. His daughter hurriedly piled some clothing over him, and a few sticks of wood were thrown carelessly upon the top.

Polly was in mortal terror for fear the Britons might ride up before the concealment was effected, but she had everything completed, and was seated carelessly engaged upon her sampler, almost within hand's reach of where her father was concealed, as the British troops turned a corner and dashed up to the house.

"Is that rebel hound, Captain Eager, inside?" inquired the leader of the dragoons peremptorily, halting his troop just in front of where the little girl sat so quietly stitching.

He was a slender, middle-sized person, but muscular and active as was evident by the way he sat in the saddle. His face was thin and pale, and would have been girlish but for the earnest fiery eyes and the firm, determined mouth.

Polly knew very well that this was the famous legionary, Bannester Tarleton, the fiercest and most unscrupulous of all the British commanders in the South, but her voice did not tremble, and she looked the formidable partisan bravely in the face as she answered:

"My father is not in the house."

Then ensued a dialogue in which Polly showed considerable strategy in evading the literal truth and in not committing herself to falsehood. She could not betray her father, and yet Polly felt it would be wrong to tell an untruth.

"If the captain is not at home, where is he then?" questioned Tarleton.

"I cannot tell."

"You mean you will not tell," said Tarleton, rattling his saber in its sheath. "But did your father go up or down?"

"I think he went down," replied Polly, satisfying her conscience with the mental qualification that he could not have gone up.

"'Tis as I feared," said the British leader. "We have been anticipated, and the bird has flown. But we may yet overtake the rebel. So on, men, on."

And the haughty Tarleton put spurs to his horse and galloped out of the dooryard followed by all his troop, their sabers rattling and clattering as they disappeared.

After the British had been gone sufficiently long, Captain Eager was helped out of his hiding place, and the family sat down to their Christmas dinner, which though a little belated was none the less enjoyable. They had hardly finished their repast when there was another clattering of sabers and smashing of hoof in the door yard, and a voice called for Captain Eager.

"It's Marion himself," said the captain, as a small, wiry man dismounted and walked up to the door.

"Yes, it's the Swamp Fox," admitted the new comer. "We are after Tarleton and his men, and we thought you would like to help us."

And while the captain was having his horse saddled, Mrs. Eager and Polly brought out the rest of the Christmas cheer for the hungry patriots to eat in their saddles.

"General," said Captain Eager, "if it hadn't been for Polly there, I shouldn't be here ready to ride with you. I should be yonder handing on one of those trees," and he related briefly how his little girl had probably saved his life by her thoughtfulness and bravery.

"Polly, you are a heroine, a brave little Christmas heroine, "declared the famous leader, stooping to kiss the brown little face. "If America is ever free she will owe it to our women."

Today in a South Carolina mansion there is preserved the sampler which Polly worked on the day she turned the tables on the redoubtable Tarleton and kissed the Swamp Fox, and it is an heirloom prized indeed as a memento of the patriotism and heroism of a little girl who lived and acted well her part in the times that tried men's souls.

At the various services of the day over $1,000 was raised in casn and pledges. This is one of the older churches, being organized in 1829.

Vermont Avenue Bible-school, Washington, D. C., broke all records December 5, with 530 present and an offering of $300 for home missions, becoming a "living link." They also dedicated their new Sunday-school house which gives them a fine equipment for future work. The growth will continue. Nothing else will satisfy the enthusiastic superintendent, E. O. Gongwer, and his corps of efficient assistants.

The Men's Berean Bible Class had entire charge of the evening service in the Nelsonville, Ohio, church Sunday evening, December 5. The members of the class unassisted gave the whole program. There were over 300 men present. At their morning session they had 345. The whole Sunday-school had 740 the same day, which was the highest it has ever reached. There were 381 men present of that number. R. A. Doan teaches the class. Scott Cook is pastor.

S. H. Zendt, who has been pastor of the church at Oskaloosa, Iowa, for five years, closed his work there the 21st day of November. In the evening the churches of the city united in a meeting in which Mr. Zendt was asked to preach. The following Friday evening the members of the Christian church gave him and his wife a farewell reception, presenting them with an oak dining room set.

J. R. Perkins, pastor of the West Side Church, San Francisco, addressed the Berean Society of the Presbyterian church, recently on the subject, "The Decline of Institutionalism." He has established a new department in the Pacific Christian, which he calls "Modern Events Religiously Vo he calls "Modern Events Religiously Considered." Mr. Perkins is a pleasing writer, and his department will be followed with interest.

Roswell, New Mexico, had the Sunday-school rally of its history Sunday, November 21. The Christian church had planned and labored for increased interest in the work of the Sunday-school. There were over 400 present. The Century class numbered 125 and other classes in proportion. This is the greatest rally of the territory and probably the largest Sunday-school in the state. George Fowler is the pastor and J. E. Carper the superintendent.

The receipts of the F. C. M. S. for the month of November amounted to $4,159.99, a gain of $409.48 over the corresponding month, 1908. The gain for the first two months of the current missionary year amounted to $3,672.74. The churches as churches made a gain of $2,913.58. There was a gain during the first two months in the receipts from every source except Endeavor societies and bequests. We hope to continue these gains montn by month to the close of the year.

The following in "Upward," the weekly paper of the Buffalo Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., is a novel way of suggesting a duty of church members. B. S. Ferrall is the minister.

A Dream.—The Upward editor dreamed the other night that the entire membership had decided to attend church. The auditorium, men's room and galleries were filled and still the worshippers were coming in great numbers. Do you wonder he awoke in the midst of the excitement such an experience as that would naturally occasion? When it is reflected that the morning audiences for the last two Sundays were the largest of the present pastorate the possibility of such a dream coming true does not seem at all unreasonable.

An advance step has been taken by the Ladies' Aid Society of the Christian Church, Kearney, Neb. They formerly held a bazaar about Thanksgiving time, using the proceeds to prosecute whatever work they might have undertaken for the church. For the last two years they have dispensed with the bazaar and each one made a free will thank-offering instead. The plan has worked well. The offering this year was $120. The plan has been so successful that the ladies have decided to make the thank-offering a permanent feature of their work.

On Thanksgiving day evening, Professor D. C. Kellems of the Bible University of Eugene, Ore., began a meeting with the church at Heppner, Ore. This congregation has had a remarkable year. The present pastor began his work the first day of February, 1909. Since then the church has raised its apportionment on every missionary offering of the calendar, for the first time in the history of the church, and paid one hundred and twenty dollars on the steamship Oregon. The Sunday-school has an enrollment of over three hundred, which is a little more than three times the number of members of the congregation. They have built on five more Sunday-school rooms in addition to the four splendid rooms they had and added a basement fourteen by seventy feet which will be used for a kitchen and banquet hall. The church stands foremost in the minds of the people of the city as the aggressive and most active force for righteousness in the community. J. Perry Conder is the minister.

E. J. Nickerson, Rutland, Ill., has been given a call to the church at Laurens, Ill.

The annual meeting of the First Church, South Bend, Ind., was held Tuesday, December 7.

R. E. L. Prunty has resigned at Chicago Heights and will go back to Missouri. The church has not yet secured a successor.

The meeting which W. F. Richardson, First Church, Kansas City, Mo., recently held was with L. J. Marshall and the church at Independence, Mo.

The new church at Fort Dodge, Iowa, is nearing completion. L. P. Kopp the pastor is looking closely after every detail of the work as it progresses.

Levi Marshall, assisted by the Ladies' Aid Society of his church at Hannibal, Mo., gave a reception to all the members of the church December 2. The principal address was made by Clyde Darsie, pastor at Quincey, Ill.

Austin Hunter held a short meeting with home forces at the Jackson boulevard church recently. While the audiences were not large, there were a number of additions and the church was much strengthened.

The new church at Latham, Ill., is in proces of erection. The minister, Clifford Weaver, is now in a revival in the old building. The Fifth District convention is to be held here next June.

Aboys' class taught by W. D. Caursant in the church at Anderson, Ind., has just opened their new hall and gymnasium, and now have frequent meetings, games, gymnasium classes, etc. The work of the class is highly commended by the local press.

Do not overlook the advertisement on page four of this issue and last week's also. If you neglected to read that page last week, get your paper out and read carefully the announcement of the Bethany Graded Lesson Series.

E. N. Philips has resigned his pastorate at Oxnard, Cal., to accept a call to the First Church, Phœnix, Ariz., where he begins work January 1. Mr. Philips has done good work in Oxnard and is held in highest esteem by the entire community.

I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, Ohio, is in a good meeting with E. J. Willis at Kirksville, Mo. Twenty-four have been added to date; twelve during the past week. His splendid preaching and exhortations have given much strength to the membership. Meeting continues.

The Sunday-school of the church at Niles, Ohio, has grown to such proportions that it has become impossible to provide adequate room for it. The pastor, A. T. Gordon, and the official board of the church are facing the question of an enlargement of the building.

"Billy" Sunday meeting is in full blast at Joplin, Mo. Six thousand were turned away from the tabernacle Sunday night, November 29. The city and churches stirred as never before. F. F. Walters writes: "All the vile things imaginable are being said of evangelist, ministers and churches. I look for hundred converts in near future."

The American Christian Missionary Society has just received on the Annuity Plan a gift of $10,000 from "A Friend." This is the second gift on this plan since the books closed September 30. This large gift comes from one whose family had already made generous gifts to the American Society. The gift assures him an income of $300 every six months as long as he lives.

The second year of Edward B. Bagby's ministry at Fort Smith, Ark., begins with promise. About $200 has been raised during the quarter for missions and there have been nine additions. The sisters were charmed with the address of Mrs. Alice M. Wickizer of Tulsa, Okla., on C. W. B. M. Day. The Brooks Evangelistic Company will hold a meeting with the congregation in January.

Walter L. Martin and wife are in a meeting at Hamilton, Mo. They report a fine interest and nineteen additions the first three weeks. At the urgent request of the church Mr. and Mrs. Martin postponed a trip to California they had planned. They will now spend a few months in evangelistic work in the central states before returning to the coast. They invite correspondence from churches wishing meetings.

F. M. Green of Akron, Ohio, whose retirement from active work we chronicled in these columns recently, writes a helpful note to us which he concludes with the information that he has been ill and confined to his home for over a month. His strength, he says, forbids extended writing. This splendid veteran will be tenderly remembered in these days by the great multitude in whose lives his ministry of many years has been an inspiration.

The church at Nevada, Mo., has just closed a fine meeting with 133 additions. O. E. Hamilton and Arthur Haley assisted. W. W. Burks has been minister here four years and three months and has in that time received over 400 into the church. This is the largest church of the Disciples between St. Louis and Dallas, with one possible exception. Mr. Burk was recently called to the First Church, Paducah, Ky., but duty seemed to demand that he remain in Nevada.

The First Church, Topeka, Kans., called to its assistance in a meeting just closed, Lowell and Perry McPherson. There were eighty-three accessions to the congregation; thirty of these being men. The pastor, C. A. Finch, says: "Mr. Lowell McPherson's work was remarkable for its grip on men hitherto indifferent to the church, and he follows up his work in the pulpit by personal visitation." Mr. Finch also commends with equal heartiness the work of the singer, Perry McPherson. These brothers will assist in a meeting at Parsons, Kans., in January.

According to a Methodist newspaper Des Moines, Iowa, came near being the scene of a good old-fashioned debate on the baptism question, between Dr. Clark Braden (Disciple) and Rev. J. F. Black (Methodist). According to our contemporary the combat was called off by Dr. Braden who assigned as his reason that he failed to secure an auditorium in a city where the Disciples have more and greater auditoriums than any other denomination. We are surely living in a new era of religious thought if none of these buildings would be put at the disposal of one of our erstwhile most conspicuous defenders of the faith.

Soon after the first of January we shall publish abbreviated reports from as many of the annual reports of churches as we can get. Let each one of the preachers who read The Christian Century, send immediately after his annual meeting such a summary. Let the report made to us include the following points: (1) Net increase in the membership of the church and the Sunday-school. (2) The amount of money raised for local expenses and given for missions. (3) Whether evangelistic meetings were held during the year or not. (4) Any new plans of work adopted by the church, and their success. (5) The present spiritual condition of the church. This will make the pages of news that are worth while—the kind The Christian Century wishes to publish. Don't forget to send the report early, and to make it brief.

The Tri-Annual Convention of Auxiliaries to the C. W. B. M. of Greater New York and vicinity was held at Sterling Place Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., Tuesday afternoon and evening, November 30. The addresses of the afternoon were delivered by representatives of the various churches of the city and Mrs. Laura Gerould Craig, state president and field missionary. At the evening session G. W. Coffman was introduced and gave a short talk on the condition of the womanhood of India under the present caste system and his appeal for the twenty-five million widows of India stirred the hearts of all present. Mr. Coffman sails from New York today for Naples, Italy and from there to India, where he will begin work near Bombay. The prayers of this people will follow Brother Coffman as he shall carry the light into the darkness of India.

Among the many things to happen at the Pittsburg convention was the organization of the church singers of the brotherhood in an association whose purpose is declared to be the encouragement of higher proficiency in musical art and greater efficiency in soul-winning. The association is to be called "The National Association of Church Musicians," with headquarters at 416 Majestic Building, Indianapolis. Mr. W. E. M. Hackleman is the president and Miss Lucile May Park, Shelbyville, Ill., is secretary. Churches and evangelists wishing the aid of musicians in religious work will do well to correspond with the Indianapolis address. Here is an instrument, we take occasion to say, for the correcting of an evil which debases the present day church quite as much, perhaps, as does any other of the pernicious features of modern revivalism. Our church music needs elevating. Musicians are the ones to do it, and we believe the leaders in this organization will take a hearty interest not alone in promoting the welfare of its members, but in lifting the ideals of their art among the churches.

HABIT'S CHAIN

Certain Habits Unconsciously Formed and Hard to Break.

An ingenious philosopher estimates that the amount of will power necessary to break a life-long habit would, if it could be transformed, lift a weight of many tons.

It sometimes requires a higher degree of heroism to break the chains of a pernicious habit than to lead a forlorn hope in a bloody battle. A lady writes from an Indiana town:

"From my earliest childhood I was a lover of coffee. Before I was out of my teens I was a miserable dyspeptic, suffering terribly at times with my stomach.

"I was convinced that it was coffee that was causing the trouble and yet I could not deny myself a cup for breakfast. At the age of 36 I was in very poor health, indeed. My sister told me I was in danger of becoming a coffee drunkard.

"But I never could give up drinking coffee for breakfast although it kept me constantly ill, until I tried Postum. I learned to make it properly according to directions, and now we can hardly do without Postum for breakfast, and care nothing at all for coffee.

"I am no longer troubled with dyspepsia, do not have spells of suffering with my stomach that used to trouble me so when I drank coffee."

Look in pkgs. for the little book, "The Road to Wellville." "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The church at Muir, Mich., is in need of a pastor.

F. P. Arthur will hold a meeting at St. Louis, Mich., in Janury.

E. L. Mitchell has just closed a two weeks meeting at New Holland, Ohio, where the work is prospering.

A new church was dedicated at Fowler, Kans., Sunday, Dec. 12. Geo. E. Lyon preached the dedicatory sermon. H. W. Nicholson is the pastor.

G. Webster Moore is doing an excellent work at Ionia, Mich. E. B. Barnes will hold a meeting there in January.

Prof. Errett Gates, of Chicago, is supplying the pulpit of the church at LaPorte, Ind., until their new pastor shall arrive, which will be soon after the beginning of the year.

Aaron P. Aten has been called to the pastorate of the Capital Hill Church, Oklahoma City, where the outlook is most encouraging.

The church at Emporia, Kansas has called O. L. Smith of El Reno, Okla., as pastor and he will begin work there the first of January.

Charles Bloom has decided to give his entire time to evangelistic work, and will have his family reside at Elmira, N. Y., Mr. Bloom's old home.

The Lyon St. Church at Grand Rapids, Mich., gave $200 to state missions in November. This church supports Dr. Jennie Crozier in India. There are additions at almost every service.

Terre Hautte, Ind., where S. D. Dutcher is pastor is to have a new building. The work has already begun. When complete the building will, it is said, be the best house of worship in the city. Mr. Dutcher is speaking to large audiences every Sunday.

W. J. Lhamon, has received an unusual commendation of his work in a meeting at Elmwood, Neb. At the close of the meeting the park board of the city unanimously elected him platform manager and Bible lecturer for the Chatauqua to be held there next summer.

Homer E. Sala is doing an excellent work with the Fifth Ave. Church at Grand Rapids. Since his coming last June many have been added, the debt reduced, and men's class organized. He recently preached a sermon on temperance which was quoted at length in the daily press.

H. E. VanHorn, Pastor of the Capitol Hill Church, Des Moines has been called to the church at Mason City, Iowa. We have not heard whether he will accept. Mr. Van Horn has done a splendid work in Des Moines, and the interests of the churches of Des Moines demand that he remain in the Capitol City.

E. B. Barnes of Grand Rapids, Mich., is preaching a series of sermons on "Pulpit Problems." Here are the subects: "The Man in the Pulpit," "The Message of the Pulpit." "The Opportunities of the Pulpit," "The Power of the Pulpit," "The Perils of the Pulpit," "The Problems of the Pulpit," "What the Pulpit Expects of the Pew."

Baxter Waters is to go to Missouri for his next pastorate, having accepted a call to the church at Lathrop, Mo., thirty miles north of Kansas City, where there is a congregation of 325 members, and a good church building. Mr. Waters is one of our best trained men, an will become an influential factor in the life of the community to which he ministers. He is to begin work at once.

C. W. F. Daniels, formerly of Santa Cruz, is preaching for the church at Stockton, Cal. The church is in fine working order and all departments are doing well. There are 270 pupils enrolled in the Sunday-school, with from 200 to 225 in attendance each Sunday. A reception was recently given which was largely attended both by friends of the church and ministers of other churches.

Frank Maples who three months ago went to the pastorate of the church at Billings, Mont., is greatly pleased with the outlook. There are about 200 members of the church, with a rather heavy indebtedness, and a small and unattractive building; but the church is standing by its preacher, and are willing to put their best into the enterprise. In the three months since Mr. Maples became pastor, the audiences have doubled, and there has been a marked increase in the attendance of the Sunday-school.

J. B. Cleaver has resigned the pastorate of the Central Church, San Antonia, Texas, in order that he may remove to a more northly climate. He will close his work in San Antonia, in ninety days. Mr. Cleaver's work at the Central Church has been very successful. The Sunday-school attendance has been remarkable, three other congregations have been organized through the efforts of this church, and a new pipe organ has just been installed.

C. S. Sinclair, pastor of the Stuart St. Church, Springfield, Ill., has resigned to accept a call to the Second Church of Wichita, Kan. This step is regretted nowhere more than in the editorial office of the Christian Century, where Mr. Sinclair's good work in Springfield has been watched with constant satisfaction. It may be recalled by some readers that the Stuart St. Church was organized by C. C. Morrison as the fruitage of a tent meeting held in the summer of 1905. Under the auspices of the First Church of which he then was pastor. A beautiful house was erected for the young organization and dedicated by Mr. Morrison. A pastor, Rufus A. Fiznell, was called and did excellent work for a year when he resigned to enter Eureka College. Then Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair came. The work has prospered in every sense and in every department. Numbers were added to the membership until it now reaches 500 names. Congregations increased steadily. The Sunday school became a problem, as it outgrew the commodious house. The young peoples' work developed with fine spirit. The church exercised the function of a community center with a varied social life. Mr. Sinclair was [illegible] by a brother pastor as a real bishop of the community. And in countless deft ways Mrs. Sinclair made her own unique contribution to the church life. The writer knows that pastor and wife were greatly beloved by the congregation. We are strongly moved to find fault with this removal. It seems to us an instance illustrating an almost scandalous condition among the churches—the insecurity and shallowness of the pastoral relation. It is not customary for a national paper to meddle in local affairs, but we are convinced that there is no piece of business so much needing to be done among the churches as to equip men capable of long pastorates and to educate both ministers and churches to expect long pastorates. No plea of a large field can explain Mr. Sinclair's removal. There is no larger field. Not Wichita, nor Tonowandâa, N. Y. (which wanted Mr. Sinclair), nor Chicago, nor any other place offers a preacher a bigger chance to work for the kingdom of God than does the community environing the Stuart St. Church. Why should a preacher whose work is so manifestly blessed of God move to any other field?

The Training for the City Ministry

By Orvis F. Jordan

It is not without interest to young men about to enter the ministry to have the opinions of men who have been in the service of the church for some years concerning the things that are profitable in the education of the ministry would be great gain. There creasingly that we are not giving any attention to the preparation of young men for city work and therefore venture to make some suggestions as to what we would do had we the opportunity to train again for the work we are now called upon to do.

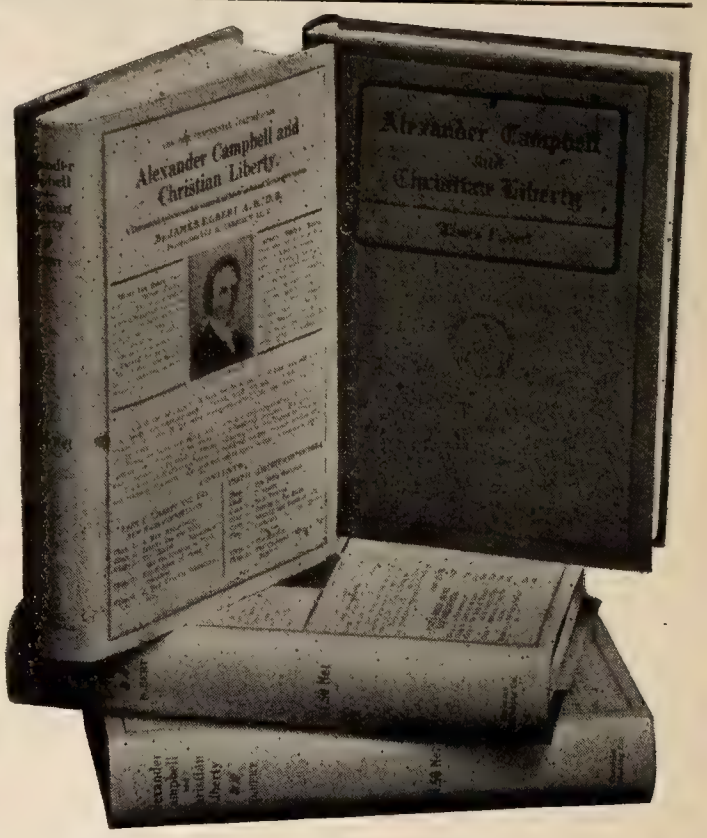
First of all, we should take our seminary work in the city. The foreign missionary cannot get close to his problem in the begining but the missionary to the city can. To live in the city and get its atmosphere before being compelled to take up the work of the ministry kould be great gain. There is a social atmosphere that is peculiar to the city and whosoever would make young men believe that they can cure souls with patent medicine that is devised for all complaints is a false guide. We must live in the city, and diagnose its social evils before we can work intelligently on a remedy.

If we were planning to work in an American city, we think we would choose Chicago for our student career. We are not unmindful that it would be hard to find a more thorough seminary than Union Seminary in New York City. We have deep respect for Yale, where so many of our fellow disciples have gone. Harvard has its points of advantage. We believe, however, in the German idea in education, to follow up the great teachers in the different schools. We have an American prejudice that makes us despise the man that changes schools often in his training. Perhaps this prejudice is just, so far as it affects college students, but the professional man has much to gain by getting outside the atmosphere of a single school. We would take our theological training in Chicago because there are more truly great theological schools here than in any other city in America and more theological students.

Chicago has at least six theological seminaries in different sections of the city. We have made personal investigation of four of them. These schools prepare men for the ministry of the Episcopalians, Lutherans, Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians and the Congregationalists. Besides these is the Disciples' Divinity House in connection with the Baptist school at the University of Chicago.

The largest of these schools is the Divinity school of the University of Chicago. This school does not have such elaborate buildings for its exclusive use as does the Chicago Theological Seminary of the Congregationalists. It has the advantage of proximity, however, to a university of first rank with buildings, equipment and teachers second to none in America. The strongest single feature is the equipment for the teaching of Semitics. During the life time of President Harper a museum collection was made which is continually added to, that makes the University of Chicago the American center of Old Testament study. In the department of New Testament there is Professor Burton, who, in addition to being one of the greatest American scholars in his department, takes interest in many other matters and has just returned from a trip to China in the interest of missions and education. Professor Mathews is the versatile genius of the divinity school, editing the magazine, The World To-Day, acting as Dean of the Divinity school, teaching at the head of the department of Systematic Theology and writing books and magazine articles continually. Our own Dr. Willett is the popular lecturer on biblical themes attracting the largest audiences of those who are interested in biblical exposition and who admire his matchless English style. We pause in the enumeration only for lack of space. No divinity school in Chicago has such uniformity of excellence as does that at the University of Chicago.

While we have never studied at the Chicago Theological Seminary, we have come into a genuine admiration of it. The curriculum was completely reorganized while Graham Taylor was acting president. It is the most practical seminary in Chicago. Thursday of each week is field day and it is compulsory for each student of the seminary to visit some public institution or some point of interest in Chicago with an instructor to explain its significance. We went through Dunning the other day with this merry group of "theologs." In the course of their three years training they will know more of the social machinery of a great city than most ministers know all their lives long. Prof. Taylor is especially popular among the Disciples and it is surprising that we have not more students working with him. We found only two Disciples in Chicago Theological Seminary. Prof. Beckwith in the department of systematic theology, and Prof. Harper in the department of Old Testament are also generally known. though they are somewhat eclipsed in the popular mind by their brilliant colleague.



Rev. Addison Clark, pastor of the Central Christian Church, of Mineral Wells, Texas pays a high tribute to "Alexander Campbell and Christian Liberty" by James Egbert, by ordering a second copy and saying:

"I have read five chapters since my return from the Centennial and am delighted with the book. It greatly increased my appreciation of your wonderful and masterful subject. everything A. Campbell wrote, and Notwithstanding I have read almost had uearned to have a very great administration for his masterful ability and high spirituality, this book of yours leads me into a new field of appreciation."

Every Disciple ought to read this illuminating book. Order a copy today. Cloth, 344 pp., $1.50. Postpaid.

Our First Annuitant

The first Annuity Bond issued by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society was in favor of Lazarus Ehman, dated November 27, 1897, and the amount he donated was $2,000. Altogether he has made nine gifts, aggregating $6,734.36, as follows:

November 27, 1897	$2,000.00
June 2, 1899	500.00
July 28, 1899	600.00
September 9, 1899	1,000.00
March 20, 1902	549.00
March 26, 1902	697.00
July 6, 1903	275.00
November 24, 1902	911.12
December 4, 1905	202.24
May 11, 1909	2,314.67
Total	$9,049.03

Brother Ehman shows his faith and cordial approval of the Annuity Plan by making ten different gifts, covering the period of November 27, 1897, to May 11, 1909. During the eleven years, or since the first gift was made he has received a check every six months, promptly on time. During the eleven years he has had no risk, no suspense, no expense, no doubt, no trouble, no taxes, no repairs. The money is yielding interest every day, and will continue to do so until the Lord calls him home. He rejoices to see his money do the Lord's work, while he yet enjoys an income from it.

To those who are fifty years of age, or older, the Annuity Plan is an ideal investment, to say nothing of the good the money does. Its advantages may be tabulated as follows:

1. A perfect security for your savings.
2. It is favored by the most conservative investors.
3. It is universally popular with those who have tried it. To this there is not a single exception.
4. It is free from speculation.
5. It is unaffected by hard times and market conditions.
6. Its advantages are available for those of large or small amounts.
7. There is never any cause for uncertainty or worry.

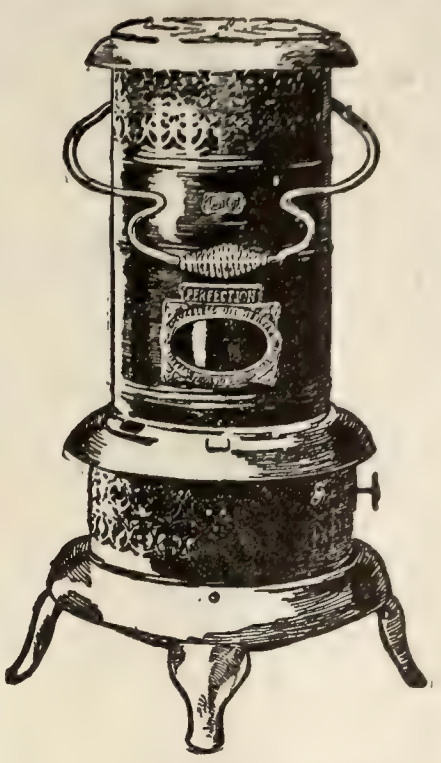
The Divinity School of the Methodists is the Garrett Biblical Institute in connection with the Northwestern University at Evanston. This is probably the best school for the education of ministers that is supported by that denomination. Prof. Terry is known for his work in the field of Systematic Theology. The school has been known most widely by the contributions in the field of religious education made by Prof. Coe. The Methodists are famed for turning out strong preachers. Their men are often called to leading pulpits of other denominations, especially among the Congregationalists. They have an abundance of evangelistic zeal and seem to imbibe church statesmanship with the very air they breathe. Probably scholarly ideals are not as high here as in most of the schools in Chicago but the finished product is more than able to cope with the men of the other seminaries when they meet in competition in every day life. We are not sure the strength of the finished man is other than the strength of a man who has retained from his youthful days a religious experience undisturbed by his scholarly processes. In some of our seminaries, strange as it may seem, the students pray less than they did at home.

We have reserved for the last, the McCormick Theological Seminary. It is the school of the Presbyterian church, located within easy reach of sociological clinic. All of the schools in Chicago take the modern viewpoint with regard to criticism and theology but in McCormick this takes the most moderate form of any of the four. Professor Zenos is probably considered a radical in his church, though in the other seminaries he would be held to be rather behind the van of progress. His scholarship and power are undoubted. Probably no school would make the student be as thorough in his books as would this solid old Presbyterian school. The finished product from this school is a man who knows literature and who can speak most ably for the theological view-point which was drilled into him. He is coming to be increasingly a man of deep social sympathies and of practical efficiency in the work of the church.

A student going to all these schools would receive the full-rounded education. At the University of Chicago he would learn to be fearless in the pursuit of truth, giving up the dearest prejudices for it. At the Chicago Theological Seminary, he would get knowledge of the institutions and the city conditions that make him aware of our most acute social problems in this day. At the Methodist school he would come to be a great pulpit man with a deep passion for the souls of men. In the Presbyterian school there would be added that sane conservatism that would prevent erratic and half-baked ideas from ever coming into the light of day. We hope one of these days some venturesome student shall reject our American educational traditions and try the German way of an itinerant student career.

So far, we have told how we think a preacher could be made who could preach to city men. Some men want to be more than preachers. They aspire to be ministers as well. Next week we shall undertake to tell how a man might be trained outside the schools for a city ministry.



SCOVILLE MEETINGS AT HASTINGS. NEBRASKA.

By R. A. Schell, Pastor.

The Scoville Evangelistic Company closed their meeting at the Hastings Christian Church, November 26. 307 responded to the invitation, and the town was stirred as it has never been before. This number was nearly twice as many as were added to the churches in union meetings which were conducted by Milford B. Lyon one year ago, in which the seven leading congregations of the city coöperated. But numbers cannot tell the result of these meetings and the benefit they have been to our cause here in this city. The standing of our congregation has been raised in the estimation of the people, and we are now accorded a place among the leading churches of the city. Our new church building is also assured as another result of the meeting. Nearly $14,000 were raised by Mr. Scoville on the next to the last evening of the meeting. All the expenses of the meeting were provided for, and the pledges to the regular expenses to the church were materially increased.

I take pleasure in bearing witness that I consider Scoville the prince of evangelists. I knew that he was a great man, but he proved to be greater than I had anticipated; a stronger preacher and a greater leader.

Little Things Annoy or Please Us

Little things annoy us—the little curl of smoke that, if left alone, would soon smudge the furnishings and make work for the house-wife.

There are no annoying little things in the They've been banished by hard thought and tireless work. In their stead there are little things that please—that make for comfort and satisfaction. The little self-locking

COLORADO LETTER.

B. B. Tyler.

We are more than pleased, we are delighted, to have H. O. Breeden with us. There is a veritable revival in the "Mother Church," mother of our churches in Denver, mother of our churches in Colorado. There have been from five to ten additions to the church each Lord's Day since Brother Breeden began his pastorate.

The Colorado State Mission Board met yesterday and elected Dr. Breeden chairman. The pastor of the Central Church is logically the leader of our forces in Denver and in all Colorado. Breeden is a born leader. His brethren served notice on him yesterday that he is expected to lead.

Already the "Mother Church" has decided to become a "living link" in the foreign mission work.

The State Board decided at its meeting yesterday, to employ three men in our State work instead of one, as heretofore. Leonard G. Thompson will continue to serve as corresponding secretary. Clark Bower will serve as Sunday-school evangelist. The hope is entertained that Charles William Dean, now pastor in Pueblo, will consent to do the work of a general evangelist in the state. Here is progress.

In 1898 I attended the Colorado State Convention. The Committee on Ways and Means reported a resolution recommending that the church attempt to raise $600 for State missions. This resolution was amended by striking out $600 and inserting $1,000. Leonard G.Thompson was elected evangelist and corresponding secretary. That year our churches contributed $1,200. This amount has been more than doubled in a single year. The mark set before the churches for the current year it $4,000.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions will send to the state this year $1,200. The American Christian Missionary Society aided the infant congregation at Durango last year to the amount of $400. The same amount will probably be given this year by this society to aid the work at Durango.

The number of congregations and self-supporting churches has more than kept pace with the increase in offerings. Thirty-five Bible Schools last year contributed more than $1,800 to mission work in the state.

Remember that we, in "the Centennial State," are laying the foundation of an empire in this Rocky Mountain region. Colorado has more than 100,000 square miles of territory within her boundary. Colorado can, and will, support a population of several millions.

Leonard G. Thompson, more than any other person, deserves credit for the progress made in our work during the last ten years. He is the best man in his place, corresponding secretary and state evangelist, that I have ever known.

Denver, December 3, 1909.

THE CENTRAL CHURCH, INDIANAPOLIS, MEETING.

Hugh McClellan, of Richmond, Ky., has just closed a meeting of nearly four weeks with the Central Church of Indianapolis, during which ninety persons came forward, thirty-five to make confession and the rest by letter and statement. The singing was led by W. E. M. Hackleman and a large chorus choir. The attendance throughout was large and the interest deep. I have never been through a meeting where the spirit was finer. The additions by no means indicate all the good that was done. Night after night Bro. McLellan preached strong gospel sermons, laying upon the consciences of the people in his own unique and interesting way the great obligations of the Gospel. The people were delighted with the sermons. Mr. McLellan depends upon his message and not upon any professional methods of appeal for results. He is even more deliberate in his invitation than in the body of the sermon. His sincerity in all he says is very evident.

The church planned greatly for the meeting and we are all very happy in the results. I believe that instead of having gleaned the field we shall continue to reap for months to come as the fruit of this sowing. Bro. Hackleman's leadership in song was a feature of the meetings. ALLAN B. PHILPUTT.

As We Go to Press

Carthage, Mo., Dec. 12.—Decision day, eighteen confessions, twenty otherwise; greatest day in the history of the church.—James A. Harbaugh, Supt. D. W. Moore, pastor.

Lincoln, Neb., Dec. 12.—Twenty-four accessions today, making 169 in four weeks. All hearts rejoicing. Continue few nights, when Yeuell will begin at Havelock, a suburb, for ten days' meeting. Storms have constantly interfered.—H. H. Harmon.

Wichita, Kas., Dec. 12.—Great day for Christian Women's Board of Missions; more than $300 raised. Continue Miss Boyd as our living link missionary at Bilaspur.—Walter Scott Priest.

Little Rock, Ark., Dec. 12.—The Scoville evangelistic company is here in the greatest religious upheavel Little Rock has ever seen. There have been forty-four additions today, 106 last wek, 225 in fourteen days. Now that I have heard Scoville, it is no wonder to me that "Billy" Sunday said "he is the greatest living evangelist of any single church in the world." He is a veritable cyclone of wonderful power, his sermons are masterpieces, every one forceful. He is dead in earnest and preaches as though every sermon would be his last. Mrs. Scoville, the sweetest singer I have evr heard, has captured this old Southern musical city with her wonderful solos. Mr. Minges works all the day and half the night, holds saloon meetings and has brought scores into the church. Mrs. Minges, Mr. Guthrie, and Miss Stevens all are first class workers. A large percent of the additions have been grown men. No one need ever doubt that Scoville does not preach a full gospel.—Arthur K. Brooks, Pastor Third Street Church.

Rupert, Idaho— Dec. 13: Splendid house of worship in Irrigation district dedicated yesterday; pledges freely made covering all indebtedness; thirty one additiaons to date; meeting continues with increasing interest. John L. Brant, great church dedicator and strong preacher; Mrs. Brandt and Sunbeam chorus splendid attractions. C. H. Althiede very best of song leader.—D. B. Titus.

Bethany College Endowment Campaign

The friends of Bethany everywhere will rejoice to know that the campaign to procure $125,000 of additional endowment promises to be successful. R. A. Long, of Kansas City, Mo., has offered to give the college $25,000 providing the friends of Bethany raise, before January 1, 1910, an additional $100,000. Towards this $100,000 Senator George T. Oliver, of Pennsylvania, an alumnus of the college, has subscribed $28,000, another friend in Pennsylvania has subscribed $20,000, and Hon M. H. Cochran, of Uniontown, Pa., has already paid about $12,000. Other subscriptions, ranging in amounts from $1.00 to $5,000 each, have been procured, until at this writing $93,000 of the $100,000 necessary to secure Brother Long's gift, is in hand. This remaining $7,000 must be subscribed not later than January 1. Many friends of the college have promised to aid in this Centennial campaign, who have not yet done so. Will not all who intend to help write at once to President Cramblet, Bethany, W. Va., either sending check or a promise to contribute, with the time when payment will be made? As a further inducement to the friends of the college to rally in this hour of ripest opportunity, a wealthy and well known friend of Bethany has promised to add a substantial gift to the endowment fund if the friends of the college meet this offer of Mr. Long's. In other words, success now means this additional gift beyond this $125,000. Let every friend of the college, in recognition of Bethany's great work in the past, her promising and enthusiastic present, and her certain future, lend a hand in this hour when every dollar counts so much.

Doings at Dixon and in Rock River Valley

Some good men are needed in this important but difficult field. Northern Illinois has never been noted for its snaps. We regret that W. D. Ward and the Rockford church have come to the parting of the ways. A good man,—a good church,—a church without a minister. This is a field for a good hard worker at a moderate salary. Freeport has a man. The first reports from the field seem to be complimentary. This is one of our State and District mission points, and is most important. D. F. Seyster, our veteran and faithful District Secretary, in building up and improving the old historic Pine Creek Church. He is also looking after our growing district mission at Savannah. Ira L. Parvin is hustling things at Sterling in his quiet but constructive way. Allen Wilson began a meeting with them November 28. The Rock Falls church across the river from Sterling is moving forward under its new leader. H. H. Jenner is leading New Bedford in the fields of true greatness. Rally Day in Sunday-school marked over four hundred. J. A. Barnett of Galesburg, is to lead them in a special meeting. R. L. Beshers of Walnut, the steady puller, is moving forward with his loyal people. Shearer and Rice recently closed a good meeting there. C. C. Carpenter, of Princeton keeps the attention of his historic little city. He does not grow weary in well doing. As for Dixon, it is still on the map, and has hopes of an approved future. Several moves have been made, looking toward a new building, but nothing definite had yet taken form. Our November evangelistic campaign under the leadership of Snively and Senneff, was called off for one year on account of the fact that it followed so closely on the great Lockhart, Lintt campaign of last January. It was thought best to conduct a Sunday-school campaign to recruit and organize the church for the campaign next year. With this in view, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. MacDonald, of McKees Rock, Pa., were secured for a two weeks' campaign. Their work was satisfactory in every way. They are workers, and their presence and plans will help any school. They do not play the galleries, or use brass band methods, but they work and suggest workable plans. The church recently showed an appreciation of their minister by giving a five year call, from January 1, 1910, and fixed the first year's salary at $1,200, the parsonage rent, and one month's vacation, which is equivalent to about $1,500, the advance being the parsonage rent over previous years. Elmer Rice, one of our honored young men, who is singing with Evangelist W. F. Shearer, is at home for the holidays. He has made good, and more than good. His services are being sought by many. We have another very promising worker who is destined to occupy an important place in this work in the near future. It is Miss Helen Puterbaugh. She is one of our most efficient teachers, and a soloist of unusual natural ability.

The Bethany Graded Lessons

For All Your Pupils Under 12 Years Old

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to reorganize the whole School at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching children the same lessons provided for grown-up people.

The best way to grade your school is to do it by "installments." Begin at the bottom now—in the elementary grades. Provide elementary teachers and pupils with the equipment offered in The Bethany Series and later on, when the International Committee puts forth a course for higher grades, you will be ready to carry the graded principle a step higher, and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for these higher grades. In this way the most beneficent improvement which could take place in your Sunday-school methods and aims will be accomplished easily.

God In A Manger

The Meaning of Christmas for the Life We Really Live

It must have been a startling disillusionment to those wise men of old who had been searching the heavens for God to find Him at last in a manger!

But this disillusionment is the most elementary experience of the soul that comes under the influence of Christ. And herein lies the real meaning of Christmas for our lives, a meaning which in the romance of the beautiful story, or the historical importance of the great event, or the doctrinal significance of the Incarnation, we are ever in danger of missing.

The great thing about Christmas is the revelation that God is ever to be found in the mangers of life, in those common, crude or obscure parts of our experience as well as in the unusual, the startling event or in the rare occasion.

It has always been the soul's delusion that God, being so great and wonderful a one, will meet man only in the great hour or on the state occasion. But the manger-cradle of the Christ child was God's way of correcting this error, just as Christ's whole life was given to the revelation of God's presence in common things.

When all is said about Jesus, is there any quality that stands out more characteristically in him than his commonness? When you inquire for a particular wonderful thing about him you do not find it. The truth is that the most extraordinary thing about him is his moral success in living a very common life. Stripped of all the doctrinal interpretations in which we have clothed him we see in him a common man going about perfectly common tasks divinely.

He shunned to dazzle men. In his temptation at the opening of his ministry he consciously rejected every spectacular method of making himself Messiah, and chose to be the prophet of the commonplace, to show God's presence in the mangers of life.

And this was why his townsmen rejected him. "Is not this the carpenter's son?" they asked. His hands were like any man's—hard with toil. His garments were neither priestly nor regal, but common. His speech was not of the schools, but of the neighborhood. He affected nothing, but just lived a man's life.

Israel had expected the Messiah to come in the clouds of heaven with pomp and glory. And God sent him of humble parents through the world's back door. It seems uncouth for God to come into our world that way.

But there would have been no Christmas story had God's son been born a prince, had his cradle been of down and his chamber a palace.

God had been coming this way to the world for ages. All men expected him to come through the rich or the strong or the wise, and amidst splendid circumstance, but nobody dreamed that he could come through lowly folk and amid common circumstance.

So when God came to men through the gate of common life and lay in the manger with the beasts of the stall, the manger was glorified as the common bush which Moses saw was glorified with the burning presence of Jehovah.

And is there any more essential revelation in our Christianity than that of which this manger-cradle is a symbol, that God is to be found in common places, that his abode is in lowly hearts and that all our common life is ever revealing his presence if we have insight to discern it? Not our parlor life alone, but our stable life holds God. Not our religious places and exercises alone, but our secular places and duties hold him. He is not just a guest of the drawing-room, this God of ours, but a constant companion of the common way our lives must take.

This is the gospel, is it not? What good news compares with it for our poor hearts whose deepest question is whether God will notice common folk like us? Whoever has answered for our hearts the question as has Jesus by coming into our world without reputation and humbling himself to be born of a virgin and lying in the manger? Does not every uncouth manger of life grow glorious with the thought that God is in it?

Our daily work grows meaningful when we discern God's presence at our task.

It has been our habit to find God in places set apart for his revealing—at shrines and altars or churches or the holy sacrament. But it seems somehow to twist our minds to think of God in connection with our bookkeeping or our housekeeping or our farmkeeping or our storekeeping. God and groceries go ill together in our thinking. And so we have a space marked off for God and we call that space sacred, and all the other spaces we call secular.

There is no time like Christmas to correct this error of our hearts. There is no secular. God is in the uncouth spaces of our daily life prompting us to hallow them by honesty and thoroughness and faithfulness. And to him who learns to see God in his daily work its uncouthness passes into fineness and its drudgery into enthusiasm.

The great common virtues of our moral life become religious when we regard them in the light of this Christmas truth that God sanctifies common values.

Religion has lacked much in the past by developing an experience abstracted from the moral life. Not always has the holy man deemed it important to be just good. As a reaction against mere holiness we have today a type of goodness which refuses to count God in.

To be a good neighbor, to aid the poor, to comfort the distressed, to be gentle in the home, to deal justly with one's fellows in trade—these virtues have been described by not laymen alone but ministers also as constituting "mere" morality.

Christmas is God's protest against this segregation of so large a section of the life we really live from his indwelling. This common manger of morality holds God, too. It is the concrete reality of which our often passionless virtues which we call religious are mere abstractions. If we will bring the Christmas truth home to our concrete life we must learn to see these virtues as divine, as prompted by God and expressing God's presence.

And lying very near to this manger of our common virtues is the manger of our common love: this too holds God.

Once men thought that to love God was some unique and special attitude. And so for the love of God many foreswore human loves, cutting themselves off from home and neighbors and humanity to cultivate the religious life in solitude. But Christmas tells us that to love God is just to discover God's presence in our common loves. It has elevated common motherhood and childhood. It has brought man nearer to man in order that God may be manifested.

How our common love is chastened in the thought that God's love is at the root of it! But that is what our Bible says,—"We love because He first loved us." All mother-love and father-love, the love of husband and wife, the love of friend and neighbor and patriot, derive their impulse from the great heart of the loving Father.

Yet another manger where we are not wont to seek for God but over which the Christmas star stands constantly is that common thing that men call natural law.

We have trained our hearts to seek for God in the startling events of our life, the unusual, the mysterious, the miraculous. We have even invented a world to which we relegate the unexplained occurrence: we call it the Supernatural Order.

And we say God is in the supernatural order, but the common, everyday natural order is too humble to hold Him. We guard jealously this supernatural order. If any man comes saying there is no such world we fly to its defense, not because we care so much for this supernatural order, but we fear that to abolish that kingdom means to give up God. Where can God dwell, if there be no Transcendental World, our hearts are asking in these days of a new world-view.

Christmas is God's own answer. He dwells in the one and only order that is—the order of constant law. This uncouth natural order of our world is the manger of his puissant and gracious presence. The laws of soils and climates, of seed-time and harvest, of sun and rain, of blood and tissue and brain, of thought and conduct, of the social order and the cosmic process—all are just our poor way of describing what God is ever doing before our eyes.

God is with us—this is the Christmas revelation. He does not come to see us occasionally, breaking into our uncouth world through miracle. He abides here ever. He belongs here.

May our eyes be opened to behold Him in the common mangers of our life!

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

A War Council

The "battle with the bottle" is well characterized in the phrase: "This is not a battle but a war." The war chiefs have been holding a council in Chicago. It was the first of the biennial conventions of the National Anti-Saloon League. It was the greatest and most significant anti-liquor conclave that ever gathered. The workers from nearly every state and hundreds of districts over the country spent ten days together discussing the best plans for undoing King Alcohol. The reports of battles won cheered this mighty fighting host as the success of no reform in modern times has cheered its advocates. Among the speakers were many of the greatest temperance advocates of the generation and statesmen of national reputation. It was the most significant gathering of the churches in federation because it was a gathering that has done and is doing something more than warm their hearts with Christian fellowship and pass good resolutions for future action. It has done marvelous things and sees before it the opportunity to do things yet more marvelous. It was significant as showing what the federated church can do when it unites on a great common moral cause. Again its significance points the way to practical union among the churches by a uniting for concrete ends of righteousness with no reference to doctrinal differences or ecclesiastical discriminations. The Presbyterians are the only great evangelical and democratic church communion that have no official representatives on League directorates. The Catholics give practical coöperation though they do not have an official representative owing to the deep ecclesiastical demarkation between Catholic and Protestant. The Episcopalians stand aloof for like ecclesiastical reasons though the Reformed Episcopal church is represented as are the Lutherans. The Presbyterians have no synodical law allowing the appointment of representatives to such an inter-church organization but as individual churches and ministers they coöperate heartily in all the campaigns.

The Warriors

The success of the war depends upon the chieftains, not the ultimate success for the principle will win in spite of any failures on the part of leaders, and will find leaders who can succeed if those who are leading are not able. One is struck forcibly by the practical character of the men who are at the front in this army of reform. They are not mere dreamers though they do dream. They are not mere politicians though they use practical methods in politics for the gaining of victory. Party leaders become non-partisan on this distinctly moral issue and no party, as such, will line up against it, for it would stand self-confessed as the advocate of immorality. Gov. Hanley and Gov. Glenn are two conspicuous examples of party men who lead in the battle for this moral cause. Both bring a practical knowledge of saloon tactics from their experience as the executives of great states engaged in a decisive struggle with the traffic. Congressmen like Hobson and Miller become open advocates in the national legislative halls and do not hesitate to go before their party caucuses with their records. Men like Baker, Russel, Anderson, Burke, and Wheeler, with numerous others, come from the front ranks with the steel hand of determination and the glow of victory. John G. Woolley stands with prophetic voice to interpret the Word of God, the Sign of the Times, and the Cry of Humanity, and dares the dissatisfaction and scorn of his one-time party co-partiots because he believes it is time for the party of the prophet to diminish that the deliverer may actually break the bonds. The captains and lieutenants are a great host and they care not whether any man name them but only that they may be magnified, though forgotten, in the magnificent success of the cause. Behind them all are the men and women in the files who march to the polls and cast out the Demon from their communities, and their number is become a great host that no man can number, for while millions have had opportunity to record their conviction, other millions are yet denied the right in this democratic land because the Liquor King has been powerful enough to prevent them exercising their democratic right to vote on the question.

From North and South

Here met on one platform two notable leaders from Indiana and Georgia. Both are men of eloquence but of more than eloquence, for they have made their eloquence effective in banishing the saloon from their commonwealths. Seaborn Wright comes from the sunny southland where the decree has gone forth that the new slavery shall cease, that men shall no longer bind the intolerable burdens of poverty and disease upon their innocent children, their helpless women, and their protesting communities through their anarchical demand that a man may drink ruin and death to his dependents in order to satisfy his own depraved appetite. He reminds us that a half century ago the federal government marched down south to protest against nullification. Now the same southland protests against federal nullification. States like Georgia pass laws to protect its people against the slave driver—Rum. The federal government issues licenses permitting outlaws to nullify those laws if they can do it without being caught. When the federal government catches an illicit distiller doing business without one of its licenses, it publicly sells the condemned product of the still on the streets of a Georgian city in disregard of the law of Georgia, which makes it a penal offense to sell liquor. The state says liquor shall not be transported within its boundaries and the federal government steps in to annul that law so far as liquor coming from another state is concerned and compels the protesting commonwealth to submit to a breaking of its own laws by citizens of another state. A great cheer arose when Seaborn Wright declared himself glad slaves were freed and as heart and hand against all slavery on the face of the earth and there was a peal of cheers and laughter when he facetiously brought his address to a climax by declaring Georgia would "lick the federal government on this question if she could." He reminded his hearers of the time when the country rang with the cry "On to Richmond" and said that "after we got tired out you marched down there" but now the battle cry must be "On to Washington" until Uncle Sam no longer nullifies the laws of the commonwealths that were in the forefront in the war on the saloon. Gov. Hanly extended the hand of fellowship across the vanished Mason and Dixon's line and paid glowing tribute to the leadership of the south in this new "War of Emancipation." Hanly on the saloon rivals Ingersoll for eloquence. He it is:

A Crusader's Cry

"Personally, I have seen so much of the evils of the liquor traffic in the last four years, so much of its economic waste, so much of its physical ruin, so much of its mental blight, so much of its tears and heartaches, that I have come to regard the business as one that must be held and controlled by strong and effective laws. I bear no malice toward those engaged in the business, but I hate the traffic. I hate its every phase.

"I hate it for its arrogance. I hate it for its hypocrisy. I hate it for its cant and craft and false pretense. I hate it for its commercialism. I hate it for its greed and avarice. I hate it for its sordid love of gain at any price. I hate it for its domination in politics. I hate it for its corrupting influence in civic affairs. I hate it for its incessant effort to debauch the suffrage of the country; for the cowards it makes of public men. I hate it for its utter disregard of law. I hate it for its ruthless trampling of the solemn compacts of state constitutions.

"I hate it for the load it straps to labor's back, for the palsied hands it gives to toil, for its wounds to genius, for the tragedies of its might-have-beens. I hate it for the human wrecks it has caused. I hate it for the almshouses it peoples, for the prisons it fills, for the insanity it begets, for its countless graves in potter's fields.

"I hate it for the mental ruin it imposes upon its victims, for its spiritual blight, for its moral degredation. I hate it for the crimes it has committed. I hate it for the homes it has destroyed. I hate it for the hearts it has broken. I hate it for the malice it has planted in the hearts of men—for its poison, for its bitterness, for the dead sea fruit with which it starves their souls.

"I hate it for the grief it causes womanhood—the scalding tears, the hopes deferred, the strangled aspirations, its burden of want and care. I hate it for its heartless cruelty to the aged, the infirm, and the helpless, for the shadow it throws upon the lives of children, for its monstrous injustice to blameless little ones.

"I hate it as virtue hates vice, as truth hates error, as righteousness hates sin, as justice hates wrong, as liberty hates tyranny, as freedom hates oppression."

Victory in Banners

Today 41,000,000 American citizens reside in territory where no legalized saloon exists. Last year 15,000 grog shops were put out of business by law. This year the average has been 40 per day. The white on the famous temperance map now covers 75 per cent of its area. Down in Virginia 600 out of the 700 little distilleries have been closed. Only seven states remain without local option laws of some scope, and these will not long bear the odium of being so un-American as to forbid a community from ridding itself of its chief maker of crime and poverty. There was a decrease of 42,000,000 gallons in the manufacture of distilled spirits last year. States like Kentucky and Maryland, famous as whisky makers, lead the column in this advance in respectability. The latter cut her production in two and the former reduced hers 70 per cent. The Distillers' Securities Corporation suffered a reduction in quarterly dividends of from 6 per cent to 1 per cent. The amount produced last year was less than the average for the past ten years, notwithstanding the two facts that population has greatly increased and that denatured alcohol adds not less than 6,000,000 gallons a year to the production. Thus the per capita production for the last year is at least 13 per cent less than the average for the past ten years. The actual decrease in sales amounted to over 14,000,000 gallons.

The Great Allies

But the war is not fought through laws alone. There are great allies in industry. The railroads, employing millions, forbid its use. Manufacturers are forbidding its use while on duty and discriminating against the men who use it while off duty, because it unfits them for the best and most accurate work. Ninety per cent of the railroads, 80 per cent of the trades and factories, and 79 per cent of agriculturists now discriminate against drinking by workingmen. The United States navy long ago abolished the grog ration and now the army canteen is out, and out to stay. Occasionally one hears of an army officer that favors its restoration but no army officer is heard advocating liquor for any army in action. Woolsley, Kitchener, and Beresford of the English fighting force are radically against it and the King has joined the Kaiser in abolishing the necessity of drinking his health in wine. The lodges are of one mind and law with few exceptions and no barkeeper is permitted in their membership. Life insurance is raising issue with the drinker and finding it to decided advantage to make a separate class of the total abstainer, a fact the total abstainer should take advantage of and refuse to insure with a risk company that makes him pay for the excessive mortality of the tippler. Labor, through its leaders, is lining up against the traffic. There will for some time doubtless be a majority of the rank and file against the total prohibition of the traffic, but the leaders, the brains of the movement, are for local option and when the lesson has been learned sufficiently by the great mass of workers who are of foreign lineage and habit, labor will sound the death knell of booze. The liquor interests have counted upon the defense of one last religious citadel but that is being lost. Catholicism is sounding a bugle blast for Americanism and already 200,000 have joined their total-abstinence league and the leaders are found on Anti-Saloon League programs and in the forefront of militant workers against the legalized saloon. The fact is there is no one left to plead the cause of the booze-dealer but the booze-lover, and even in his crowd there are multitudes voting against the open saloon as an institution.

The Strategy of the Campaign

As a practical fighting organization the Anti-Saloon League has a strategic method of campaign. Ours is a democratic government and majorities rule. Therefore, as Wendell Phillips said, it is necessary that public opinion be put behind our laws in order that they may be enforced. New ideas move slowly into practice. Reforms must be built up in the fabric of social progress. Evolution is better than revolution because it saves life and property and insures the endurance of the reform. The League has proceeded along the line of least resistance in law making because it could thus get a maximum amount of legal prohibition for the effort it was possible to put forth. It has tabooed no other means of defeating the use of liquor but in the matter of obtaining laws it has sought to make every possible area "dry" and thus build up a vast prohibition territory and a multitude of successful demonstrations of its practicability, and from the vantage point of territory gained, move on to larger conquests. Local option is American and nothing less is American. It means simply the right of a given electorate to vote on a question that can concern them and no one else. It does not concern the people of Chicago that the people of Jacksonville desire to abolish the saloon. Therefore the people of Jacksonville should not be ruled by the people of Chicago in that matter. It may concern the people of Jacksonville, however, that the people of Chicago make and sell whisky, because it may operate to nullify the law in Jacksonville. Thus Jacksonville should have the right to abolish the saloon at home and if Chicago nullifies their law, they ought to have the right to prevent it by abolishing the saloon all over the state of Illinois. If liquor dealing was a legitimate business this might not be logical argument. But the courts declare it is not a legal business but an illegal business, permitted by sufferance of law, thus it cannot claim the legal and logical right of a legitimate business and law should operate to protect all who would protect their homes and families from a traffic that tends to destroy them.

Proceeding from prohibition villages and townships the reform is able to obtain prohibition counties and from this larger area it obtains prohibition states. Its campaign is directed against the open saloon because there again is the line of least resistance. It will require much education and a reform in the social custom of multitudes before the solid majority in public opinion could enforce laws depriving a man of the privilege of taking a drink. Great numbers of moderate drinkers, pleading there is no harm in moderation, are willing to vote against the saloon as an institution because they know it to be a bad institution. Then when the saloon is abolished, moderate drinking grows less and less and the educative process is greatly enhanced.

Is There a Reaction On?

There have been some defeats of late and the saloon hosts are shouting that the reaction is on. Is it real or apparent? It is inevitable that battles should be lost, but this is not a battle but a war. Alabama defeated the effort for a constitutional amendment. That does not let a single saloon back in Alabama. The issue was so wrapped up in local politics that it is impossible to say it was a prohibition defeat. The prohibition issue was obscured in other questions. In Massachusetts, Worcester goes back to the "wet" column, but it must be remembered that Lincoln, Neb., has recently gone into the "dry" column. So it is an even break. Vermont and New Hampshire went back from state prohibition to local option, but at the same time five states went on from local option to state wide prohibition. So we lose battles, but the war steadily progresses in our favor.

Editorial

A NOTABLE victory was gained last week by the friends of law and order over the forces of misrule and indecency in this city. For five years past there has been held what was known as the First Ward Ball in the Coliseum. The institution has been planned to raise funds for the spring campaign in the downtown districts, and has been under the management of the two First Ward bosses, John Coughlin, usually known in Chicago parlance as "Bathhouse John," and Michael Kenna, whose euphonious and rather descriptive title is "Hinky Dink." In order to make this gathering attractive to the peculiar type of citizens representing the constituency of these two saloon keepers, it has been understood that the people of the Chicago underworld would be on exhibition, and scenes of lawless defiance of decency that have gone to and beyond the limit of things describable have been encouraged, despite all the protests that could be registered. This year earnest efforts were made in behalf of an abandonment of this orgy, but apparently without success. It was understood that the city government had committed itself again to the sanction of the ball. Almost at the last moment, however, so great had become the body of protest registered by churches, ministerial bodies, woman's clubs and all sorts of private citizens, that the mayor and the owners of the Coliseum felt compelled to take a hand in the matter and the First Ward Ball was declared off. The mayor consented that the tickets already sold should be used in attendance upon a "concert" that was to be substituted for the ball, but under such strict surveillance and with such limitations of privilege as to rob it of all attractiveness for the classes who have made up the clientele of this outrage upon decency in past years. Chicago has reason to congratulate itself that even city officials so indifferent to moral values as our present mayor and some of his colleagues seem to be, grow restless and compliant when met by determined insistence upon decency.

THE election of Professor George Adam Smith of the Free Church College, Glasgow, to the principalship of the University at Aberdeen, Scotland, will please his host of friends throughout the English-speaking world. This is a singularly appropriate and well deserved honor, coming as it does by royal appointment, and being the first instance of the election of a Free Church minister to the headship of any one of the four universities of Scotland. Hitherto this honor has been reserved exclusively for members of the Established (Presbyterian) Church. In spite of the exacting duties connected with the principalship, biblical students will hope that Dr. Smith may find time to continue that profoundly helpful series of geographical and exegetical works with which his name is so closely connected.

Mr. Long's Gift to the Brotherhood

By an inadvertence in making up the paper last week we failed to give our readers the news of Mr. R. A. Long's purchase of Dr. J. H. Garrison's two-thirds stock in the Christian Publishing Company of St. Louis. The passing of Dr. Garrison's control of this corporation into other hands would itself be a notable event, but it takes on extraordinary significance in view of Mr. Long's purposes. He has not purchased the property to control it himself, but to transfer it to the brotherhood to be controlled by the brotherhood in whatever manner may be devised. The amount involved in the transfer is said by the committee to have been about $100,000.

Our first impulse in recording this event is to express our congratulations to Dr. Garrison on the so fortunate issue of the work to which he has given all the strong years of his life. Readers of the Christian Evangelist of late years have not failed to detect in the writer of the "Easy Chair" articles a wistful, if not troubled and plaintive vein. The explanation of this was not difficult to those whose acquaintance passed beyond the paper to the editor and owner. Dr. Garrison has been a leader among the Disciples, carrying the mantle of Isaac Errett, and through the Christian Evangelist wielding the same sort of influence as that which Errett exerted through The Christian Standard. Crowned with years he could not otherwise than feel concerned for the future of the work wrought by his hands. To whom should it be committed? How guarantee its continued growth and influence for good? These questions have been happily answered by the generous and sagacious act of Mr. Long. The corporation and newspaper which, under private control, have nevertheless consistently sought not private aggrandizement but the general good, are now put beyond danger of being used in other hands as instruments of selfish exploitation. In the assurance of this it is no wonder that Dr. Garrison feels that he has received an answer to his prayer,

> "Establish the work of our hands, O Lord;
> Yea, the work of our hands establish Thou it!"

In a very personal way we are prompted to express our congratulations to him on this providential turn in the affairs of the Christian Publishing Company.

Our next thought is one of admiration for the Christian farsightedness of Mr. R. A. Long. Here is a man whose hand is touching helpfully every interest of the Disciples of Christ. Colleges, missionary societies, conventions, local churches and now the publication interests. The problem which the committee of fifteen confessed it was not able to solve, has been put in the way of solution by the shrewd generosity of this business man. We say put in the way of solution. For it is by no means apparent yet that the Christian Publishing Company will be the brotherhood house. The Publication Committee's report presented at Pittsburg states that one of our large publishing houses "withheld entirely its approval of the plan" to unify the brotherhood's publication interests. The committee states its belief that it is an "apparent fact that at this time it would be impossible to launch a brotherhood publishing house which would result in the unifying of our publishing interests." How the mere giving over of the control of one publishing house to the brotherhood shall unify the publishing business we do not now see. But now as always The Christian Century is on the side of a brotherhood publication house, an institution through which our best brains shall produce a literature truly representative of the genius of the brotherhood.

While we see serious dangers in the pathway we believe these dangers may and will be avoided by the men to whom this beginning of such an institution is being committed. Mr. W. R. Warren, late Centennial secretary, has been called at Mr. Long's suggestion and with the approval of the committee, to become the general manager of the company. For the time being the present editorial staff of the Christian Evangelist will be continued.

How Shall the Disciples Make Good?

If the Disciples of Christ were to be judged by the ordinary standards of denominational success there could be little question as to the prosperity which a hundred years of history has brought them. It is given to very few religious bodies to attain so notable a numerical strength as the Disciples now possess. In institutional equipment of colleges, missionary societies and benevolent organizations, the Disciples are well provided. In the matter of denominational spirit which is so large an asset in the work of any religious body, they perhaps lead all others, and this affirmation is made with full recognition of the loyalty which Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Roman Catholics and others feel toward their own churches.

Nevertheless, it is a fair question whether the Disciples have in any large degree accomplished the purposes for which their separate life was begun. If the same question were to be asked regarding any other religious people which has come even to measurable prominence in Christian history, there could be little doubt what the answer would be. The success of a body of Christians with a definite program and an effective organization lies in the growing prevalence of the principles which they have made the basis of their message to the world. If one reviews the historic testimonies made respectively by the different churches whose names have become familiar to us, he must confess that every one of them has made good. This is quite independent of the present status of those bodies. They may be today vigorous or declining. But if the thing for which they have stood historically has become an accepted element in the life of the church of Christ as a whole, no one can doubt that such a testimony has been successful.

For example, the Presbyterian Church, accepting the leadership of John Calvin, stood for the fundamental truth that the authority of God is supreme and is not to be limited or thwarted by the decrees of councils, the utterances of popes, or the votes of ecclesiastics. No Protestant questions any longer the soundness of this contention. Calvinism had various other points of contention, but they were subordinate to this and might easily be set aside as of minor importance. But in the central and essential element of its life Presbyterianism has become a recognized element in the entire Protestant church. The contention of Luther that a man was to have the right to appeal to the Scriptures and to derive from them the message of the divine Spirit unhindered by any ban upon the free exercise of conscience, has become a commonplace of Protestant contention.

In the essential elements of his plea Martin Luther and the people who follow him have made good. To question this central truth of the Lutheran Church would be to revert to the ideas of the Middle Ages. Similarly the sense of personal access to God which John Wesley preached and the necessity for a regenerate life as over against the formality and coldness of religion in his day have become accepted principles in all the churches. To that extent we are all of us Methodists, and the Wesleyan movement has made good in securing in the universal church a sense of personal responsibility on the part of the individual toward God.

Similar illustrations might be given from most of the other denominations. The things for which they worked have become the common assets of the churches, and this is the very essence of success. To be sure, there are many features that have developed in the various churches which are purely subordinate and which are held as restricted practices by the particular bodies in which they have taken form. Endless illustrations of this subordinate type of church practice could be given. But these are quite negligible in the present discussion. The point here insisted upon is that the most notable of the Christian bodies with which we are acquainted have made good in securing general recognition for the central principles of their various confessions.

Measured by this standard what can be said regarding the Disciples? No student of their history can deny for a moment that their organizing impulse at the very first and their universally accepted watch-word throughout their history has been the urgency and duty of unity among the followers of Jesus. There have been small companies of our people here and there who, caught in the eddy of some limited grasp of our history or some doctrinal tendency, have insisted upon something else as the essential and basic principle of our government. But while it is perfectly true that the Disciples of Christ share with their religious neighbors most of the great truths of the gospel, such as the Fatherhood of God, the Lordship and Saviourhood of Jesus, the work of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the believer, the supreme character of the Bible, especially of the New Testament as the record of the redemptive work of the prophets, of the Christ and of the apostles, and the continuity, necessity and efficiency of the church as the visible expression of the Christian faith in the world, yet these have never been the dominating testimonies of the Disciples for the simple reason that they are shared with all other evangelical Christians, and to make any one of them the ground of separate existence would be both foolish and sinful.

The Disciples have one conspicuous and impressive message to the world. That is the message of unity. Whenever they cease to be insistent upon this theme and divert their attention to other and minor interests they lose sight of their mission in the world and consent to the charge that their history has been anomalous, meaningless and impertinent. We have already pointed out in a previous consideration of this theme the various side issues into which considerable companies of the Disciples have been betrayed at various times in their history. With their natural tendencies toward controversy, inherited from an age of reaction from emotionalism to dogma, they have yielded themselves at times to contentions over various matters, some of which were important and some unimportant. Of those which had real significance and were perhaps necessary as stages in the progress of thought, mention may be made of the discussions regarding the ordinances that have both confirmed the Disciples in the scripturalness of their practice of immersion and the weekly celebration of the Lord's Supper, and at the same time have made increasingly clear the wholly subordinate character of external ordinances in the work of the kingdom of God; the importance and immediate urgency of the call to missionary activity both in the home land and throughout the world; the necessity of facing frankly the enlarging truth which the study of nature and the Word of God has brought to our generation as bearing upon a modern, living and effective message for our age.

Some of the minor and foolish controversies into which the Disciples have been betrayed were the one concerning the design of baptism, our standing contest with our Baptist brethren; the one over missionary methods which has unhappily resulted in the defection of a certain group of our people from the main and forward-moving body of the Disciples, with the certainty that this faction will harden into a useless sect and die away after the fashion of such groups; the silly and criminal debate over instrumental music in church worship; and other controversies that might be named. In all of these diversions from the central theme to which we had committed ourselves, the Disciples lost time, temper and vital energy. If we had put as much vigor into our great purpose as we did into these minor and often causeless contentions, we should have measured far greater distance toward the realization of our ultimate ideals.

The question now confronts us at the beginning of our second century, Shall we cease the folly of these minor issues and enter with enthusiasm upon the central achievement which has allured the prophetic spirits among us from the first? We believe that this question will be answered definitely and decisively within the first decade of the new cycle on which we have entered. We are no longer children playing with toys, but grown men and women with the sobering experiences of a competent history behind us and with a humbling consciousness that thus far, in spite of all the progress the Christian world has made toward brotherhood, we have not made good.

That the constant repetition of the watchword of Christian unity by the Disciples has not been without its effect upon American Christianity, we are happily certain. But we are equally confident that this influence has been both less than the Disciples often imagine and far less than it might have been had they been true to their ideals. That the best voices in all the churches are today in behalf of Christian unity is one of the encouraging signs of the times. But the right of the Disciples to claim credit for this note in the music of our day is limited by the large element of indifference to the theme manifested in our own ranks, and also by the fact that the unity hoped and prayed for by these elect spirits of the church universal agrees but little with the kind of absorption which the majority of the Disciples have always imagined would be the final issue of their efforts.

Our contention is that the time has arrived for a real consecration of the Disciples to their original purpose; that the time is ripe for insistence upon it; that when it is interpreted in the spirit of the Master, of Paul, of the Fathers of our own movement, and of the longings voiced among Christians in every part of the world, it can be effected in far briefer period than we have ever dared to hope. Do the Disciples wish such a consummation of their history? We believe that the great body of them do. Are they willing to pay the price which will be necessary for the accomplishment of this task, the price of earnest reflection upon the facts, of open-minded recognition of the changed conditions of our own time, and of a serious effort to practice Christian union not only among themselves but with their religious neighbors? We believe they are ready to make their effort if they know in what way it can be made effectively. We hope to consider some of the methods by which this historic plea of ours may be interpreted effectively and illustrated with actual results. In this way we hope to indicate the manner in which the Disciples can really attain to the position of a body of Christians taken seriously by the religious world, and accomplishing in something like an adequate way the great purposes for which it has been called of God.

The Second Coming of Christ

By Professor Silas Jones

This historian of the church encounters many a foolish attempt to fix the exact date of the Lord's return in power to complete his work of redemption and to describe the glories of the Messianic kingdom. The future historian will doubtless have a new collection of absurd predictions with which to amuse himself in his lighter hours. But we ought not to overlook the genuine religious feeling that is back of many of these attempts to fix the limits of man's life on earth. Because a man knows a great deal that is not so it does not follow that he is a simpleton and of no use in the world. Under the influence of a false method of interpretation great and good men have written nonsense about the second coming of Christ. In spite of their error, however, they may have given us a worthy ideal of the kingdom of righteousness. They saw the golden age in the future, not in the past. They believe in the triumph of right over wrong. They lived for something greater than their private pleasure. If we can hold to their confidence in the final supremacy of Christ and at the same time be a little more modest in our prophetic utterances we may dream a little of the ideal kingdom without damage to ourselves or anybody else.

The Judgment

It is customary for us to think of the decision of Christ concerning us. Would it not be well for us to ask what will be our decision when we are compelled to deal honestly with ourselves? What will be our judgment upon others? Is it not possible that when we see ourselves as we are and our neighbors as they are no word of God will be needed to show us how unworthily we have lived? We condemn a man because he rebels against our view of life. We do not try to understand him and his environment. He may know life better than we do and he may be more willing to sacrifice for his ideals, than we are for ours. The pedant judges poetry by counting the accented and unaccented syllables and he regards with contempt the one who receives inspiration from the thought and aspiration of the poet but is ignorant of the technicalities of literary criticism. In the same way we judge ourselves and our neighbor by the technicalities of conduct. When the full light of truth shines upon us the legal method of determining values will not be available. Self-interest prompts us to judge with partiality. But we try to make it appear that we are guided by the desire to promote the general welfare. This sort of deception will be impossible at the last day. Every man will be forced to see whether he has juggled with the truth and also that such juggling deceives no one.

Contentment

Some one has said that if two angels were sent to earth, one to rule a kingdom and the other to sweep a street, neither would wish to change his occupation for that of the other. A moral being satisfies himself with service. The greatest in the kingdom of heaven is he that renders the most efficient service to man. Lecky has said: "Christianity for the first time gave the servile virtues the foremost place in the moral type. Humility, obedience, gentleness, patience, resignation, are all cardinal or rudimentary virtues in the Christian character. They were all neglected or undervalued by the pagans." In the kingdom of Christ men will be honored for what they are, not for their possessions, their ancestry, or any other accident of their history. The envy and heartache which are so common now because of differences in material wealth and social rank will have no place in the perfect society. If regrets come to the members of this society they will arise from neglect of opportunity to employ well the talents entrusted by the Master to his servants. The question will not be, "How much did I have given to me?" but, "How well have I used what I had?" And since we are at the close of another year, we may profitably inquire concerning the manner in which we have acquitted ourselves during the year. It is more important to know whether we have played the part of men or of cowards than it is to know how much money we have made or lost.

Mid-week service for Dec. 2. Matt. 24:32-51; I Thess. 4:13-18; 2 Thess. 1:3-12.

The Birthplace of Christmas

How Christmas Is Celebrated by the Children of Bethlehem

By Floyd Price Willett

"Glory to God in the highest,
And on earth peace."

So sang the angels to some shepherds who were watching their flocks on the hills of Palestine; while at the same time a great star was shining in the east, guiding three wise men to the cradle of the newborn king. And though that song and the light of that star brought their glad tidings so many hundred years ago, and in a land so far from ours, they have come to us through the years; and we hear the echo of the angels' chorus in the anthems and carols of Christmas, and see the light of the guiding star in the candles the little children of Hungary put in their windows on Christmas Eve to guide the Christ Child, and in the myriad lights of our own happy celebrations.

But there is one feature in which we have failed to catch the echo of that first Christmas night, for the Magi brought presents to the king they had come to worship—gifts that we have forgotten in the customs of the New World. And it is in just this point that we might be led by the little children of Bethlehem.

For while we are listening for the bells that tell of the birthday of that little child of Bethlehem, the greatest event of the year will be taking place there. All the children will go together to the cave where Jesus was born, singing a carol of Christmas, and leave there the tapers which they carry—their gifts to the Christ Child.

But this cave will be little like the humble manger that we imagine, for it is hung with lamps—gold, silver and brass—which richer worshipers than the Bethlehem children have placed there, and lighted by the thousands of candles always burning. Tapestries, rich in embroidery, line the walls and fold over the niche in the wall, on the floor of which is a large silver star with the motto "Jesu Christus hic natus erat."

And that spot is one of the most sacred in the Holy Land, for there can be little doubt that it is the very cave in which our Savior was worshipped by the shepherds. But were there the gravest doubts as to its historical value, it would be sacred because the baby, not the man, and this cave is the precious symbol of the Holy Child. There is little wonder that they are Christians—the truest of Christians, devoted to their Christ Child without dogma or creed to hinder and perplex them, and thus contrast most favorably with the Christianity of the sincere reference in which it is held by the children of Bethlehem. They worship Roman, Greek and Armenian priests who guard the sacred site.

BETHLEHEM CHILDREN.

CHILDREN PLAYING ON A PALESTINE HOUSETOP.

The church which is built over this crypt is probably the oldest in Palestine. Begun as early as 330 A. D. by Constantine, Emperor of the East, it has been enlarged and elaborated by successive princes, until it is a composite of magnificent gifts from all over the world. Mosaics, pillars, lamps, windows and carvings make the building beautiful and ornate, and though some of the windows are not washed because they are in a part of the church for which the Greeks and Romans are contesting, yet the general impression is attractive. The forward part of the church, the great nave, seems rather bare because it is very large and has little decoration, the pillars which shut off the transepts standing in long lines. But the inner altars, covered with lace, gold, marble and candles, are strikingly rich and elaborate. These altars, decorated by devotees of the various sects with untiring rivalry, together with the grotto just below them, stand in startling contrast to the simple birthplace of our Lord, and the places where he approached his Father, and throw a rather illuminating side light on the trend of modern theology.

As the people of Bethlehem revere the Christ Child, so they devote their lives to picturing him. For they are very clever workers in mother-of-pearl and make beautiful carvings on the large shell linings which are brought in to them from the Red Sea in great caravans. And naturally most of these pictures represent the birth of Jesus. Every member of every family does his part in this work, from the expert carvers to the smallest children, who gather the chips out of which small spoons, crosses and stars are made, or polish the pearl when it has been removed from the shell. It is probably this rather high type of industry combined with the deep and very real Christianity of the people, that makes them so much superior to others in Palestine. Clean streets and houses, happy faces, attractive clothing and an air of activity, take the place of the filth and squalor, shabbiness, and inertia of such towns as Hebron and Shechem. This contrast is no where more clearly seen than in the children who greet the traveller with smiles and welcome instead of the frowns and mud balls which met us in some less fortunate cities. And in the schools are bright-faced, clean, eagerly receptive children, joyfully chanting their lessons as they sway back and forth in study, far more attractive than the solemn, dirty, unhappy looking lads who chant the Koran monotonously in the mosques of the Mohammedan towns.

So as we consider the true meaning of Christmas, is it not symbolized in the procession of the Bethlehem children, which is traceable through the conditions in the city and the faith of the people in Christ, to the reverence for the manger under the church of St. Mary?

Peers or People?

The Lords have refused to pass the Budget. The battle has begun. It is a war between the peers and the people. There is no doubt as to who will win in the end, and not much doubt as to who will win in the particular battle of which this is the eve. There is more democracy in England than is usually credited. This is seen in the very fact that the Lords have not dared to do such a thing as they did last Tuesday night, in a century.

It is the old question of taxation without representation, the principle on which the American colonies were lost. The principle has been recognized for more than a century that the lords, who are responsible to no one, shall not interfere with a money bill. They have violated this principle on the ground that the present budget is so revolutionary and their love for the people so great, that they are compelled to demand that the people be definitely consulted before it is passed. This is nothing short of a claim on their part of the right to dissolve parliament when ever and for what ever cause their lordships please. This would be a dangerous precedent to set up, even though they would probably not dissolve parliament on trivial pretexts because of the fear that their friends would lose in a general election. Even in this case they await the result with fear and trembling. In a debate which I heard in the House of Lords a few evenings ago, several of them admitted they were bringing on a general election on terms very unfavorable to their own interests.

Without desiring to be unduly harsh one cannot but feel that the chief reason for the opposition of the lords to the budget is that it dips too deeply into their own pockets for them to appreciate it. Some of them, yes many of them, are sympathetically inclined toward social reform, but it is the old story of the anarchist and his suddenly acquired cottage. He has something to defend and in his defense of it his anarchism suffers. Had our friends, the Peers, been differently situated they might have been anarchists, but under the present circumstances it can hardly be expected. They have something to defend; they are men of property, either in their own names or that of their wives. They are human and they resent the taxes imposed. They say justice is being violated, and of this they are easy subjects to convince.

Nor must those who live in glass houses throw stones. Here is a man who has bought a house. His lawyer tells him that the stamp duty on that particular transaction will be $31, unless the budget passes in three days time, and then in will be $62. It did not pass and those who sit in "another place" are to be thanked. Here is a man who has a prospect of dying; he is told that if he can manage to die this month his estate will be let off with a death duty of $11,000, but that if he waits until the middle of January next, it may be more than double. It is enough to make a man who has a grain of selfishness in his nature think seriously about dying, and doing it now.

The situation has been most aggravating to the Liberals during the past four years, for although they have possessed an almost unprecidented majority in the House of Commons, almost every first class bill which they have passed has been either thrown out by the Lords or mutilated in such a way as to make it impossible for the Commons to accept it upon its return. Where are the several Education Bills? Lost in the Lords. What became of the Licensing Bill? Defeated by the Lords. Who destroyed the Irish Land Bill? The Lords. What of the law against Plural Voting? Refused by the Lords. What fate met the London Election Bill? Thrown out by the Lords. Wherever the Government, chosen by the free vote of the people, have turned in their endeavor to introduce social reform and right existing wrongs they have been faced by the House of Lords with their eternal veto. Is it any wonder that the people are crying that they must be ended or mended?

In the end the people will win. Their rising intelligence is a sure sign. Increasing numbers are coming to believe that a real man is of more value than a Duke, unless perchance the Duke himself happens to be a man. The story is just now being told of a quarrel which took place between Holbein and a certain nobleman in the days of Henry VIII. The great painter in his anger pushed the nobleman down the stairs and seriously injured him. Each of them proceeded before the King to state his case. Henry VIII commanded Holbein to beg the nobleman's pardon, but this greatly incensed the nobleman who domanded nothing less than the life of his enemy. The King made reply: "My lord, you have not now to do with Holbein, but with me. Remember, my lord, pray, that I can whenever I please, make seven lords of seven plowmen, but I cannot make one Holbein even of seven lords".

The leaders who are being talked of just now are Lloyd George and Winston Churchill, called by their enemies demogogues and socialists, and by their friends the champions of the people; the Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, calm and dignified in the midst of it all, and very firm; Lord Rosebury, who has left his lonely furrow and got onto the fence, opposing the Budget but warning the Lords in a dramtic speech, that they are treading on dangerous ground; Lord Lansdowne, the mover of the resolution, as the leader of the opposition in the Upper Chamber, and in whose private house at a party caucus the fate of the Licensing Bill was decided; the Bishops of Birmingham and Hereford who took a strong stand against the resolution, failing to follow the lead of the Archbishop of Canterbury in restraining them from debate and the vote on the ground that it was a party issue; and the Archbishop of York, recently appointed, who declared that he entered upon the week's debate with an open mind and was convinced before the close, by the very merits of the debate, that their lordships were proposing to do an unwarranted thing.

The week beginning January 8th next, will not only determine to an important degree the fate of the House of Lords, but it will also determine whether the revenue for the increasing needs of the country will be derived along the line mapped out in the present Budget or whether it will be by means of a duty imposed on foreign imports. This is the plainly confessed alternative.

A Little Sermon In Green

By Frank Waller Allen

Winter, drab-colored barren, frosty and treacherous, has always depressed the spirits of men. It is true that in the hot, dusty, dry-throated days of midsummer we long for the ice-bound streams and the white fields of snow. And even when the autumn comes and the sun, then, if ever an artist, paints the leaves crimson and gold, with a thousand shades of the blending of the two, we still fancy that winter is beautiful and kind. Yet the many-hued landscapes of October prove to be but the hectic flush of the disease which precedes death. The dreamed-of beauty wrought of snow and ice is but ephemereal, while the dull, scarred, ugly and bare face of the earth chills the heart and leaves an unnamed fear upon the soul. The fancied kindness, too, found in the coziness of the open fire assumes a meager value, when, reminded by the north wind, one thinks of the cruelties of cold and hunger bought to thousands of brother-men. The doctor of medicine, the sociologist and the psychologist all agree that man, physically, mentally and spiritually, is possessed at this season of the least vitality.

In olden times—so long ago that it is but tradition—men, realizing the fact of the heart's heaviness and the world's weariness during midwinter, introduced the festivities of Yuletide, using decorations chosen from the few things green the frost had left—holly, mistletoe, and the evergreen which we shall call the Christmas tree. They used this bit of color, all the more beautiful because of contrast, symbolically. It told them that at least God had never forgotten to send the springtime; it whispered of April rains, the blossoms of May, the warm south winds of June. It sang the song of the grass, the crocus, the early violet. A song to work by as they pushed their way unseen through the clouds to the sun that they might smile into the faces of men. It told of immortality, of the birth of love, and some even thought they could see in it the significance of the birthday that has made sacred to memory "the dear little town of Bethlehem". Ever since that brave elder day men have continued to bring the green of the gods into the desert of winter like an oasis.

Life, for most of us, is commonplace. Each day is but a return to yesterday's routine. It is tragically easy to make of it only the business of securing the means by which to feed and to clothe ourselves, and to provide a roof beneath which to sleep. Our ideals, our dreams, our enthusiasms are killed by the cold. Our love of the beautiful, our capacity for happiness, our impulses to be useful, sympathetic brothers of men, are swept away and we find our lives bitter and barren and ugly. There is nothing more pitiable than to become an unconscious dweller in eternal winter. It is the largest duty man owes himself, no matter now irksome may be the task of every day, to keep alive in his heart a love of things beautiful, ideal and of the dream-world. To be of value to his fellows and endurable to himself he must own and tend a green and sunny garden spot on the happy hills of Arcady. When the work within his hands seems hardest, and the spirit behind it most hopeless, when the world about looks grey and cold; when winter comes, then blessed are you if there be a bit of green to tell you that God at least has never forgotten to love. If there is just enough of our immortal color to whisper of happy days to be, of old friends to trust, of undiscovered beauty, of faith made new and hope returned, then life, with all of its sorrow, will not have proven futile for you. Keep alive the green. Tend the Garden. Beware of the Frost. And mind you, though you may have been taught that the food and the raiment and the roof are of greatest value, I say unto you that the poetry, the romance, the dreams, the color of the gods if you please, are most sacred. Is it not He of the green, happy Judean hills who asks you "Is not life more than meat?" Aye, friends, garner the green and forget it not. Keep it in the sanctuary of your heart, for of all things it is life's most valuable possession.

"Evening and Morning--The First Day"

By Minnie Griffith Sheets

A Primary Teacher's First Day with the new Bethany Graded Sunday-school Lessons.

The Primary teacher stood ready. Her hour had arrived—the hour for which she had worked and prayed for,—Oh! how long?

The praise service of song, prayer, and scripture responses was over:

"And now we bring our offering.
Our hands to work for Thee,
Our heart's best love,
Our lives, our selves,
Thine ever more, to be,"

had to be sung to the accompaniment of falling nickels and dimes—for this was "white" money Sunday; birthday greetings had been said to three members of the class, while they dropped their pennies one by one into the birthday box.

The superintendent had been down, and led to its room higher up the class to be promoted. Eager as they had been to become Juniors, they all cast regretful, and some tearful, glances backward, as they caught step with the music and like good soldiers marched forward where opportunity called.

Like the thunder's rumble that cries, "no vacuum" the rolling door leading to the Beginners' department rose cumbrously, and a straggling line of pop-eyed, grinning and bashful six year old's filed in and took their place, while the school sang "We welcome you, We welcome you."

Yes, the Primary teacher was ready; a solemn glory pervaded her presence that morning; it communicated itself to the children, who watched her with an air of expectancy. What did they know about it? They hadn't been told that old things had passed away and that henceforth all things should become new in their Sunday-school life.

The primary teacher was ready for the work before her. But in the psychological moment of hesitancy that comes to every thinking and responsible being when about to leave the beaten path to walk a new and untried one, even when guided by Spirit beckonings, the Imp of Temptation found his chance.

"Why don't you begin?" said Sir Imp. "You've always said it isn't best to lose time between the sections of the program, the children get restless. Why did you glance at the empty chart-rack? You used to say those big, highly colored pictures were inartistic", he leered. "What are you going to do with that lump of charcoal and piece of manilla paper? You used to complain because you had to teach 'Paul before the Council at Jerusalem' to primary children; they couldn't understand it, you said. Is world making so easy, and creation such a small subject, that you hope to have them know all about it by a display of charcoal on manilla paper? What verse is that you're pointing to in your black book? he said, and leaning over her shoulder he read, In the begining GOD ." Startled, he vanished before his ancient enemy, and our ever present help, God.

Soberly, cheerfully, thankfully, the primary teacher took up her task. Believingly, inspiringly, convincingly she read:

> In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. And the earth was without form and void and darkness was upon the face of the deep:
> And God said let there be light, and there was light.

Glad to be allowed to begin at the Beginning with these young lives, she told as carefully as she could the story of that far away time, illustrating chaos by a black patch on the manilla paper. She had the children close their eyes to see if they could imagine nothingness. Frank confessed he couldn't.

She tried to simplify the text by substituting "made" for "created" and lo!—"I made a pie dough cake yesterday," from Tiny Tim. Bless the children! they do so much of the teaching themselves. What did you make the cake out of Tiny Tim? Mary knew about the flour, Mattie said "and lard." "Tiny Tim did you make the flour and the lard?" and thus they began to find the difference between making and creating.

A big circle divided in halves by a vertical line, next found place on the paper. A yellow disc of the sun sent rays of warmth and light across the one portion, while a crescent and a few stars could be seen amid the darkness of the other. With these familiar objects to aid the imagination, explanations were much easier.

The boys were going out for a long Sunday afternoon stroll. October was in her most entrancing mood. Heaps of brown and yellow leaves, brought down by the early frosts, were every where. Squirrels were scampering and chattering among the baring branches of the trees, on the wooded side of the park and on beyond the river lay placid and beautiful in the warm afternoon sunlight. What fun to wade about, knee deep, among the rustling leaves, to sit under the trees and watch the squirrels; to gather up the falling nuts and skim pebbles over the smoth surface of the water.

With all this in anticipation, Homer was hurrying through his dinner. He was preparing to leave the table without touching his desert when his mother said: "I want you to tell me about the Sunday school lesson Homer". "I'm going to the river with the boys," he answered. "Didn't you hear something new in your department this morning?" Homer evaded the question and kept on getting ready for his afternoon's outing. Seeing the look of disappointment on her face he ran out to meet the boys and escape further questioning.

That evening when Homer came home tired and hungry, his mother gave him his bread and milk and helped him off to bed early, but made no mention of the Sunday-school lesson.

Seated in her own room by the light of the open fire-place Homer's mother rocked softly to and fro, thinking, planning, hoping for her boy. Softly the door opened and Homer, whom she thought sleeping soundly, crept into the room and upon her lap. "Mama, I want to tell you about the Sunday-school lesson. It was about a time when there were no people or trees or rivers or stars—(closing his eyes and waving his hand) when there was nothing, nothing but just God." And we've got something to do, too. We have to write the memory verse on the back of our paper and draw the world, too, with the sun on one side of it and a little moon that looks just like the one the teacher put on the board at really school, when we learned the song that goes this way:

'Oh mother how pretty the moon looks tonight,
She was never so cunning before,
Her two little horns so sharp and so bright,—
I hope they won't grow any more."

"What is the memory text you have to write," asked his mother. Why—its about the beginning I think, wait a minute, hesitatingly, "Well, it's the very first verse of the very first chapter in the Bible," said he, reaching for the book that lay on the table. Laborously and with his mother's help he spelled out and committed the words: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." And the evening and the morning were the first day.

Our Church Men

By John Ray Ewers

Our Greatest Men's Class

Walter Scott Cook.

At Nelsonville, Ohio, we have, probably, the biggest Men's Class in the brotherhood. If there is any bigger one let the report be sent in and we will be glad to give it space for 1000 words. But this class has something more than size, it has quality. It is large and good. You will be helped by reading about it.—J. R. E.

Mr. Ewers, has asked me to write a short article sketching the developement and methods of what has now come to be one of the largest Men's Bible classes in the brotherhood. Hoping that by so doing other classes of like proportions might be organized and developed, I have consented.

About three years and a half ago when I entered for the first time in this school, as I remember, there were just two men and one young man in attendance besides those who were teaching and officering the school. It was about six months after this that it was decided to organize out of the Bible class two classes, a men's class and a women's. The old teacher who was doing very efficient work took the women and has since built that up to an enrollment of considerably over 100 and R. A. Doan took up the problem of the men. The results of this division have proven its wisdom as now we have enrolled in this class over 250.

The first session of the class was held on November 11, 1906. After a hard week's work for charter members eleven men responded. From that small beginning the growth has been steady. The first year brought the average attendance up to about 25, the next to about 40 and last year, during the last half of the year, it has averaged considerably over 100. The highest attendance so far is 157.

The class has been a liberal contributor to the regular funds of the School and besides has put in a fine art glass window in the new church at a cost of $175 and has a pledge of $100 to the building fund nearly paid. It has given liberally to class benevolences and to social features and advertising besides this.

No history of the class could be written without acknowledgement of what that modest man who leads it has contributed its success. Mr. Doan is a young business man of the city, the manager of a large brick plant employing over 250 men, is President of the board of directors of the local Y. M. C. A. is an elder and president of the board in the church and interested in almost every movement for the moral or religious uplift of the town. He is an exceedingly busy man. If any one could have as an excuse for not undertaking such a work, he more. He has simply made a place in his affairs for this class. He tells me he thinks about it by day and dreams about it by night. He has simply turned that ability of his which has made him a success in business to the work of this class and it has succeeded. He thinks there is nothing of more importance that he ought to do. If I read him aright, he has found more joy in this than he ever has in the other. The moral is easy for some like man who may chance to read.

The class is well organized. There are also four leaders of Divisions into which the class is divided for the purpose of more effective personal work among the members. Four committees, Devotional, Social, Membership and Relief, attend to the duties which their names suggest. The class meets with the main school at the regular Sunday School hour, 9:30 Sunday morning and go to a separate room for their session. The teaching is lecture and question method combined. The atmosphere of the class is kept easy and free so that any man will feel free to "speak out in meetin' " if he so desires. Many do and often warm discussions are started. These are handled carefully and prove very helpful. Supplemental work to a certain extent is done. If you were to enter the class you might almost any morning hear the men repeating the books of the Bible or its divisions or naming the authors of various books. The men like this feature. The Bible is taught. No other inducement is held out to any man to attend the class. The plain, straightforward truth is spoken to them with it as the ultimate authority. No man so far as I know has ever been offended by this method. Fifty percent of the men are not professing Christians but they like this feature mos of all.

The men of the class are great workers. One man last Sunday before he had his breakfast went out and awakened eight men who had told him the week before that they could not waken in time to get to Sunday School as their excuse for not going. After he had eaten his breakfast he went back after them and brought them with him. It was this same man who after the men had been enjoying a banquet at which more than 160 of them had sat down, went out to the kitchen where the good women of the women's class were, who had served the banquet for them, and asked for some "turkey bones." When asked what he wanted to do with them he said—"put them in paper sacks and throw them into the doors of those men whom he had been trying to induce to join the class as further argument why they ought to do so". Other men are as fertile in plans as he. They say that they have learned this—that there is no man who is "impossible." The most unlikely man may be the very one who will respond to the invitation. Every sunday you can hear this remark frequently—Who do you suppose was at Sunday School today? Mr. So and So!" Many men who have neither attended Sunday School nor Church for 25 years are now regular attendants. Others who have not attended for 40 or 45 years. Men of all religious creeds and of all kind of past habits are enthusiastic workers in the class. Already many have united with the church. Doubtless many more will do so in the future.

A "labor train" leaves the town every morning at five o'clock. Many of the men ride this train to work. The road bed is very rough. The profanity on the train has often been enough to make one shudder as the train would sway and bounce over these rough places. Some copies of the Centennial music which Mr. Doan had brought back with him recently di-appeared. One of the men "fessed up" and said that he had taken them and now the men on that "labor train" were singing those songs as they went out to their work early in the morning.

One of the members of the class died recently. About a hundred of the men turned out in a body and did the honors that a secret society usually does. It will not be soon forgotten here in town. If there are any sick they are regularly visited and if in need aided. A regular fund is provided for this. There is but one secret to it all. That is WORK. Contest methods have been used some. However back of it all has been work and prayer. It's influence has been felt throughout the whole church. The School has grown from an average attendance of about 200 to over 500. The percent of men who attend the regular services of the church have greatly increased. The preacher's heart has been made glad. I trust that this short sketch of their work may pass on the blessing.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Misconception

In the Christian Century for December 2, A. B. Jones professes to find various ulterior motives, including a covert attack on Bethany College, in a college story written by me and published in August last. It is scarcely necessary to say that nothing was further from my thought than any such attack. I supposed that such suspicions and prejudices as seem to have been awakened in Mr. Jones' mind were a thing of the past.

The story was as nearly a verbatim report of the recollections of the only survivor of the class as I could make it. Nothing of my personal opinion entered into it. I had so high regard for the integrity and fairness of my informant that I did not think to question her version of the matter. It is certainly true, however, that widely different views of the same incident may prevail, and all parties be conscientious in their contrasting beliefs. I regarded the incident as of interest chiefly in showing the lengths to which political prejudice might go, and regarded its apparent inconsistencies as due to this. Political feeling was then at white heat, and it is not to be wondered at that the Bethany faculty was affected by it, as was every one else North and South.

Hereford, Tex. JASPER T. MOSES.

Dear Brother Morrison. I cannot refrain from writing a line or two in regard to the merit of The Chistian Century. Good as it has ever been, it seems now to be surpassing itself in respect to moral tone and literary finish. I am surprised at the freshness and force of the articles. What a delightful thing it is to escape the commonplaces of the mediocre! You must feel proud of your coöperators. With prudent editing I do not see why you should not occupy a conspicuous place in the van of thought. God bless you, and may your prayer be, "Lead Kindly Light." There are so many elevating truths to treat—so much good comment needed—so many brave hearts to cheer on in their Christian pilgrimage. I am sure you must feel happy in conducting your spirited and informing journal. Again, God bless you.

Kansas City, Mo. J. W. MONSER.

(We have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with Mr. Monser, but in our parental home we were taught to regard his name as one to be held in highest honor for the sake of his personal worth and his uplifting work among the Disciples. Words like his, of which we are these days receiving a portion much beyond our merit, inspire and humble us in our task and make it seem immensely worth while.—C. C. M.)

The Summons of the Star

By Alice E. Hanscom.

Across dim spaces of the orient world they moved
In steadfast, stately fashion, as behooved
An embassy departing under token high—
The vision of a new King's star-sign in the sky.
Musing, no doubt, the splendor of their quest,
But onward, onward, ever toward the west,
Rode Melchior, Gaspar, Balthazar,
Obedient to the summons of the star.

And true to gracious custom of their age and race,
When brought at length before the new King's face,
A princely tribute from the province strange and far
Bore witness to their faith in King and Star.
Gold, as became his royal eminence,
For worship's sign, the gift of frankincense,
Whose mounting cloud seems adoration's breath;
And bitter myrrh wherewith to sweeten death.

That Christmas Dinner

Frank H. Sweet.

Jericho Bob, when he was four years old, hoped that one day he might be allowed to eat as much turkey as he possibly could. He was eight now, but that hope had not been realized.

Mrs. Jericho Bob, his mother, kept hens for a living, and she expected that they would lay enough eggs in the course of time to help her son to an independent career as a bootblack.

They lived in a tumbledown house in a waste of land near the steam cars, and besides her hens Mrs. Bob owned a goat.

Our story has, however, nothing to do with the goat except to say he was there, and that he was on nibbling terms not only with Jericho Bob but with Bob's bosom friend, Julius Caesar Fish, and it was surprising how many old hat-brims and other tidbits of clothing he could swallow during the day.

As Mrs. Bob truly said, it was no earthly use to get something new for Jericho, even if she could afford it; for the goat browsed all over him, and had been known to carry away even a leg of his trousers.

Jericho Bob was eight years old, and the friend of his bosom, Julius Caesar Fish, was nine. They were both black and jolly; the hardest whipping did not disturb the even cheerfulness of their spirits. They were so much alike that if it hadn't been for Jericho's bowlegs and his turned-up nose, you really could not have told them apart. A kindred taste for turkey also united them.

In honor of Christmas day Mrs. Bob always sacrificed a hen which would but for such blessed release have died of old age. One drumstick was given to Jericho, whose interior remained an unsatisfied void.

Jericho Bob had heard of turkey as a fowl larger, sweeter and more tender than hen; and about Christmas time he would linger around the provision stores and gaze with open mouth at the noble array of turkeys hanging head downward over bushels of cranberries, as if even at the uncooked stage they were destined for one another. And turkey was his dream.

It was spring-time, and the hens were being a credit to themselves. The goat in the yard, tied to a stake, was varying a meal of old shoe and tomato-can by a nibble of fresh green grass. Mrs. Bob was laid up with rheumatism.

"Jericho Bob!" she said to her son, shaking her red and yellow turban at him, "Jericho Bob, you go down an' fetch de eggs today. Ef I fin yer don't bring me twenty-three, I'll—well, never mind what I'll do, but yer won't like it."

Now, Jericho Bob meant to be honest, but the fact was he found twenty-four, and the twenty-fourth was so big, so remarkably big. Twenty-three eggs he brought to Mrs. Bob, but the twenty-fourth he sinfully left in charge of the discreet hen.

On his return he met Julius Caesar Fish, with his hands in his pockets and his head extinguished by his grandfather's fur cap. Together they went toward the hen-coop and Julius Caesar Fish spoke, or rather lisped (he had lost some of his teeth):

"Jericho Bobth, tha'th a turkey'th egg."

"Yer don't say so?"

"I think i'th a-goin' ter hatch." No sooner said than they heard a pick and a peck in the shell.

"Pick!" a tiny beak broke through the shell. "Peck!" more beak. "Crack!" a funny little head, a long, bare neck, and then "Pick! Peck! Crack!" before them stood the funniest, fluffiest brown ball resting on two weak little legs.

"Hooray!" shouted the woolly heads.

"Peep!" said the turkeykin.

"It's mine!" Jericho shouted, excitedly.

"I'th Marm Pitkin'th Turkey's; she laid it there."

"t's mine, an' I'm goin' to keep it, an' next Christmas I'm goin' to eat him."

"Think your ma'll let you feed him up for thath?" Julius Caesar asked, triumphantly.

Jericho Bob's next Christmas dinner seemed destined to be a dream. His face fell.

"I'll tell yer whath I'll do," his friend said benevolently; I'll keep 'm for you, and Christmas we'll go halvth."

Jericho resigned himself to the inevitable, and the infant turkey was borne home by his friend.

Fish, Jr, lived next door, and the only difference in the premises was a freight-car permanently switched off before the broken-down fence of the Fish yard; and in this car turkeykin took up his abode.

I will not tell you how he grew and more than realized the hopes of his foster-fathers, nor with what impatience and anticipation they saw spring, summer and autumn pass, while they watched their Christmas dinner stalk proudly up the bare yard, and even hop across the railroad tracks. But, alas, the possession of the turkey brought with it strife and discord. Quarrels arose between the friends as to the prospective disposal of his remains. We grieve to say that the question of who was to cook him led to blows.

It was the day before Christmas. There was a coldness between the friends which was not dispelled by the bringing of a pint of cranberries to the common store by Jericho, and the contributing therto of a couple of cold boiled sweet potatoes by Julius Caesar Fish.

The friends sat on an ancient wash-tub in the back yard, and there was a momentary truce between them. Before them stood the freight car and along the track beyond an occasional train tore down the road, which so far excited their mutual sympathy that they rose and shouted as one man. At the open door of the freight-car stood the unsuspecting turkey, and looked meditatively out on the landscape and at the two figures on the wash-tub. One had bow-legs, a turned-up nose, and a huge straw hat. The other wore a gentleman's swallow-tail coat, with the tails caught up because they were too long. The turkey hopped out of the car and gazed confidingly at his protectors. In point of size he was altogether their superior.

"I think," said Jericho Bob, "we'd better ketch 'im; to-morrer's Christmas. Yum!"

And he looked with great joy at the innocent and unsuspecting fowl.

"Butcher Tham 'th goin' ter gill 'im for uth," Julius Caesar hastened to say, "an' I kin cook 'im."

"No, you ain't. I'm goin' to cook 'im," Jericho Bob cried, resentfully. "He's mine."

"He ain'th; he'th mine."

"He was my egg," and Jericho Bob danced defiance at his friend.

The turkey looked on with some surprise, and he became alarmed when he saw his foster-fathers clasped in an embrace more of anger than of love.

"I'll eat him all alone!" Jericho Bob cried.

"No, yer sha' n't!" the other shouted.

The turkey shrieked in terror, and fled in a circle about the yard.

"Now, look here," said Julius Caesar, who had conquered. "We're goin' to be squar'. He wath your egg, but who brought 'im up? We! Who'th got a friend to kill 'im? Me! Now you git up an' we'll ketch him. Ef you thay another word about your egg I'll jeth eat 'im up all mythelf."

Jericho Bob was conquered. With mutual understanding their approached the turkey.

"Come yere; come yere," Julius Caesar said, coaxingly.

For a moment the bird gazed at both, uncertain what to do.

"Come yere," Julius Caesar repeated, and made a dive for him. The turkey spread his tail. Oh, didn't he run!

"Now I've got yer!" the wicked Jericho Bob cried, and thought he had captured the fowl ;when with a shriek from Jericho Bob, as the turkey knocked him over, the Christmas dinner spread his wings, rose in the air, and alighted on the roof of the freight-car. The turkey looked down over the edge of the car at his enemies, and they gazed up at him. Both parties surveyed the situation.

"We've got 'im," Julius Caesar cried at last, exultantly. "You git on the roof, an' ef you don't kitch 'im up thar, I'll kitch 'im down yere."

With the help of the wash-tub, an old chair, Julius Caesar's back, and much scrambling, Jericho Bob was hoisted on top of the car. The turkey was stalking solemnly up and down the roof with tail and wings half spread.

"I've got yer now," Jericho Bob said, creeping softly after him. "I've got yer now, sure," he was just repeating, when with a deafening roar the express train for New York came tearing down the road.

For what impossible reason it slowed up on approaching the freight car nobody ever knew but the fact remains that it did, just as Jericho Bob laid his wicked black paw on the turkey's tail.

The turkey shrieked, spread his wings, shook the small black boy's grasp from his tail, and with a mighty swoop alighted on the roof of the very last car as it passed; and in a moment more Jericho Bob's Christmas dinner had vanished, like a beautiful dream, down the road!

What became of that Christmas dinner no one ever knew. If you happen to meet a travelling turkey without any lug age, but with a smile on his countenance, please send word to Jericho Bob. Every evening he and Juilus Caesar Fish stand by the broken down fence and look up and down the road, as if they expected some one.

Jericho Bob has a turned up nose and bow-legs. Julius Caesar still wears his dress-coat, and both are watching for a Christmas dinner that ran away.

CHRISTMAS NOVELTIES AND NOTIONS

BY CHARLOTTE BREWSTER JORDAN

Cheese Dates.

Remove the seeds from nice, large dates,
And in the cavities
Place daintily a little bit
Of Neufchatel, light cheese.
The press the dates together well;
With salad they will please,
Or heaped in some fine cut-glass dish,
At Christmas jubilees.

Ginger Tangs.

Take stem ginger,—or crystallized,—
Whole pieces work the best.
When cut in halves, scoop out inside
And fill—to give them zest—
With good, soft cheese,—its rim outside
The halves together pressed.
Their snap, so modified, is sure
To please each grateful guest.

Red-Apple Salad.

Select large apples rosy-red,
All uniform in size,
Scoop out in cups, in water stand
In wich, some cooks advise

A little lemon-juice be put
Until it's time to fill.
Mix celery snips with apple chips
And grape-fruit bits at will.

Fill up the hollow apples now
With the mixed fruit galore,
And a stiff, golden mayonnaise
Over medley pour.

Place apples each on separate plate
On leaves of lettuce green,
With maraschino cherries red
Well stuffed with nuts between.

Serve with this cheery salad course
Thin wafers spread with cheese
With catsup mixed until its hue
Is ruddy as you please.

Christmas Wassail.

Three large, fine-flavored apples core;
And slowly bake until well done.
Then put the pulp in punch-bowl gay
With a teaspoonful of cinnamon,

With lemon bits, half teaspoon each
Of grated nutmeg, cloves, allspice;
Mix well together, pour o'er all
Three pints of boiling cider nice.

Serve hot with sugared doughnuts round
As wind-up for the merry feast,
Good health then wish the company,
"With every joy increased."

The Prophet of the Portal

By Professor Willett

The coming of Jesus into the life of the world was a simple and insignificant event, as men count the facts of history. And yet for his coming the most ample preparations had been made, both in the life of the outer world and in the history of the Jewish people. National history had not brought satisfaction to any people in the long roster of the nations. Light was expected from some other source. The best efforts men could make to find out some truer knowledge of God were in themselves preparations for his more intimate disclosures of divine truth. In Jewish history the prophets had labored not unsuccessfully to secure a more spiritual attitude, and had insisted that the nation could only make good by learning to love righteousness and to walk humbly with God. These were difficult lessons to learn, and the Jewish people for the most part preferred to listen to those voices that promised them the spectacular career of military success and political triumph. They wanted a Messiah, but they insisted that he must be a leader who could bring to them their coveted possessions of world power and freedom.

The Hour of Destiny.

The immediate preparation for the ministry of Jesus lay in the renewal of prophetic instruction by John the baptizer. In him the ancient prophets spoke again. He belonged to a Levite family, and as the son of the priest Zacharius he had enjoyed all the educational advantages of the age. He was related to Jesus' mother, and had probably met Jesus himself in the course of the years before the beginning of their public ministry. John had brooded long over the prophetic words of earlier days. His hopes centered in the coming of One greater than himself, who could realize for the people those ideals which he saw to be essential to their true life. The Roman occupation of Palestine had developed all the unfortunate characteristics which war produces in the life of any people. The tyranny of tax collectors was pitiless and grinding. The Herods, a foreign family who had secured the rule in Palestine through their service in the Roman armies, were a degraded and conscienceless dynasty, combining luxury, cruelty and degraded lives. The people who looked on were brutalized and easily misled into imitation of their masters, as far as they were capable of such imitation.

The New Voice.

As a protest against this state of affairs the ecclesiastical parties among the Jews laid extravagant emphasis upon two phases of religious observance. The Sadducees, the descendants of the famous Maccabean rulers, held the priesthood and owned the rich temple franchises. They were, of course, scrupulous adherents of the ritual. The Pharisees, on the other hand, emphasized the legalistic spirit which had developed in the later Judaism, and were intent upon a multitude of small observances which had no bearing upon the development of character. It was into this unhappy combination of circumstances that John, prepared by his early education and the long years of brooding he had spent in desert retirement, suddenly thrust himself, demanding a total reconstruction of life on the part of all the people.

John's Message.

Partly because his own inclinations led him to avoid the centers of population, and partly because he could secure a less interrupted hearing there, his ministry lay in the Jordan valley. It was of course a region easily accessible from all parts of the small country of Palestine. And he had not been preaching long when public attention was attracted to him in unusual degree. His message was stern and uncompromising. Of all classes, soldiers, priests, religious teachers and common people, he alike demanded such repentance as recognized the sin of their present indifference to the will of God, and implied a whole-hearted resolution to conform to higher ideals of conduct. He conceived himself to be the representative of prophecy. In his own work he believed himself to be fulfilling the promises of the past. He skilfully adapted the words spoken by the prophet of the exile to the dispersed Hebrews in Babylon regarding the necessity of preparing in the wilderness a highway for God (Isa. 40:4). Things must be taken out of the divine way. Obstacles must be removed, valleys filled in and mountains leveled, so that God could come back to his own, as ancient Israel was promised its return to Jerusalem.

The Rite of Washing.

The appearance of the preacher was striking. He had the rough raiment worn by the desert travelers, woven out of camel's hair. It was gathered about his loins with a leathern girdle. His fare was the wild food of the wilderness. He was distinctly the sensation of the hour, and the people went out by thousands to listen to his stirring and compelling words. To make more impressive his call to the life of repentance, he employed the rite of baptism, signifying by this initiation that the way was being prepared for a new order of society, to which only those who passed through the process of amendment and baptism were eligible. Baptism was not a new custom. The Jews had long been used to the practise of initiating Gentiles into their synagogue communities by the observance of three acts—circumcision, washing in water, and the temple sacrifices. John chose the one of these three acts which was most descriptive of the cleasing process connected with the new life. And this easily became the recognized badge of the new group which rapidly developed into the community of believers not only in the message of John, but in that of Jesus as well.

Words of Warning.

In his preaching he was uncompromising in denunciation of the popular sins, and among them he recognized the pride and ostentation of the religious leaders as easily chief. His words were terrific in their scathing rebuke. He asked the Pharisees and Sadducees why they thought it worth while to come to hear him. He called them children of serpents, and warned them that it was useless for them to claim any advantage from their birth as Jews, because God could raise up out of the stones of the desert better children of Abraham than they were. He told them that the Woodsman was at that very instant stripping off his garments that he might seize his ax, lying at the root of the fruitless tree of Judaism, to fell it to the ground. And when they marvelled at such words of denunciation and warning, he told them that they had not heard the half of what might be said, for after him was coming One who was to pause not an instant in the swift work of judgment and retribution that he should undertake. He would cleanse the threshing floor with his great winnowing shovel, and gather into his barn the useful as good grain, burning up the chaff with quenchless fire. Such words of warning were needed by the generation to which Jesus came.

Through This Year with God

By W. D. Endres.

It was a daring thing for the Israelites to throw off the yoke of Egyptian bondage and trust their fortune to the keeping of an untried if not unknown leader. Indeed they never could have been induced to do so but for the previous conviction that in so doing they were but following the will of Jehovah. By faith they were anchored in Him. He was their real leader. "At the commandment of Jehovah the children of Israel journeyed, and at the commandment of Jehovah they encamped." The cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night were indications of the divine will, and "whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, that the cloud tarried . . . . the children of Israel . . . . journeyed not." According to the narrative, from day to day throughout the year they kept constantly before their minds the fact that they were responsible to God. They were moving through strange territory. What the outcome would be they could not know except as they had faith in God.

There is need for this same loyalty still. The Christian Endeavorers are not expected to travel through a wilderness in a strange land. There is no call to repeat the work of the old crusaders. We live in a different, and in a better age. But still there is need. We are called upon to thread our way and lead a life in the wilderness of an intricate and an involved modern civilization. There are tremendous temptations. The opportunity to take money from the cash drawer, to drink, to gamble, to dissipate, to waste time when life is so significant, to squander earnings and possessions, to secure enjoyment and entertainment at the expense of your employer, and your future usefulness—these and nameless others make up the ten thousand pitfalls along life's highway. The only protection which we can rely upon is God. Whether it be "two days, a month, or a year," we must walk with God, all the day and every day. How? Remember that God is, that he is God, that he is just and gentle, sympathetic and loving, that if we would be his worshippers and worship Him in spirit and in truth—that is in reality—we must ever strive to be like Him in the quality of our beings. That this must hold good when we go to our daily task. The discharge of duties in the keeping of the home call for faithfulness. The clerk in the store must be governed by the same ideals. The student who turns to the school room, or the teacher who stands before her class, should ever be conscious that her task is a divine obligation, the results of which she must face again. The laborer who goes to his bench in the shop for his day's work has a sacred task, in the faithful doing of which is pleasing to God. To carry this high sense of our calling in our daily consciousness and to attempt to be true to it, is to "walk with God." The person young or old who does this passes "through this year with God." And with equal force and truth we may add he who fails to thus interpret his life and work does not walk with God.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER V.

A Friend at Court.

Bannister did not waste any time in acting upon the grudging permission to call on Mrs. Crofton he had forced from Eleanor, but availed himself of it the next afternoon, hoping, as goes without saying, to see her daughter as well.

He possessed assurance that was not easily abashed; and Eleanor's coldness only intensified his determination to be restored to her favor. Never had she seemed so alluring as when she had unmistakably repulsed him at the gate. He confidently counted on Mrs. Crofton's forgiveness and good-will. She had never failed him in the past, and he construed it as a favorable omen that she came down stairs with alacrity when his card was sent up.

Mrs. Crofton was thankful that she was dressed in her best gown ready for unexpected visits, which, during commencement week were paid at almost any hour. She had heard of his marriage with great disappointment, for she had always hoped that the disagreement between him and Eleanor might be made up. When she learned that he was free once more, hope revived, and she was ready for whatever might be demanded of her in the difficult role of peacemaker. She had never blamed Bannister; it was Eleanor she had censured for her touchiness and for demanding more loyalty than any ordinary young man is ever disposed to give. If he had returned to reinstate himself with her daughter he might count on her support.

It was in this gracious spirit that she greeted the recreant suitor, extending her white fragile hand and welcoming him in the sweet, refined tones that gave additional meaning to her most ordinary speech, when she was amiably disposed.

Always ready with compliments when his own interests were to be advanced, he said effusively: "How delighted I am to see you so little changed!"

"Don't waste your pretty speeches on an old woman like me!" she smilingly deprecated.

"I see you still have your old exquisite taste in regard to dress!" he gazed with undeniable pleasure at the pretty picture she made in her soft, gray gown with its garniture of rare old yellow lace, pressing into her hand as he spoke a superb bouquet of roses. Assuming the freedom of an old friend, he looked about the room and said approvingly:

"How cozy! How charming all this is! It must be a great relief to be rid of the trouble of keeping up the old place."

It was not quite the speech that a man of real delicacy would have made, but Hrs. Crofton overlooked it, being especially predisposed to judge Bannister with extreme leniency.

They fell into discussions of the happenings in the old families; the births, deaths and marriages, and the inevitable changes in the fortunes of many; as if Bannister had left Carlinville and returned as any ordinary friend might have done.

He waited, listening between Mrs. Crofton's platitudes, for the sound of Eleanor's footsteps; but she did not come. He had not asked for her at first, thinking it prudent to wait. Mrs. Crofton, on her part, also exercised some diplomacy, and did not introduce her daughter's name. If Bannister had hoped to see Eleanor, as she suspected, a little disappointment at this juncture would be salutary in its effects.

At length he grew tired of waiting and bluntly asked: "Is your daughter at home, Mrs. Crofton?"

"I'm so sorry!" she replied in her gentlest tones, "but she has gone to take my card to some old friends who are here to attend commencement, whom I'm not able to visit in person. I see so few people these days, and must delegate my dear girl to perform such duties for me."

He expressed regrets that were more sincere than such sentiments from him usually were, and Mrs. Crofton's explanation had the effect of hurrying the departure.

While taking his leave he asked humbly: "May I come again? And please remember me to Eleanor—Miss Crofton—and say how sorry I am to have missed her."

"I'm sure that my daughter will be disappointed," said Mrs. Crofton, fully aware that this statement could hardly be taken literally. "She told me of having met you, and of having given you permision to come to see —us."

"Yes; so very good of her!" he murmured.

This, too, was rather an unlucky speech, and both reflected instantly that, considering the circumstances which had separated them, it was more than goodness; it was magnanimity—or indifference—of which few women would have been capable.

Bannister was somewhat flurried when he took his leave—an unusual thing for him. Mrs. Crofton was uncomfortable, and in consequence, out of temper; and when Eleanor returned, tired and overheated from her long walk, reproved her sharply for staying so long, forgetting as usual that she had gone at her request, and that it had been an errand which could not be dispatched without due ceremony.

Eleanor made no reply to her mother's complaints, but when she saw the roses that Bannister had brought she uttered an exclamation of delight.

Mrs. Crofton made no explanation; if Eleanor wished to know where they came from she must ask. This she did, inhaling their fragrance in deep rejoicing breaths:

"Where did you get them?"

"Mr. Bannister's been here and brought them to me."

Eleanor laid the roses down instantly, and gathering her parasol and card-case, started to her own room, saying coldly:

"I will have Ann put them in water, and set them on the table in your room where you can enjoy them."

It was evident that she was not disposed to do it herself, she who performed all such tasks for her mother, gladly and with her own hands. The significance of her refusal was perfectly clear to Mrs. Crofton, but it was a crisis where silence was golden.

Bannister made his speech at the alumni banquet on Tuesday evening. Rhetorically it was fairly creditable, as Brainard readily admitted. But it was the open bid of the place hunter; full of political cant, superficially brilliant, and palpably insincere.

As he listened Brainard set his lips firmly, and said to himself: "The typical henchman—the statesman of the republic who succeeds today. God save the mark!"

The commencement season always closed with the President's reception, a solemn function that Abigail Brainard never missed, and to which her brother patiently accompanied her. As a matter of some importance connected with Eleanor's affairs had come up during the day, about which it was necessary to consult her at once, Brainard proposed that they call on their way to the reception. They set out almost immediately after their late tea, in the [illegible] had recently given his sister.

Miss Abigail presented a living example of mental and spiritual serenity and of temporal prosperity, arrayed in a new gown of pale gray satin, with a collar of fine point lace; gloves and fan were in keeping. She felt that she was never in better form to pass muster under the critical eyes of Mrs. Crofton. But her kind heart made her fear her finery might wound a [illegible] spared herself any such scruples for Mrs. Crofton under all conditions would have considered herself the [illegible] Brainard.

When they arrived they found Eleanor seated on a low chair on the porch, reading, and so absorbed in her book that she did not look up until the phaeton [illegible]

She rose to greet them [illegible] prise noted that, in evening dress, Brainard was strikingly handsome. He almost immediately stated his [illegible] that Mrs. Crofton was not present. After the matter was settled they could not leave at once, and Miss Abigail [illegible] Brainard was seized with an uncomfortable consciousness of having in some measure usurped Eleanor's [illegible] and necessitating this painfully altered mode of living. He grew silent and abstracted, and made no effort to stem the tide of Miss Abigail's volubility.

Presently, with an effort, he joined the conversation, talking easily and well. While thus pleasantly occupied Bannister arrived, and Eleanor rose to greet him, with a momentary annoyance she was not able to conceal. He had known Miss Abigail slightly, and now he expressed his pleasure at seeing her again.

"I am so delighted to come back to the old town once more!" he said blandly.

"Yes; I've heard many others say the same thing," she replied primly.

"It's strange how it holds one, in spite of the new ties one must form elsewhere!"

"I can't speak as to that: I've always lived here, and don't break old ties!" This was a sharp dart Miss Abigail could not refrain from flinging.

"You're as loyal as your brother to your town!"

"He has every reason to be; he has done his best for the town, and they have appreciated him!" she observed curtly.

Brainard, who was listening to Eleanor, turned at this to remonstrate gently: "I think that opinion would better be expressed by some one else."

"Perhaps so! But I consider myself quite competent to speak on that point!" she persisted stubbornly. "I know it's true!"

"No doubt!" Bannister replied quickly. "But in spite of your opinion, which I regret to dispute—Brainard is not altogether satisfied with Carlinville."

Brainard looked at him questioningly, a trifle embarassed.

"I suspect from what I've heard," continued Bannister, "that he deplores the passing of the coonskin cap and the puncheon floor."

Brainard smiled at this gibe, referring to his lack of the "progressive spirit," but did not trouble himself to deny it.

"I've heard that Judge Brainard thinks we've fallen on evil days—he does not believe in modern methods in courts, or improvements, or progress of any sort!"

Miss Abigail was about to utter an indignant protest when Brainard himself spoke, with increased indifference.

Church Life

A few of the preachers have already sent us the brief outlines of their Christmas sermons. Let many others respond at once.

Do not neglect to read the announcement of the Bethany Graded System of Lessons, made in this week's issue of The Christian Century. Many inquiries are being received about these lessons each day. They meet the present needs of the school as no others do.

And the reports of your annual meetings. Send them to us, preachers, and we shall incorporate them in the symposium which we shall publish early in January. Some reports have already come to our desk. If you are too busy to write a special copy for us, then send a corrected copy of your report as it appears in your church paper, or the local paper of your city.

Responses of satisfaction in our announcement last week of our purpose to conduct a department to be known as "The Daily Altar" have already begun to come to our office. Among others William Ross Lloyd of Bellevue, Pa., exhorts us to "push the daily family worship movement and when you have succeeded you will have accomplished the biggest thing in the world today." The department will appear in our next issue and cover the first eight days of the new year. It is our earnest wish that it may prove a source of blessing in many households.

Many of the preachers are responding to the request of the editors that they send us copies of their church calendar. From these we are gleaning many suggestions which we can publish and thus let the ideas of these men become the property of the entire body of preachers. The news department of a Christian weekly has a real function to perform but it is the thought of the editors of The Christian Century that in this its work should not be allowed to degenerate into a mere medium of gossip. The preachers of our churches can help us fulfill this nobler function of the paper.

THE OLD AND THE NEW.

There are times, like the closing of a year, which God seems to set us for the taking of inventories. At such times we find much in possession that we are glad to part withal. Some things we will not lightly lose—old Friends, old Memories, and old Convictions. But to replace the things that pass, God gives a richer dower—new Visions, new Hopes, new Confidence and the opportunities of a New Year.

Herbert L. Willett.

The first service in the beautiful new church building at Muskogee, Okla. was held December 5. The entire building cost about $25,000. The announcement has just come to hand that W. J. Wright, secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, will, "while trying to decide wisely the question of a pastorate," do evangelistic work and dedicate churches, after January 1, 1910. Arthur Holmes, Ph. D., Professor of Psychology in the University of Pennsylvania, spoke at Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., on a recent Sunday evening. His subject was: "The Conversion of Boys and Girls." The favorable impression made by Mr. Holmes' address at the Centennial convention, has opened to him the doors of all our more progressive churches, and by such visits as this to Richmond he will accomplish great good beyond his University work.

The church at Sheldon, Iowa, has just closed a successful meeting. W. C. Cole and wife, Goldfield, Iowa, were the evangelists. Mr. Cole's sermons are characterized as "soul searching," and Mrs. Cole's singing and personal work are highly recommended by the pastor I. T. Underwood. There were twenty-six accessions to the church, among them a young man in the high school, who will enter Drake University to prepare for the ministry. The church has published Mr. Cole's sermon on "The Church of the First Century,' and will put it into every home in Sheldon.

I. J. Cahill's meeting with the church at Kirksville, Mo., lasted four weeks. It rained almost every night during the meeting, but the audiences were good, and there were fifty additions to the church. Mr. Cahill's work was of high rank, and commanded the respect of the intelligence of the city. A local paper says: "Mr. Cahill's sermons are strong and go to the heart. His meeting was a decided moral uplift to the city, whose people regret to see him leave them." For such evangelism there is ever room in our best churches.

The Independence Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo., is now assured of their new Sunday-school building, made possible by R. A. Long, upon the condition that the Sunday-school have an average attendance during the last four months of the year, of 1,000. The attendance was much greater than this . Plans are now about complete for a three story structure which will extend the entire length of the lot, and will include a young mens hall and Sunday-school class rooms.

LeRoy M. Anderson, pastor of the church at Horney Grove, Texas, is preaching the following series of Sunday evening sermons to men: "The Making of a Man the Crowning of History;" "Man and His Strength, Your self your Own Opportunity;" "Man and His Name, Yardsticks to Measure Life." "Man and his God. The Great Conclusion." The sermons are skillfully announced, and the pastor writes that the meetings are accomplishing the things which he purposed in them.

F. B. Thomas has decided to close his ministry with the church at Kansas, Ill., the first of next March. When Mr. Thomas went to this church three years ago, there were 170 members in the congregation and only a small frame building. The present membership is 400, a new $2,500 brick church has been erected, and the Sunday School enrollment is 350; the prayer meetings have an attendance of from seventy-five to 100. The church is paying a salary of $1200 and parsonage. Mr. Thomas has not yet definitely arranged for his future work.

Edward E. Cowperthwaite desires to do some evangelistic work if the way is open. He will be assisted by his wife. He is well known to many in our ranks as an able minister of the Word, and has splendid social qualities and a consecrated life to commend him. He has been in the employ of the American Christian Missionary Society for some years, is a good speaker, and we can most cordially wish for him a warm reception on the part of the brotherhood. He may be addressed at River Edge, N. J. Men like Z. T. Sweeney, S. M. Martin, B. S. Ferrall and W. J. Wright all commend him.

The meeting which has been in progress at the First Church, Nevada, Mo., closed Wednesday evening, November 25. The last Sunday of the meeting, unusually large audiences greeted the pastor, W. W. Burks. During the afternoon a Junior Endeavor Society was organized with Mesdames Ed. Green and J. H. Beeney as superintendents. The following Thursday evening a reception was given to the new members of the church. During the service the pastor announced that each new member would be presented with a copy of the "rules of faith and practice of the church." Thereupon, each one was handed a copy of the New Testament.

The Hebrew Mission, at the Humboldt St. Church, New York, under the leadership of H. Sandler (a Russian Jew), is making good progress. At the meeting Saturday, November 20, a Russian Jew and his wife were buried with their Lord in baptism. This church is pushing the work of raising the money to erect their Mission Hall. Their enterprise should receive the help of all interested in giving the gospel to the foreigners. It is impossible to do the work needed until a suitable equipment is provided. If the friends of this work would rally to its aid this building could be erected in the very near future.

The Brazil (Ind.) Daily News, November 22, announces the resignation of E. L. Day, for more than eight years pastor of the Christian Church in that city. Mr. Day has been called to serve the church at Noblesville Ind., and will probably accept. When Mr. Day went to Brazil eight years ago a new church had just been completed. In February, 1907, this was destroyed by fire, and upon the ruins the church erected the present large and beautiful building. Mr. Day has built up the membership of the church and the Sunday-school, and leaves the church free from debt, and in excellent working condition. He will close his work the last Sunday in December.

The resignation of I. J. Cahill, after a pastorate of thirteen years in Dayton, Ohio, has received deserved notice in all the papers of the brotherhood. Some facts gleaned from a personal acquaintance with that work deserve further mention. In the thirteen years Mr. Cahill has accomplished a few very definite and valuable ends. An oppressive debt has been removed and the property made secure, which was no assured result thirteen years ago. A second church, indebted to Mr. Cahill for its inception and support, is now well established. Funds are now in hand for the purchase of a pipe organ for the church. The standing of the church in the city and its power for righteousness is well known. Such definite results attained speak eloquently of the leadership of the retiring pastor.

The Christian ministers of St. Louis at their last weekly meeting expressed great confidence in G. E. Ireland, and asked that his services as city evangelist be continued at least for another year, believing that any change now would be a serious detriment to our work. Mr. Ireland has recently offered his resignation, to take effect at the next annual meeting of the City Mission Board in January. During his eight years' residence in St. Louis that he and his wife have shown untiring energy and unselfish devotion and unvarying Christian courtesy and a consistent Christian character, is the testimony of these resolutions. Under his administration no less than four churches have resulted.

The church building at El Paso, Texas, where Perry J. Rice is pastor, has been thoroughly renovated. The basement is being remodeled to provide accommodations for the Sounday-school and social meetings. A payment of $500 and interest has been made on the church debt. The church, led by one man who gave his check for $50, is establishing a fellowship fund, to be used in ministering to the needy. Good audiences are greeting Mr. Rice; there are frequent additions to the church and every condition seems most encouraging.

As We Go to Press

Little Rock, Ark., Dec. 19.—We are reaping the harvest of four score years of sowing and tears. The Lord of the Harvest is blessing us. Scoville is the greatest harvester I have ever known; 334 in three weeks. We have only begun. Fifty-eighty today.—J. N. Jessup.

Peoria, Ill., Dec. 18.—Again God has blessed Thompson, the evangelist, in face of absolute failure from stormy weather, and stolid indifference. He has done the almost impossible and victory is ours. Difficulties seem to inspire him. The money side is the easiest part, souls are being added, church strengthened. We continue.—J. W. Camp, Minister.

Mitchell, Ind., Dec. 19.—Great meeting in progress; Rufus A. Finnell, Wheeling, W. Va., a true evangelist with remarkable teaching and persuasive powers, and no claptrap methods. Great crowds and twenty-one added this week in difficult field. One opposition meeting in progress. Finnell has open date for February.—Rolla James Bennett, Minister.

THE PRAYER-MEETING TOPICS.

The following letter is a side light upon the report of the prayer-meeting committee which was already in press when Mr. Stauffer's explanation was received.—Editors.

Editors Christian Century:—I am just in receipt of the information that the prayer-meeting committee appointed at Pittsburg was not to prepare topics for next year, but for the year 1911. This is all a surprise to me. To find myself at the head of a committee which has actually finished its work a year in advance,—that invests me with such a sense of virtue as to quench all humility. The only thing I can think to do, under the circumstances, is to go out behind the Angola manse, and laugh! Perhaps you would better return the report of the committee to me, so that I may preserve it with care, lest it grow over-yellow with age, ere it shall be needed. With feigned solemnity, I remain, Anachronistically yours,

VERNON STAUFFER.

The Congress of the Disciples

The 1910 Congress of the Disciples will be held at Bloomington, Indiana. The exact date of the Congress has not been determined, but it will be in the spring, either the last week in March or the first in April. The program is practically all arranged and will be published in a few weeks. No congress was held this year for two reasons. In the first place the committee thought best not to divert attention in any way from the Centennial Celebration. The second reason for not having a congress was that we had practically had two congresses last year, our own in the spring and the joint congress of Baptists and Disciples in Chicago last fall. I have received a number of inquiries in regard to the relation of these two congresses to each other. In reply to all these I will say that a joint committee of Baptists and Disciples was appointed at the Chicago meeting to report upon the advisability of merging the two organizations into one; or if not, that of their holding joint meetings and if so, how often. Some favored the merging of the two congresses; others thought it best to hold biennial joint meetings and on the other alternate years, each body hold its own meeting. These two plans were proposed at the Chicago meeting and the matter was referred to the above committee, which will report to our congress at Bloomington. Those Disciples, who attended the Chicago meeting, became annual members of the Baptist Congress by paying the annual membership dues at that meeting. Dr. Matheson, secretary of the Baptist Congress, sent out notices a few months ago to all those Disciples, giving them the opportunity of paying their dues for the year 1909 and continuing annual members of their organization. Some have done this others have written asking me what they should do. Accompanying these notices from Dr. Mattheson was the following statement. "The Union movement has made very unequal progress. With the Free Baptists, who had no Congress of their own, it has been practically accomplished. Some of their leading men have become members of "The Baptist Congress" and we expect many more to do so during the coming year. The fact that the Disciples have a Congress of their own, has made the problem of union with them more difficult; and although there appears to be among them a strong sentiment favorable to a union congress, no real progress has been made toward effecting it. Even more of them, however, than of the Free Baptists have personally identified themselves with the Congress and will doubtless continue their fellowship so long, at least, as the proposition for union still pends with the prospect of satisfactory solution."

It will be seen from this statement that Dr. Mattheson's purpose in sending the notices to our men was simply to afford them an opportunity of continuing their fellowship, if they desired, pending the solution of the question of permanent union. I am sure it will not be considered a discourtesy or evidence of indifference to the matter if our ministers do not continue their annual membership in the Baptist Congress this year. On the other hand those who continue their membership, do so as an expression of good will and encouragement of a closer union of the two bodies.

Cedar Rapids, Ia. C. B. VAN ARSDALL, Secretary.

Ohio State Secretary Resigns

At the December meeting of the Board of Managers of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society, H. Newton Miller offered his resignation as corresponding secretary, and has accepted a unanimous call to become pastor of the Broad St. Church at Columbus, Ohio. He had entertained no intention of severing his official connection with the state work in the immediate future, and had taken no steps whatever looking to that end. However, when the Columbus committee approached him unexpectedly and without solicitation, he felt justified in taking the matter under advisement, and finally after most careful deliberation decided to offer his resignation, the same to take effect immediately following the Toledo Convention in May. This is to give the committee which will be appointed by the state board in advisement with I. J. Cahill, the president of the Ohio Society this year, ample time to select a successor, to be elected by the state convention at the annual meeting in May.

The secretary says that he was not impelled in his decision by a lack of coöperation on the part of pastors or churches or of due appreciation of his efforts in behalf of Ohio missions, for he has everywhere been received with the kindliest spirit and has been shown every Christian courtesy. Nor, has the intimate and delightful fellowship with the state board in laying plans and devising methods for carrying out the same, ever in the slightest degree been endangered, as was fully evidenced by the sentiment expressed when the resignation was presented.

This adjustment will allow the secretary to devote at least half of his time to the state work after assuming the Columbus pastorate, while the presence of Miss Noyes his office secretary, in the office continually will enable him to look after the state interests without detriment to the work.

Southern California

The principal feature of the December meeting of the Christian ministers of Southern California was the farewell reception to state secretary, Rev. Grant K. Lewis, prior to his departure for Cincinnati, as one of the national secretaries of the A. C. M. S.

Two hundred preachers and "laymen" from all over Southern California and Arizona assembled at the First Church, Los Angeles, to do the new national secretary honor and bid him God-speed.

Many and tender were the tributes of affection and appreciation of "our Grant."

Words of highest appreciation were spoken by C. C. Chapman, President of the Evangelizing Board, who thought Mr. Lewis' administrative ability and modesty; J. G. Warren, A. C. Smither, J. N. Smith, and Mrs. Princess Long, all of whom expressed the confidence of the California churches in Mr. Lewis and in the A. C. M. S., under his leadership. In well chosen words the new secretary expressed his appreciation of the confidence and love of his brethren. He said:

We speak of the good old days—the charming graces and courtly ways. —But do we forget that they did not know

The Soda Cracker that is the delight of this day and generation.

Lewis and in the A. C. M. S., under his leadership. In well chosen words the new secretary expressed his appreciation of the confidence and love of his brethren. He said:

"You have had in mind an ideal secretary." "and somehow you imagine I come up to the ideal. I am so glad that I came to Southern California. I owe so much to your co-operation and to the splendid fellowships I have here enjoyed."

Mr. and Mrs. Lewis and son Herbert, will leave for the East about the middle of December. The two daughters have been with relatives in Indiana since the Pittsburg convention.

R. P. Shepherd's paper on "The World's Debt to the Roman Catholics," was a notable production. It expressed larger appreciation of the best that Romanism has done than is usual with Protestants.

Among other things Romanism stands for the sanctity of the home against the divorce evil. It stands for the specific confession of sins. While Catholicism has made too much of the confessional Protestantism has made too little of it.

Mrs. Reba Smith told the preachers about the Japanese Christian home in Los Angeles. The C. W. B. M. of Southern California is raising $30,000 for this home. They already have $12,000 in pledges and hope to raise the other $18,000 this year. For over a year the C. W. B. M. has had in operation a miniature home which has demonstrated the need for a much larger one.

A. C. Smither reported forty-four additions to First Church during the S. M. Martin meeting.

A. K. Wright and the women of Needles have raised $850.00 toward a new church.

E. W. Thornton, the Sunday School man, said the cradle roll at Naomi Avenue started with a "charter membership" of seventy-one.

E. E. Laine and wife of San Bernardino found their house broken into on their return from two months absence in the East. Investigation proved it to be friends who wished to surprise them with a "house warming."

The "Four C.'s," a young men's organization of Central Christian Church, San Diego, won a fine pianola in a recent newspaper voting contest.

L. W. Klinker had sixteen additions, ten baptisms, in a recent short meeting at South Main St.

Leander Lane will take the work at Azusa, following a meeting in which he was assisted by E. H. Kellar.

J. W. Utter of Glendale organized a men's club with an initial membership of thirty.

B. F. Coulter, South Broadway, is delivering a series of sermons on the "Messages to the Seven Churches."

Three splendid churches are in process of construction, Pomona, San Diego, Santa Ana. Yet one member of the Pomona church makes an additional gift of $5,000.00 to the work in Africa. He is already supporting a missionary there.

A. N. Glover is glad to get back to sunny California after a year's absence in snowy Colorado.

The election of George Alexander as mayor of Los Angeles was a decided victory for good government and good morals. It was also a vindication of the "direct primary." The Church Federation and every moral agency gave active support to Mr. Alexander's candidacy.

Prayer Meeting Topics, 1910

The Prayer Meeting Committee begs leave to submit to the brotherhood the following report:

The committee has labored diligently and in the spirit of great yearning to make the prayer meetings in the churches, during the year of grace 1910, as interesting and edifying as possible. The work of the committee has been influenced, and more or less moulded, by the following considerations:

(1) A conviction that the spirit of personal testimony ought to be wooed back into the mid-week service in the churches.

(2) An earnest importunity, coming from many quarters, urging that subjects be chosen which naturally and fairly admit of a larger element of devotional Bible study of a continuous, connected character.

(3) A desire to employ the mid-week service as an Upper Room, in the interests of the growing passion for unity among Christians; and

(4) The conviction that at least now and then through the year the prayer meeting should be, in fact as well as in name, a prayer meeting.

Concerning the report which follows, the committee would call especial attention: (a) to the number and character of the subjects calculated to persuade men and women to speak freely in one another's presence of the experiences of their personal religious lives; (b) the two series of well connected Bible studies, together with extended and, in many instances, numerous Scripture references in connection with other subjects; (c) the group of subjects calculated to cultivate a wholesome spirit of large-mindedness toward our brothers of other communions than our own; and (d), the meetings, distributed through the year, wherein the churches are to be called to unity in prayer. In the spirit of deep solicitude the committee presents its report.

A Business Man's Experience

One of the successful Christian business men of Ohio has made gifts on the Annuity Plan to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, as follows:

September 4, 1897	$ 800.00
September 3, 1898	1,000.00
September 8, 1899	500.00

February 28, 1902	800.00
June 18, 1909	500.00

He writes as follows:

"I am pleased with the Annuity Plan. I have tried it. I get my interest promptly. I save three per cent because I pay no taxes. In placing the money with the Foreign Society, I know where it will go at last."

This good man is now about eighty years of age. He has no care about business and he receives his check from the Foreign Society every six months, and his money is doing great good in the Lord's work.

We will be pleased to have you consider this plan. Better make a gift on our Annuity Plan.

Compensation

The passing of years is like the coming of dawn---slow, silent, inevitable. The most eager cannot hasten the quiet, irresistible movement, and the most reluctant cannot forbid. Some gifts the years bring which we would fain decline ---age, sorrow, disappointment. Some treasures they take which we would keep forever--youth, beauty, innocence. But there are more precious treasures which time cannot supply and the years cannot remove---Friendship, Patience, Faith and Love.

Our Readers' Opinions

Indorsing Mr. Kooser

Editors Christian Century:—I want to say amen to every word of Ernest O. Kooser's "Counter Opinion", on the relation of baptism to Christian union, published in The Christian Century of Dec. 16, Sincerely, Carrizozo, N. M. FRANK J. SAGER.

Editors Christian Century:—I want to heartily commend the course you pursue in the Century of Dec. 16 in giving Bro. Kooser space for his criticism without making it an opportunity for attacking him and his ideas with the editorial pitchfork as is generally done by the men who run religious journals.

If you can stick to this policy of giving the fellows who have reasonable ideas opportunity to express themselves through the Century without being boycotted to death I am sure you will render a great and needed service to true religious progress.

I anticipate a bitter struggle between the vitalists and legalists in this century.

While I, with Bro. Kooser, must differ with you as to making immersion a condition of Christian unity among disciples I gladly express my gratification over your constant maintainance of the supreme value of vital religion. Yours sincerely,

Harrison, Ark. F. M. CUMMINGS.

"The Daily Altar"

Editors Christian Century: Your editorial "The Daily Altar" is a most needed emphasis. I prefer "Family Worship," to "Altar." The latter is hardly the word in history or present meaning. The whole question must be left to the ministry for solution. As long as the ministers at our conventions and rallies, state and county, can and will stand around in the church yard, or on the streets, or hide away in hotels, and chat and maybe chew and smoke, while the devotional meeting is in progress, there is not much hope for what you call the family "altar." These devotional meetings are, or should be, the power getting meetings of God's people. How little does the minister often make of the Sunday worship in the two regular meetings! How few of the ministers themselves have regular daily family worship! In our centennial convention of 20,000 delegates how much more in keeping with the occasion would more of prayer and praise have been. The family worship will seem very thin and awkward until parents and preachers have their lives "hid with Christ in God," and in all holy living and conversation make it manifest that they are very sincere. The family worship demands some much needed things in the modern domestic life. There must be a sure enough Christian father and mother working together in Christ for the finest influence over their children. Their prayers will be "hindered", if they do not. Family daily worship will not run smoothly where the reading is everything except the Bible and a good religious paper, and where the children are raising their parents, and where Christ is crucified afresh between the two thieves, mammon and amusement. But you go ahead and push the daily family worship movement, and when you have succeeded you will have accomplished the biggest thing in the world to-day.

"Wherever God erects a place of prayer
The devil always builds a chapel there,
And you'll find upon close examination
The latter has the largest congregation."

Bellvue, Pa. WM. ROSS LLOYD.

Editors Christian Century:—I am much interested in your proposed department "The Daily Altar" and feel sure I shall find it of practical value in my own home. When a lad my parents, of New England parentage, used to have daily worship, but after we moved into a village and my father had to go away to work early each morning we had a blessing asked before each meal and then on Sunday morning all read the Bible together, each reading a verse in turn, after which the father offered prayer. This latter plan has been the custom in our own home but I have never felt perfectly satisfied with it. We tried having the eldest lad read a few verses from the scripture before the morning meal but this didn't prove very impressive or practicable. So I have hopes of finding in your new department something that I can use at home and then in turn pass on to others. Sincerely yours,

DeSmet, So. Dak. A. H. SEYMOUR.

'Shall Disciples Make Good?'

Editors Christian Century:—Your editorial, "Shall the Disciples Make Good?" has just been read with much pleasure. It strikes me as a very accurate analysis of the conflict and progress of the Disciples thus far, but your conclusion leads me to think you are about to overlook in the series you are entering upon, the question of our supreme purpose, a question which, it seems to me, needs some attention just now. You say:

> "What is the prospect that the Disciples will make good in the great enterprise of securing Christian unity, the one purpose which gave them being, and whose insistent advocacy can justify their existence as a separate communion?"

Not a few are now denying that Christian unity is "the one purpose." They are asserting that "the one purpose" is to restore the apostolic gospel and church; that this aim has already been accomplished, and that Christian unity is following just as fast as the rest of the world is coming into this restored church; that, having restored the apostolic church, we have nothing farther to do in securing unity except to invite the world to come with us.

I should like to hear what the Century has to say on this issue. I am not able to look at the question just that way.

But Let Us Furnish You

The Bethany Graded Lessons

For All Your Pupils Under 12 Years Old

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to reorganize the whole School at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching children the same lessons provided for grown-up people.

The best way to grade your school is to do it by "installments." Begin at the bottom now—in the elementary grades. Provide elementary teachers and pupils with the equipment offered in The Bethany Series and later on, when the International Committee puts forth a course for higher grades, you will be ready to carry the graded principle a step higher, and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for these higher grades. In this way the most beneficent improvement which could take place in your Sunday-school methods and aims will be accomplished easily.

On Growing Old

Christ's Comfort for Those Whose Work Is Done

In Christmas we celebrate Christ's revelation of the glory of childhood. New Year's day should remind our hearts of the meaning with which Christianity has filled old age.

For not the least among the gifts bestowed upon men by the Savior is the enrichment and sweetening of the last years of life. Around these years gathers life's bitterest pathos. The flesh is weak, and with the ebbing strength has gone one's self-dependence. No more the strong grip upon the task—no more a task at all! No more the tang and sting of new and untried problems. No more the sustaining hope of conquest. Instead of leading, old age is led. Instead of bearing other's burdens one must now submit and be carried as a burden oneself. The swift procession of workers goes by, and age can only stand and wait.

To the thoughtful soul the pathos is heightened by the keen sense that the active world is incomprehensible, that the customs have changed and the ways of thought have changed and the old-time truths seem not to command the respect that was paid them in the olden time.

Keenest of all, perhaps, is the fateful sense that life no longer holds alternatives for the will. To youth each New Year is a new chance, a clean slate, a provision of God by which the soul may begin all over again. But to old age the New Year adds yet one more seal to a life already fixed beyond all change.

Now if the heart is shut up to its own reflections only, it is easy if not inevitable that a certain touch of cynicism, of disillusionment, if not pessimism, will betray itself in the temper of the aged. To old age the pessimists have ever come for their arguments and illustrations. And the best life-philosophy that the world, untouched by Christ, has yet produced was embodied in Marcus Aurelius' advice to the aged to pass cheerfully to their death, and, "like a ripe nut when you drop out of the husk, be sure to speak well of the season and make your acknowledgments to the tree that bore you."

This chivalry of the soul toward a universe in the very act of defeating its dearest purpose, is admirable. But the deepest motives and satisfactions of human nature are not stirred by it. Only Christ of all the teachers of men has planted a principle in the soul which, cultivated by the spirit, grows up into the years and bears its richest harvest in the winter of old age.

Only Christ can teach the fine art of growing old. The soul that follows him secures itself against disillusionment at the end of the day when the zest of action has departed and the pulse is weak, because the way he takes leads ever into deeper satisfactions.

The Christian life is the ever ascending life. Eternal, it nowhere reaches its zenith. Its golden age is never in the past. No true interpreter of Christian life harks back wistfully to some experience along the way, but like Paul, aged, battle-scarred and bound, forgetting the things behind he reaches forward to the future crown. And like Rabbi Ben Ezra, each soul that has found Christ's secret, sings,

> "Grow old along with me,
> The best is yet to be,
> The last of life, for which
> The first was made."

There are, broadly speaking, three stages through which each life normally passes, and each of these stages contains its characteristic and proper satisfaction.

The proper satisfaction of childhood is sheer gladness. The child is care-free, innocent, abounding with vitality and satisfied just to be in action. He is easily pleased. His spirit is akin to the birds and flowers and needs no cause, nothing save a chance, to express the gladness that is in him.

The proper satisfaction of a grown man is happiness. His life is a network of conscious purposes. His satisfaction is found in the accomplishment of these purposes. He is ever setting up goals and striving for them—in business, in love, in the social relation, in personal morality, in human service. The feeling of worth which his life will have for him depends upon his success in reaching these goals. If he fails in love or in business or in service he is unhappy. If he succeeds he is happy. His purposes are his life and all things have meaning for him according as they help or mar these purposes.

But to old age these conditions and their satisfactions are denied. The bounding pulse of youth is gone and with it the thirst for play. Lacking strength and time age has no heart to undertake new ventures in the realm of deeds. What satisfaction, then, has age? Must the soul live henceforth in memory only, the memory of past deeds done or foiled?

Not if somewhere on the way of life the soul has met with Christ! For Christ has that to give which transforms gladness and happiness into blessedness, and blessedness is a satisfaction the world cannot give and the world cannot take away.

The passing years cannot rob the soul of blessedness. It does not depend upon the strength of pulse or limb. It is not conditioned by the success or failure of the soul's purposes. Fortune comes and goes, but the blessedness Christ gives abides. Plans may tumble like a child's toy tower, tears may fall, the heart be broken, but through sorrow and ill fortune the soul's faith may put forth leaves and blossoms as in perpetual spring.

Now blessedness is the inalienable and proper satisfaction of old age. Empty, indeed, and full of pathos is the aged soul in whom this flower has not begun to grow. The gladness that ripples on the surface of youth soon passes. The happiness that attends the success of life's enterprises will fade when the currents of energy cease to flow. But in the still depths of experience if the soul have blessedness it has a peace that passeth understanding.

And the reason why blessedness may abide with old age when other satisfactions have passed away is because it is a gift of God, depending, therefore, not upon the success of the fitful and finite purposes of man, but upon the constant and gracious purpose of the Father.

Gladness registers the soul's sense of its place in the world of nature. Happiness registers the soul's sense of its value in the world of human life. But blessedness registers the soul's sense of its worth to God.

This is the root of religion: that our soul has worth in its own right, not simply in the value of its deeds to the social order, but in its very essence as a soul; that God does not measure us by what we've done, but by what we've tried to do; that the really significant product of the world is not a new machine or a civilization, but a soul.

> "All I could never be,
> All, men ignored in me,
> This, I was worth to God!"

To know this is to find blessedness and peace and joy eternal.

This blessedness is the gift of Christ to young or old. All the testimonies of Christian experience in the Bible or out of it declare that Christ gives that which no vicissitude can destroy. There is no breakdown in the satisfactions of the Christian life, no disenchantment.

On the contrary, the soul led by Christ passes from glory to glory. In the Revelation Christ says he gives the morning star to him that overcomes, which means that the Christian life is ever on the ascendant. Its symbol is not the evening star, declining, but the morning star, ever rising. Its zenith is never reached. It is a crescendo life, waxing stronger and deeper while the physical energies wane.

As happiness is a richer satisfaction than gladness, so blessedness is richer than happiness. To the broken and stricken souls of earth Christ spoke his gracious beatitudes. In the spirit of them all he might have added yet one more,

Blessed are ye aged, for though youth is gone and its merriment, and though strength is gone and its happiness, there remains yet for you the everlasting arms of the Father. In their embrace ye have found the deepest revelation and the fullest comfort life can give.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

The Immunity of a Crown

Leopold of the Belgians illustrated in his overt acts the extremes to which one may go who has his head hallowed by a crown. The traditions of centuries gathered about his head to give protection to his conscienceless life and while the old country peoples no longer declare for "divine right" their traditional regard for the monarch forbids the same sort of criticism of his deeds as would be visited upon a private character. Leopold defied every canon of public decency by his private life. He alienated his family and spent the last years of his life with a consort in unhallowed relation. His gray hairs even did not make him any less a roue in Paris, which he loved to visit incognito, while he lavished wealth upon chorus girls and lived in the most incontinent and dissipated manner. Yet he was a man of powerful will and no little ability. He amassed millions, but largely in his unscrupulous betrayal of the trust civilization put upon him in making him trustee for the Congo Free State. There are none to mourn him in sincerity, now that he is gone, and the little kingdom of Belgium doubtless feels relieved and rejoices over the honor of having a clean man for its sovereign.

Leopold the Great or Leopold the Good

The sinful king died wishing that he might be known in history as "Leopold the Good" rather than "Leopold the Great." Here conscience certainly called for vindication, but conscience cannot be vindicated after life is lived in a manner so conscienceless. In the middle ages he might have won the latter title, for the sheer material accomplishments of this "murderer of millions" in the Congo, glorify him with the godless glory of brutal materialism. But even the middle ages would not have called him "The Good," for none but the personally pious were awarded that title by those times.

It has been estimated conservatively that millions have died in the Congo through the serfdom that exists there. On the French side of the river there are prosperous natives, while on the Belgian side are vast depopulated areas. Even the King's own commission returned a report against him and much of their comment was suppressed. It resulted in his making over titles of sovereignty to the Belgian government, but even they betrayed his own betrayal of the trusteeship vested in him by the Berlin conference, because by those articles he promised to become the "trustee of civilization," while this settlement revealed the fact that he had coined millions out of his trusteeship and relinquished it only upon stipulations that recognized his proprietary rights and the payment of millions.

Civilization's Verdict

There comes to hand, almost with the announcement of his death, Document 147 of the U. S. Senate, 61st Congress, which is a transcript of the correspondence between our state department and our consuls in Belgium, England, and on the Congo, together with the report of the Secretary of State and a message from the President on "Affairs in the Congo." Both Britain and the United States have protested vigorously against the government of the Free State and they even now refuse to recognize the Belgian government's overlordship or accept in good faith the express declarations of that government that it will carry out the stipulations of the Brussels convention, until they have seen results. The Belgian senators are said to have become financially interested in the concessions granted to various companies by the late king, and the commercial interests are so vast in both rubber and ivory that the mere declaration of intentions is not considered sufficient. Consuls of both nations have personally investigated conditions out there and no missionary reports have surpassed their's in severity of arraignment. The verdict of civilization is that Leopold betrayed his trust in the Congo, that he exploited the land for personal profit, decimated the peoples he vowed to protect and elevate, dispossessed the tribes from their communal holdings and delivered the same over to concessionaires for a consideration, misgoverned the country and turned as fair a prospect as the world beheld into as vile a maladministration as the world has ever seen.

Who Told the Truth?

The work of the king has not altogether lacked defenders. Yet close scrutiny reveals the fact that the defences have chiefly been negative in that they have denied some of the definite charges made or simply stated that the witness saw nothing of the kind charged. Prof. Frederick Starr was of the latter type. He saw none of the cruelties testified to by such men as the missionaries Shepherd and Morrison, and the British consul. The reason was that he did not penetrate to the places where these cruelties were specified to be happening. These things were not permitted in the accessible districts commonly visited by travelers like the professor, but in the inaccessible back country where the rubber industry was yet rich. Then officials have been in the habit of taking charge of the travels of such explorers as the scientific man and skilfully guiding them into safe places. One Wellington Wack entered a lengthy defense some two years ago, but his attorneyship for the parties concerned was so evident that his statements were rendered ex parte wholly, and unworthy of consideration by the side of the impartial statements of the consuls.

The missionaries have been the most cursed by both the concessionaires and the biased sympathizers of privilege. They have doubtless been deceived in some specific instances through the desire of the natives to make out cases that would bring some relief, but it is impossible that they have been deceived in all or even many instances because they have seen with their own eyes things that would condemn an Arab slave driver before his own judgment. The missionary has every reason to seek the favor of the government and none for deliberately inviting its hostility. He, above all living men, is the friend and attorney for the native, and his solicitude for the people he is giving his life to help leads him to risk his all in their defense.

Messrs. Morrison and Shepherd were haled a thousand miles, from the back country to the coast, to answer charges of libel, laid by the Kassai Rubber Company. This unscrupulous concessionaire doubtless thought to try them before a court partial to themselves, because a court of their own party, and by bringing them so great a distance as to make the calling of witnesses impossible, get a verdict that would blind civilization to the real methods of operation. But M. Vandervelde, the main antagonist of Leopold's regime in the Belgian parliament, hastened to the Congo to defend them. The charges against the white missionary, Morrison, were then dismissed, and the black missioner, Shepherd, only was held. Vandervelde produced the printed instruction of the company to their employes and had twenty of the foreign tribesmen, employed by the company as police for the district, ready to testify that the company armed them and instructed them as per Shepherd's charges. The judge dismissed the case without hearing their evidence and thus again the very charges that such men as Wack denied have been proven by the government's own action.

The Real Horrors of the Congo

The devastating horrors of the Congo are not the well authenticated cases of mutilation, ravaging, imprisonment, and arson. These things have furnished unspeakable horrors in a number of instances. But the real horrors are those of impressment or forced labor and the practical dispossession of the entire population from their birthright in their native soil. These two things have decimated the population by the admission of Belgian officials and the new regime promise that impressment shall cease and that they will seek some adjustment of the communal land holdings. Whole villages have been decimated and thousands have died of starvation through the system of practical slavery brought on by forced labor or impressment, and though the people being left without means of a livelihood through the appropriation of their community or tribal lands. Leopold's crime has not been so much in the death and torture his system has brought upon individuals through penalties, as in the system that has made millions of serfs of a free people and the practical murder of millions by the hardships that has so decimated the land that his coffers and those of his concessionaires might be choked with the millions that rubber and ivory nas contributed to them.

Hot Air and Dust

Colds are the bane of winter living. They not only inconvenience and annoy but they are the fruitful propagators of that most deadly of all quick messengers of death—pneumonia. But "colds" are really "hots." It is the overheated and impure air that brings them on more often than exposure to cold. This is the age of the "fresh air" fad and pneumonia is being defeated. The once dreaded cold air is now welcomed as a cure for it, i. e., fresh air is the cure even though it be cold. Dry hot-air gathers up dust and dust carries disease germs. Thus overheated homes become places of infection. Impure air is the accompaniment of the modern heating device. We heat but we do not ventilate. The latter is almost more necessary to health than the former. It is not cold air we need but pure air. Neither is it cold baths we need so much as baths. Every good thing becomes a fad and tends to be overworked. Moderation in the application of pure water and air is the royal road to good health. We do not need to live out of doors in order to have pure air, but we do need to provide means for artificially warming the air that comes into our living places instead of warming over and over that which we find in them. And we do need to use plenty of pure water, neither too hot nor too cold, and treat the body with moderation in defending it from the elements without exposing it to their extremes. An air shaft with a radiator in it is much better than an open window, even for the bedroom and a bath tub temperature so as not to shock or overstimulate the system is better than ice water.

Football's Dead March

Football has claimed its annual toll of victims. Now that the shouting and the tumult dies we hear the play of the dead march. Thirty alert, bright young fellows have gone to the altar as living sacrifices, not to the game, but to the inexcusable brutality that is not yet censored out of it. Seventy more have paid the penalty of injured bodies. Death and permanent injury are not necessary to sport. Any defense of the present rules must defend the death of these thirty. Chicago, Nebraska, Tulane, West Virginia, and Cornell, with many others, join the growing list of protestants that Columbia headed by completely abolishing the game several years ago. Not all of them will abolish it, but most of them will see that the death clause is cut out or put an end to the sport. Prize fighting is a gentle sport and very safe as compared with modern football. California and Stanford play Rugby and seem to keep on the map in the college world, while Columbia has not suffered any particular anaemic disease either in the number of students (now over 6,000), or in their quality. In the interests of civilization the game should be either so altered as to make injury and death no necessary sequence or else it ought to give way to something less deliberately barbaric.

Who Is the Real Sugar Thief?

The government has convicted the first batch of sugar thieves. They are all petty stealers of Uncle Sam's toll. They received personally but little of the profit. They doctored the scales for a small consideration. Who got the large amounts and who laid the plot? It will be interesting to see whether the "men higher up" can be detected. It will not be easy for the men at the top in such matters have ways of profiting without being criminally culpable. Mayors have a way of condoning the outlawry of the saloon without taking a penny directly or giving a direct word of privilege to them, but just as surely through indirect ways. So the heads of great insurance companies do not incriminate themselves with tangible evidence while profiting by the art of juggling with their client's funds. The present officials of the company claim complete innocence of any part in the plots and have paid over some $2,000,000 to the government. They now offer $700,000 more to settle all claims, but the government does not think it will give a receipt in full just now for any consideration. The whole prosecution will miss the main end if it does not find the "man higher up" and reveal the indirect methods by which such mammoth larceny can be committed through methods of indirection.

The Red Cross Stamp

Red Cross stamps have been sold by the million during the Christmas season. They are a fine expression of public interest in a great common human cause. The proceeds will add large sums to the war chest of the crusade on tuberculosis, but even more will they call attention to the methods of the war and give expression to a universal sympathy.

During the year something like $8,000,000 has been contributed to the cause by state, local, and national governments. To this there is to be added large sums given privately. Out of the forty-three legislatures that met this year all but seven considered laws dealing with the prevention and cure of the dread disease. Twenty-eight of them enacted altogether sixty-four statutes relating to its treatment. Fourteen of them provide for state sanitariums and six enlarged those already built. Twenty-seven states now have such institutions. Four states passed enabling acts allowing counties to provide sanitariums without public vote. Many believe that this is the better way. Many will go to an institution near home that would dread leaving kith and kin. As usual, the provision has been for the institution, and to meet the popular demand more than to meet the initial demands of scientific procedure, which asks that accurate registration of all infected persons shall be provided for. In a country like Germany this would be the first step. In other words, the specialists would present the draft for such legislative acts and laws would be made to meet them. Even more meaningful than the building of sanitariums are the laws enacted to prevent the spread of the disease. Sanitary precautions are made mandatory in many states and public instruction through the schools and publicity was provided for in a number. In a few years more, tuberculosis will take its place with yellow fever and cholera among the banished plagues.

Editorial

OUR INTERESTING contemporary, 'Unity,' of this city, has recently published a long list of letters from representative men and women throughout the country expressive of their first choices in literature, apropos of President Eliot's recently suggested "Five Feet of Culture." The first dozen titles in Unity's list, made up from a careful compilation of the suggestions sent in, are as follows: Emerson's Essays, the Iliad, Tennyson's poems, Les Miserables, Lowell's poems, Browning's poems, Faust, Darwin's "Origin of Species," the Odyssey, Wordsworth's poems, Tennyson's "In Memoriam," Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus," and the Divine Comedy of Dante. It is interesting to see that nine out of these titles are in the realm of poetry. One is a work of science, one a novel, and two are essays. The entire list as published by Unity is exceedingly suggestive. But one has to go down beyond the fiftieth title before he comes upon a single work that is less than fifty years old.

THE DECEMBER number of the Biblical World contains, among other interesting materials, an article by Professor Ernest D. Burton on the subject "Why I Am Content to be a Christian." This is the outline of an address delivered by him before many non-Christian audiences in various cities of India, Ceylon, China, Korea and Japan during his recent travels through the Orient as Educational Commissioner of the United States, inspecting the educational foundations of the far East. Other articles in the same number of the Biblical World deal in a helpful introductory way with the problems met in the study of the Gospel of Matthew, which becomes the theme of the International Sunday-school lessons for 1910. A review of "The Historic Exodus" by Professor Toffteen of the Western Theological Seminary, Chicago, calling in question his data and severely criticising his methods, has led to an animated rejoinder in the Chicago press.

THE Federal Council of Churches in Chicago has undertaken a very important work in connection with the Juvenile Court. Ever since the establishment of that admirable municipal tribunal, the Roman Catholics have kept a representative in constant attendance upon its sessions to carefully safeguard the interests of Catholic children, and if possible, provide for the homeless ones places of refuge and ultimately homes. The Protestant churches have never had such a representative. They thereby lost both the opportunity of performing their part in the care of neglected children and also missed the chance to secure the care of children rightfully belonging to them, a care which the Roman Catholic church has always regarded as one of its chief assets, and of which it has taken advantage in every possible way. About a year ago the Federal Council proposed at a mass meeting of the Protestant churches the plan of providing a superintendent for this work, and Mr. Colby

Dr. William Nicoll, the editor of the British Weekly, the Expositor and several other journals, has recently been knighted by the king in recognition of his long and honorable service as a prominent and valuable worker in the field of letters.

AMONG the interesting plans projected by the recent meeting of the executive committee of the Federated Council of Churches in Louisville, Kentucky, was that of devoting the Sunday before Labor Day in September to the consideration of the relation of the church to the laboring people. The day is to be known as "Labor Sunday." It is felt that it will be of special advantage to the church in directing its attention to questions which concern the toilers. It would necessitate some careful study of the labor problem by the ministry and would secure consideration for the same theme by members of the church who are perhaps largely indifferent to it. It is further suggested that the various central and local labor bodies be requested to co-operate in every legitimate way with the ministers who thus observe Labor Sunday, seeking to secure with them as large an audience of working men as possible. The fact that this action on the part of the Federal Council was taken as the result of a memorial from the American Federation of Labor recently held in Toronto makes it all the more impressive and significant of the growing understanding between the church and the labor body.

THE meeting of the executive committee representing the Federal Council of the Churches in America was held in Louisville, Kentucky, December 7. A considerable proportion of the executive committee representing the different denominations was present and the reports were exceedingly encouraging. They indicate that in all the different sections of the country the federation idea is growing in recognition as a serviceable step in the direction of Christian unity. Among the particular items of interest reported was the fact that the Wisconsin Federation of Churches will hold a gathering in the autumn with from five hundred to a thousand representatives present. This gathering will discuss the question whether the old denominational way of independent and separate effort is better than the new way of co-operative activity and mutual helpfulness. Headquarters are soon to be established in Chicago and Denver in addition to the New York quarters. Home mission societies are joining hands with the Federal Council in most promising plans to meet the religious need of the interior and the West. The different religious bodies are responding cheerfully and generously to their obligations to support the work of the Federal Council. The Disciples have perhaps been as unresponsive in this financial regard as any of the co-operating bodies, if not more so, and their participation is a matter of a good deal of importance to them, both as sustaining their credit with the Council and as expressing their own interest in its work.

AN interesting upheaval has recently taken place at McCormick Theological Seminary in this city. McCormick is the training school of the Presbyterian church in Chicago and the West, and recently celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. About a week ago the students of the Old Testament department presented a petition to the faculty requesting that they might be permitted to exercise their own discretion regarding the study of Hebrew. Hitherto that study has been obligatory upon all men preparing for the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. The request was considered by the head of the Old Testament department and refused. The students thereupon broke out into open rebellion against the decision, appealed to the Presbytery and, if reports are to be trusted, went so far as to burn the offending instructor in effigy. Most graduate institutions of ministerial character have placed Hebrew upon the optional list. It is to be hoped that there will still be a large majority of the students anxious to secure the discipline which the study of Hebrew involves and the grasp of Old Testament literature which can be secured in no other way. In fact, it is not too much to say that no man can understand the spirit of either the Old Testament or the New who has not some competent knowledge of the Hebrew language. At the same time the day has gone by when this knowledge can be forced upon any man who is preparing for the ministry. No doubt McCormick will soon join the list of divinity schools which have made Semitics an optional discipline.

Does the Preacher Know?

It is sometimes interesting to get the views of men and women who are members of our churches and are seriously in earnest concerning the important matters of Christian duty and privilege, yet who feel that their lives are rendering no important service to the church with which they are connected or to the kingdom of God. This is often the fault of the narrow and legalistic program that the church has set itself under the guidance of a minister who is only half prepared for his work, or is unwilling to pay the price of such effort as will put his church and his teaching into line with the actual living forces of the present age.

The following letter from a professional man in one of our churches expresses this feeling so well that we venture to put it before our readers, both ministers and laymen, that whatever lesson it may have for them may be taught. The letter is as follows:

We naturally look to The Christian Century for that which we do not get much of here, and that is a real message. Our minister is a splendid man, but is so thoroughly "orthodox" that he is still preaching a first century gospel. It has grown to be a serious problem with us in our church life here just what attitude we ought to take toward the work, when almost the whole program is out of harmony with that which seems to be the vital and essential one to us. We have several members in the church who feel exactly as we do. They say they have experienced almost the same things for ten years back, listening to frayed-out sermons that have very little in common with modern life.

I have tried to talk the matter over very kindly with our minister, but, of course, he does not see it from our angle and it all seems to him a very easy thing, and that is to take his view-point and go ahead; for he does not consider men in any of his plans. We are all so many pieces on his board, and it is always his move.

We have become habituated to going to the church every time it was opened, and singing, playing, teaching, talking when no minister was present or filling in any vacant place like a cipher until it became merely mechanical to do so. But I believe a reaction is liable to come, and that stage seems to have arrived with us now.

From time immemorial it has been thought to be the necessary thing to start a "protracted" meeting soon after the nights began to get cooler, and rake and scrape the neighborhood to get new material into the church, as if these "seasons of refreshing" were the only time when men were to be converted. Well, we are at that particular place now, and every leverage is being used to get the church ready to convert sinners. An evangelistic singer must be secured and the people drilled to sing so fast that no one can have a serious or sane thought.

It seems so out of harmony with our ideas that it is hard to fall in line with the program. Perhaps you cannot appreciate the situation but if you can what would you do?

It is not the associations so much as the religious program, that is hard for us to conform ourselves to. The burden of our minister's teaching is the thought that our lives are a preparation for a future state, Jesus as a wonder-worker, Salvation by adherence to symbolic forms rather than the "spiritual fruits of character and life"; nothing is done that is pleasing to God unless coming through the channels of the church; Churchanity continually. The emphasis is laid upon the trivial to the neglect of the really vital things.

If any of our readers think this to be an isolated or unnecessary situation, they are unacquainted with the real facts. There are very many Disciples in different parts of the country who are carrying their work as faithful members of the church in a spirit of constant unrest and protest, because the message to which they are compelled to listen week by week is one which is addressed to a past generation rather than to the living men and women of today. The difficulty is that the preacher has never paid the price of thorough preparation for his work, not only in fundamental educational requirements but in the study of the gospel in its application to living men and women of the twentieth century. He is not reading the books that keep his soul alive. He is depending upon sermons that were once vital in his preaching but are no longer so because they are mere repetitions of commonplaces; or they are some other man's messages which he has appropriated and which for that very reason must fail to win attention or to strengthen character.

The difficulty in many of our churches is that some at least of the members and perhaps many of them are superior in knowledge and appreciation of what the church ought to be attempting to the ministers themselves. It becomes very difficult for them to continue month after month the resultless practice of church attendance where there seems to be so little food either for the mind or the spiritual nature. What shall be said to men and women of this type? When they are frank enough to ask for counsel it ought to be given in the most sympathetic spirit. For we are perfectly well aware that not a few of their class do not wait for counsel but go elsewhere where the message is more vital and the work is more effective.

There are some things that ought to be said to such of our readers as find themselves perplexed by this failure of the local church to meet the demands of the time. First, they must realize that at the present moment the churches are all passing through a period of transition from the conception of the gospel as a static, fixed, determined and unchangeable body of truth to the more reasonable and workable view of the message of Jesus as a call to fuller life, deeper friendship with God and man, the cultivation of the qualities that were in himself, and the development of life both in knowledge and in service. It will not be strange if, in a period like this, which is rapidly learning to discard the non-essential and to emphasize the vital element of the gospel, there should be many ministers who have wholly failed to catch this note of adjustment and seem to believe themselves in the world of a century or centuries ago. Some of these ministers are old and faithful men who will never change their method because it has once been effective in the kind of work to which they have been called, and they are incapable of interpreting the gospel in any other terms. Such men often make up by the sweetness and tenderness of their personal ministry for their short-sighted vision of the kingdom of God. It is probably useless to labor with these men in the effort to secure any larger and fresher message. They must be honored, aided and lived with until their work is finished. And even the most conservative of them may render a very effective and helpful service.

To the younger type of minister who is merely uneducated and ill-furnished for his task, it is possible for men and women of the type represented by the letter above to be of incalculable benefit. Many a minister has been saved from a life of barren and hopeless legalism by the counsel, sympathy and direction of some of his informed and open-minded members. This effort ought always to be made. Very frequently the young man does not know what the modern world is thinking of at all, and stands in jeopardy of going on with an acquired but impotent message, only to waken in middle life to realize his hopeless limitation and to join the ranks of that disgruntled company who insist that they are not appreciated. May not our friends find in the task of leading such ministers to the better view of the gospel ample reward. There is still great work for the Aquillas and Priscillas of the church in behalf of the young, eager, but uninstructed Apolloses.

It must also be remembered that even in the worst conditions, and those which are least capable of modification, there is the value of the church service as a means of worship which the sincere Christian will not wish to miss. Is it not true that Protestantism has made far too much of the sermon, and too little of the worshipping element in the house of God? When one reflects upon the character of the preaching in many of the liturgical churches, he wonders that any alert and inquiring mind could find any comfort in such assemblies. But it must be remembered that Christians go to the house of God for worship, and that in the proper spirit it is possible to find values in the ministration of almost any man however limited his vision or even imperfect his life.

It is a kind of education to discipline one's soul to the enjoyment of every kind of religious service, so that if one should enter a Roman Catholic cathedral, a Greek church, an Episcopal chapel, a Methodist class-meeting, or a Quaker assembly of silence, there would be something in each one to appeal to the worshipful spirit within. We have put too much dependence upon the kind of preaching we like, and too little upon the total value of the service of God's house as a means of grace. It would be a poor ministry indeed that could not offer almost any devout spirit the opportunity of genuine comfort and communion with God in any service that was conducted with even partial adjustment to the ideals of decorum and reverence.

There is still another point that needs consideration. There is the educational program of the church, and its social and serviceable life which furnishes opportunities for the expression of the very best that is in us. The opportunity to teach in the Sunday-school, and especially with the helps now so admirably adjusted to the different grades of scholars, offers immense openings to men and women who are really anxious for personal growth and for the privilege of interpreting the best ideals of the kingdom of God to the plastic life around them. What man or woman impressed with the need of a larger and more vital note in our Christianity today would not welcome the opportunity of teaching a Sunday-school class or of organizing a group of students for even more advanced work in Christian history or general literature? The whole church would feel the reaction of such efforts. And when the social influences of educated people upon the church are considered, and the opportunity offered for neighborly helpfulness in any church community, it would seem as if nothing further were needed to make a broad enough path in which to walk with assurance and sweetness of spirit.

We do not think that we underestimate in the slightest degree the hardship involved in constant attendance upon a church whose minister preaches a gospel out of date, and the majority of whose members are willing to have it so. But we are always of the opinion that the opportunity for testimony, for teaching and for service in a church of that kind is just as great and perhaps even greater than in a church which has been so fully adjusted to the present time that all of its people are responding to the call of the kingdom as it is spoken to the men of today. We have only tried to point out the methods by which Disciples conscious of limitations in their church relations may both find rewarding and inspiring service in those very relationships, and may also become the means by which gradually the limitations are removed and the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world may shine in its fullness and power.

A Good Conscience Toward God

By Prof. Silas Jones.

He who said, "Be not therefore anxious for the morrow," said also, "Whosoever would save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's shall save it." Putting the statements together, we infer that he forbids us to be anxious about the circumstances of life and unconcerned about life itself. It is therefore becoming in a disciple of Jesus to look into the future and try to see what it has for him. He is forbidden to plan for existence upon the earth, to be anxious about food and clothing, and to take no thought for mental and spiritual culture. Jesus foresaw his sufferings and prepared for them. He knew that the price of peace with himself and with God was opposition on the part of the religious leaders of the day. The life he chose to lose was the life of popular favor and of comfort. The life he saved was that of fellowship with God.

"He Began to Teach."

Jesus uttered words strange to his disciples when he spoke to them about his rejection by the leaders of the Jews and his violent death. The disciples felt that Jesus was underrating his own dignity and through Peter they attempted to set him right. His answer showed that they were in error as to what constituted his dignity. They would have persuaded him to narrow his aims to those of the people and become a politician instead of a redeemer. It is by a long and painful process that any man is brought to see what is worthy of human ambition. We persist in the refusal to understand ourselves and the objects that give us permanent satisfaction. George Eliot has said: "It is only a poor sort of happiness that could ever come by caring very much about our narrow pleasures. We can only have the highest happiness, such as goes along with being a great man, by having wide thought and much feeling for the rest of the world as well as ourselves; and this sort of happiness often brings so much pain with it that we can only tell it from pain by its being what we would choose before everything else, because our souls see it is good." But we often see the pain before we see the happiness.

"The Things of Men."

Your neighbor has become involved in debt and you force him to give up his property to you for much less than it is worth to you. You then reckon up your gains. It is nothing to you that you have taken what another has accumulated by painful toil. You say that business is business and that you are not called upon to guard the savings of other men. Is it Peter or Jesus that you follow? What have you gained? Your home life is unpleasant. The companion whom you have chosen has disappointed you. You are hindered by one from whom you expected the greatest help. You therefore become irritable. You neglect your work. You add your contribution to the misery of your home. Have you learned of Peter or of Jesus how to meet disappointment? Perhaps it is the church whose management does not meet your approval. Your pet schemes have been disregarded. You stay at home on Sunday. You take no interest in religious education and the public worship of God. Is it because you have the wide sympathies of a Christian that you withdraw your support from the church or because you are little and selfish? Are you gaining in intellectual and moral strength by separating yourself from the company of believers?

"The Things of God."

"I don't think the devil will ever make a higher bid for me than that," said George Jones to a representative of the Tweed Ring, who had offered him $5,000,000 not to publish the facts in his possession about the stealing of Tweed. Then the advantages of having $5,000,000 were set forth. "Why, with that sum you can go to Europe and live like a prince." "Yes," was the reply, "but I should know I was a rascal. I cannot consider your offer or any offer not to publish the facts in my possession." Here was a man who knew where to look for the right sort of gains. He chose the things of God. He could say to the citizens of New York that he had not sold their interests for private gain. A good conscience was more to him than great riches. This treasure every Christian will resolve to possess at the end of the year.

The Return to Primitive Christianity

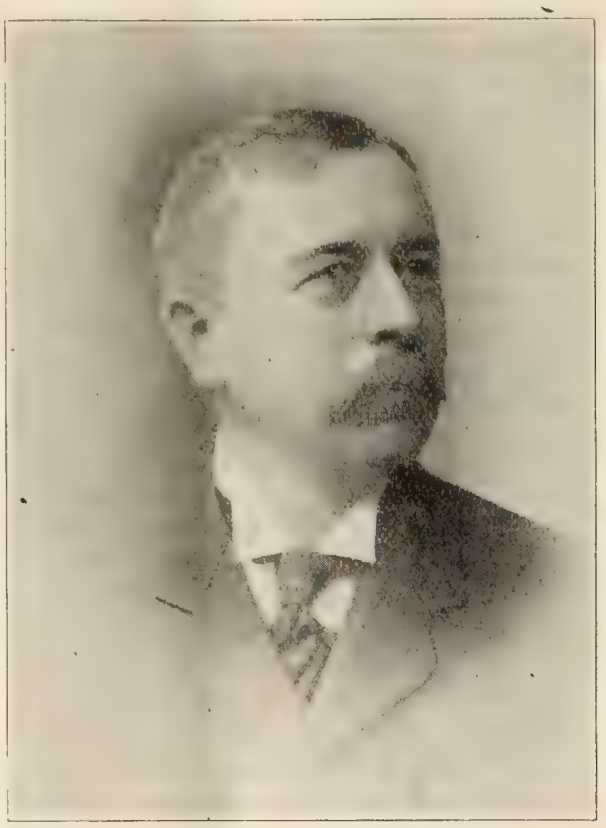
By Rev. Lathan A. Crandall, D. D.

Pastor Trinity Baptist Church, Minneapolis, Minn.

[Among the most inspiring features of the Centennial convention at Pittsburg last October were the addresses presented by fraternal delegates from the leading denominations of the land. These all breathed a devout hope for the reunion of the divided church and agreed in most instances with the Disciples' primary contention that only by a return to the Christianity of the New Testament could this goal be achieved. Just what the essentials of the Christianity of the New Testament are was the only question over which differences arose. Dr. Crandall's address is typical of them all in irenic temper and in the discernment of what seems to us the fact that primitive Christianity was not a particular type of organization or a fixed creedal system or a set of forms, but a life of faith and service through the power of Jesus the Lord. Dr. Crandall's remarks have added significance from the fact that his was the potent ministry under which the Memorial Baptist Church, Chicago, was developed, —the congregation which now exists in union with the First Church of Disciples under the name, Memorial Church of Christ (Baptists and Disciples). We regret that our space limits compel us to omit a portion of Dr. Crandall's address.—Editors.]

Fathers and Brethren:

The visitor to Westminster Abbey, that mighty mausoleum of England's immortal dead, may read these words chiseled in a stone of the floor: "May the rich blessing of God rest on every one—be he English, American or Turk—who will help to heal the open sore of the world." The prayer of David Livingstone awakens response in the heart of every man who loves the kingdom of God and longs for its coming. Good men rejoice to recognize goodness wherever found, and those who love God and his righteousness find delight in every contribution to the progress of the kingdom, by whomsoever it may be brought. Ecclesiastical boundaries cannot circumscribe the fruits of devotion to Jesus Christ. The branches of unselfish service run over denominational walls and bear fruit for all the world.



Greetings from Baptists

As you are gathered to celebrate the splendid triumphs of a hundred years of Christian service, it is my high privilege to bring you the loving greetings and heart-felt felicitations of the Baptists of the northern states. In so far as you have been permitted to set at liberty those who were prisoners to sin, to open eyes that were blind that they might see the light of the world, to furnish guidance and help to those who were groping after God, to strengthen righteous purposes in human hearts, to lift the world up toward its Father, in so far your victories belong to us and to all who bear the hallowed name of Christian. Anything which makes glad the heart of Christ must thrill the hearts of all his followers with gratitude. The pettiness of spirit which leads men to ignore or under-value Christian service, which is not stamped with their own denominational name, does not proceed from Him whose mind and temper we are bidden to share. Northern Baptists appreciate the privilege of joining with you in the rejoicing of these days over that which our common Lord has permitted you to accomplish. On their behalf permit me to wish for you the abiding blessing of your Master and ours in all the days that are to come.

To enter upon the discussion of questions concerning which we may differ, in these moments which your courtesy has granted me, would be an unforgivable affront to your kindness. To point out and consider all the truths held in common by Disciples and Baptists would, indeed, be an agreeable task, but its dimensions—thank God that it is so—demand far more time that is at our disposal this hour. Perhaps no wiser use may be made of this opportunity than to turn our attention to a single ideal which we have placed before ourselves, and ask in how far we have really returned to primitive Christianity.

On Common Ground

You do not need to be reminded that here we come upon a fundamental contention of both Disciples and Baptists. We have steadily refused to be bound by formulated statements of doctrine, insisting that the Bible is "our only rule of faith and practice." Every human soul has the right to stand face to face with God and interpret him for himself. Creeds may have been created by those in our fellowship, but they are simply the expressions of opinion without other authority than that which is inherent in the truth that they may embody. We give respectful attention to the opinions of Augustine and Calvin and Luther, but deny their right to decide for us in any matter which concerns the religion of Jesus. We do not question the devotion of those who have undertaken to formulate Christian truth through the long centuries, but for us there is only one Teacher whose instruction abides unchallenged through all the changes in human thought, even He who, in a far off land and time, bade men take his yoke upon them and learn of him. However pure the spring, the stream which flows from it is sure to become contaminated. Muddy water may be better than none, but who would drink it when he may quaff from the unpolluted fountain?

Rev. L. A. Crandall

If, in the past century, the Disciples of Christ have rendered notable aid in the conquest of this world for Jesus Christ, if Baptists have made appreciable contributions to the same end, the explanation of efficient service must be sought not in imposing ecclesiastical machinery or social prestige or the backing of the state, but in insistent and persistent endeavor to reproduce, in our generation, the Christianity of Christ.

It is this emphasis upon the Lordship of Jesus, rather than any special form which obedience has taken, that explains the progress of the Christian bodies which we represent. We are supposed to express devotion to a certain form of baptism, and so we do. We are credited with insisting that only those should be baptized who are capable of making moral choice, and we gladly plead guilty to the indictment. But these are only implications of our fundamental contention. Back of these, justifying and making them necessary, is the basal affirmation that Jesus, and he only, is the Lord of our lives. We ask nothing that he has not asked; we dare not stop short of undertaking all that he requires. For forms, in themselves, we care not a whit; to the keeping of his commandments, whatever they may concern, we have pledged our uttermost of endeavor.

A More Complete Return

Because we are united in the effort to make the Christianity of the twentieth century, in essential things, to correspond with the Christianity of the first century, in essential things, I make bold in this presence to enter a plea for a more complete return, on our own part, to primitive Christianity. It is no small task which we have undertaken. To furnish our age with an example of Christian fellowship as vital, as unselfish, as complete in its answer to the demands of the Master as was that of the age of Paul, calls upon all of our spiritual resources. In view of the gigantic size of the undertaking it would be strange indeed were unable to detect any particular in which we have failed to answer, perfectly, the demands of obligation and opportunity. There is upon us a constant temptation to substitute a part for the whole; to select certain features in that early Christian life after which we carefully model our life, while essential elements of primitive Christianity are measurably neglected. And as nature seeks the line of least resistance, we may not marvel if the Christian of today chooses from the mass of material afforded by the records of the early Christians those things which are most easily reproduced. That means nothing less than the outward forms rather than the inward spirit. It is easier to give than to forgive, easier to be baptized than to love. The whole history of Christianity marks a tendency to ignore the essence of the teaching of Jesus while jauntily boasting of measureless devotion to his will.

How Jesus Sees Life

We have need to ask ourselves how Jesus interprets human life. To this there can be but one answer if we come with open minds to the study of his life and teaching. In everything that he was, in all that he said, one comprehensive commandment for man is to be found: "Thy life shalt be one of sacrificial service." Paul understood this and so wrote himself a debtor to all men and the bond-servant of Jesus Christ. We must not only understand this transcendent truth but live it if we propose to restore primitive Christianity to our generation. Listen; "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." "He that doth not take his cross and follow after me is not worthy of me." Whatsoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." Matthew Arnold calls this last logion the "secret of Jesus." It reveals that essential quality in character which gives meaning to life.

Just here we need to stop and look into our hearts and out upon that part of the church of Christ which is represented here today. Are we bringing to our generation the same revelation of brotherhood which Christ brought to his? Are the enormous aggregations of Christian disciples, of which we are individuals, as devoted to ministry for human betterment as were Jesus and his early adherents?

Evangelism

Disciples and Baptists have ever laid strong emphasis upon evangelism. We believe with all our hearts that it is our duty and high privilege to persuade men to be reconciled to God. But are we just true to the primitive example at this point? If anything is clear concerning the early days of Christianity it is that every disciple was a propagandist. It is doubtless true that some had specific functions, but all were embassadors. When persecution drove the followers of Christ from Jerusalem it not only scattered abroad the disciples, but created innumerable centers of evangelizing zeal. Personal attachment to Jesus Christ meant, for them as it should for us, personal undertaking to win others to our Lord. They had a story to tell, good tidings to proclaim, and do not seem to have dreamed that another's proclamation would excuse their silence. They had not learned, as we have, to syndicate evangelism. Today Christian people thrust off personal responsibility upon the church, and the church, all too often secures a proxy. We cannot be too grateful for the splendid service of such men as Gipsy Smith and Dwight L. Moody and other men of God technically known as evangelists. They have their rightful and important place in the long fight for the establishment of the kingdom of God. But when they have done their uttermost they have not discharged the obligation which rests upon your soul and mine to witness for Jesus Christ. No man can believe for another, have faith for another, love for another, serve for another. If Christ has sent me forth as his representative I may not hire another to go in my stead. If we would return to primitive Christianity we must show a keener sense of personal obligation for the redemption of our fellowmen, and add individual undertaking to church undertaking that the kingdom may be brought in.

But we have yet to touch upon the heart of this problem. All activities have a producing cause. The spring that bubbles from the hillside and flows across the fields with its refreshing ministry is fed from a reservoir hidden in the heart of the earth. The condition of all helpful ministry to the souls of men, of all forms of service by which the world is lifted out of sin to righteousness, is the possession of the "mind of Christ." No other motor can furnish the power by which we are to conquer the world for God.

Harnack, in his volume upon the Christianity of the first three centuries, declares that the distinguishing mark of those early Christians, that which separated them from the life of their time and lifted them to great moral heights, was their love. They preached, they baptized, they gathered in groups called churches, they shared their possessions, they fed the hungry, they endured persecution, going even to death with songs upon their lips; but all that they did and all that they suffered were but the necessary expressions of the love that filled their hearts. He whom we call Master, whose word is our law and whose life is our example, declared that love explains his presence among men and sums up human duty. When John, the aged, was writing out of his heart to the hearts of his fellow Christians he avowed that, "Love is of God; and every one that loveth is begotten of God and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love." Here is our goal. Other things are important: this is vital. Love is the divine dynamic. It answers every demand made by God upon the soul. If we seek Christian unity and the restoration of unadulterated Christianity, our first task is to enthrone love in our own hearts and the hearts of fellow-believers.

Infidels I Have Known

By Ellsworth Faris

I. Infidelity in Conduct

There is an "infidel" whom I have known for years, although he was not an infidel when I first knew him. At that time he was a preacher of the gospel. Let us call him A. B., because these are not his real initials. When I first knew him he was earnest, eloquent, successful, and promising. Crowds flocked to hear him. Multitudes hung on his words. Now, he no longer preaches. He does not believe in God or Jesus or the Bible. His former friends call him an infidel and he confesses that the designation is accurate. Should you inquire into the cause of his change, you would not find it in the character of his teachers, for they were, and are yet, of undoubted "soundness." Nor would you find it in the books he read, for these were of the orthodox type. A careful investigation of all the facts, however, would bring to light numerous and various charges of misconduct. In every community where he has lived, men are willing to insist that he is guilty of dishonesty, unfair dealing, or other violations of the moral law. And the significant part of the matter is that he lost his grip on morality before he lost his hold on Jesus. In other words, he is an infidel because he first became an immoral man. Doing evil has made him think wrongly.

II. Of Doubtful Mind

Mr. C. D. is another "infidel" whom I know. Like A. B., he was once a preacher, but, unlike him, his reputation for truth, veracity, and honor is untarnished. It is true that he no longer preaches, no longer attends Church, no longer supports the cause of missions, or accepts the statements of the Bible. He is known as an infidel and accepts the designation. Like A. B., he was once an eloquent herald of the Cross. People thronged to hear him preach, and a great future seemed to open up before him. Should you ask why he gave up his faith, I could not answer. Some say that intellectual difficulties came up, some that pride or disappointment was the cause. He, himself, claims that it was because of his inability to reconcile certain theories about the Bible with the claims of reason. But whatever the cause, it is generally known and quite universally accepted that (1) he is an infidel, and (2) he is a "moral" man. In the case of C. D., wrong thinking (infidelity) did not result in immorality.

III. A Dangerous Man?

Mr. M. N. is a preacher whom I know. Many people call him an "infidel," and regard him as a highly dangerous man. He, himself, does not admit that he is an infidel, and still continues his preaching. If you inquire into his belief and opinions, you find that he still believes in God, believes in Jesus, and in the Bible. He believes that Jesus was born of the Virgin Mary, that He wrought the miracles, that He was crucified and that He rose again. He believes that Jesus is divine. He teaches that the Bible came by inspiration of God and is a message from Heaven. He practices only immersion, labors earnestly for the union of Christians and celebrates the Lord's Supper every week. As to his character, he is pure in personal life, honorable in business and of a noble and earnest spirit—no one claims that he is immoral or dishonorable. And still, in spite of his own claims, and of the above questioned facts, many call him an infidel. He does not agree with some in his definition of what a miracle is, and so all the other facts are left out of account as not important enough to constitute him a believer. The main point is that although Mr. M. N. not only accepts the main Christian doctrines but also lives an upright and fruitful life, still, for an unwelcome answer to a question of which most of us would immediately confess ignorance, he is classed with A. B. and C. D., who openly repudiate Christianity.

IV. Proclaimed by Bad Life

Mr. X. Y. is a fourth "infidel" I have known. Like the other three he is a preacher. Like Mr. M. N. he does not claim to be an infidel. In fact, I feel sure that he would repudiate the designation just as M. N. would do. No one has ever called him an infidel so far as I know, and yet it seems I have warrant for placing him in the list. His teaching is not called in question. He believes in the Bible, teaches the divinity of Christ, loudly proclaims his loyalty to the Old Book and accepts without reservation every point in the orthodox theology. Wherein, then, does infidelity consist? Just in this, that by open, undenied, confessed sin he has brought disgrace on himself, the Church, and those who love him. His life is an epistle and proclaims in large letters: "I do not believe."

Deductions.

It is easy to see that there are several kinds of infidels. Some deny the Lord with their lips, some with their lives, and others are cast out of the synagogue because of some detail or theory or point of doctrine about which there is disagreement. Beyond controversy, we should obey the command, "Judge not." But in forming our estimate of Christian teachers should we lay emphasis on lip testimony or life testimony? If a man's words are right and his deeds are wrong, we refuse to accept the witness of the words. If lips are wrong and life is right, is there a corresponding call for charity of judgment?

The four men mentioned above are not imaginary ones. Many readers will recognize one or more of them. The lesson to be derived needs pointing out. Let us pray this prayer: Lord, keep me from the infidelity of a sinful life.

The Song of the Sunshine Club

"What shall I make this morning?"
The Sunshine Angel said.
"Canary birds and merry words
And a yellow crocus bed."

The Sunshine Angel, dear to God,
Goes singing on his way,
Across the hills of golden-red
To make a happy day.

The wings of the Sunshine Angel
They brushed the willow trees
And goldfinch flocks and weathercocks
And grumble-bumblebees.

The Christmas Pulpit

Excerpts from Prominent Preachers' Christmas Sermons

THE MESSAGE OF THE MANGER.

AUSTIN HUNTER, Jackson Boul. Church, Chicago.

Today the thought of the Christian world centers in the manger of Bethlehem, and its ringing message is that true life does not consist in what one has outwardly, but in what one is inwardly; that the question, what we have, can never be so great as the question, what we are. We learn the superior value of the internal treasure, and we learn, moreover, that this internal treasure is regnant, is imperial, is conquering. Out of this lowly manger springs the world's hope—the dawning of a brighter day. The message of the manger is a message of humility, a message of love and a message of hope.

THE WONDERFUL CHILD.

S. C. PIERCE, Brecksville, Ohio.

"And his name shall be called Wonderful." Isa. 9:6.

1. Wonderful in name. "Name above every name." (Phil. 2:9.)
2. Wonderful nature—God and man—Immanuel.
3. Wonderful wisdom and power.
4. Wonderful in self-sacrificing love for sinful men.
5. Wonderful purpose—to conquer a world by love—Universal King.
6. Wonderful courage, patience and forgiveness.
7. Wonderful character—sinless, sum of all graces.

THE FIRST CHRISTMAS GIFT.

L. E. CHASE, Carbondale, Ill.

Let us notice the nature of this gift of God to man. God, who made all things, had all things to give; things common and trifling as well as things rare and costly. He had the choicest gems that ever adorned the brow of a king, the richest robes that ever beautified the human body. He had wealth beyond computation, and wisdom far beyond that which the world has yet known. But He gave none of these things to man on that first Christmas morning. These would have cost Him nothing; would have required no sacrifice. Such gifts would have been unworthy of Him and of little value to the world. From among all the things that God possessed and might have given He selected the choicest; that which meant more to Him than everything else in the universe. God gave His only Son. He would rather have given all His other possessions. He would rather have come Himself, but the question was not what would God rather do, but what gift could He make that would reveal to sinful man His deep interest in him and win him from a life of sin o a life of righteousness.

THE ANGEL'S SONG.

MARK S. PECKHAM, Sumter, S. C.

Text: "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace."—Luke 2:14.

(1). Christ's influence has caused men of all nations to glorify God. (2). He brought into the world a spirit of peace that shall eventually cause war to cease forever and perfect peace to reign on earth. (3) He has placed in men's hearts a universal good-will that knows no limits of race, language or nationality. (4). It is our exalted privilege as Christians today to contribute our part to the fulfillment of the angels' prophecy.

THE PRECIOUS CHRIST.

E. F. DAUGHERTY, Wabash, Ind.

Text: "For you, therefore, which believe is the preciousness," etc. I Peter 2:7.

The precious things of life are those we cling to last. The world could let slip its holly and mistletoe; its Kris Kringle and hanging stockings; but Christmas would fail and fall without the Christ child and Christ man.

He is precious to God: for God is Father of the faithful; believes in humanity's future and holds Christ precious in his sonship, service and fidelity.

He is precious to the spirits of just men his love and life in the church; his liberty which every man may share in being and doing right.

He is precious to the spirits of just men made perfect: by reason of his sacrifice, triumph and inevitable supremacy in the irrepressible conflict twixt light and darkness; hate and love; death and life.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF JESUS.

F. W. COLLINS, Garnett, Kansas.

The mission of Jesus was to reveal the Father. This he definitely accomplished, and in doing this he established forever his own divinity. The adequate, intimate indwelling of God in human life came with the advent of Jesus. His saying: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," is progressively verified, and the character of Jesus is lifted from the plane of misty, dogmatic speculation to the realm of clear, historical fact. He is evermore the world's Emmanuel, our "God-with-us."

PEACE THE PRODUCT OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

J. E. CHASE, Benjamin, Texas.

Christ is Prince of Peace because he is the preacher of absolute righteousness. Political, industrial, social and religious peace rest always upon the doing of the right. Peace is the result of Christian temper. It is the triumph of doing right, the triumph of principle. So long as there remains among the sons of men one form of injustice and wrongdoing, that long will universal peace be a future hope.

THE GROWTH INTO SONSHIP.

GRANVILLE SNELL, Rosendale, Mo.

Text: "And Jesus advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men." Luke 2:52.

Physical growth is not hard to understand, intellectual growth of God's son more difficult, moral growth of God's child most difficut. We become God's sons only as we are willing to take time to grow.

THE CHRIST CHILD AND CHILDREN OF TODAY.

J. R. EWERS, East End, Pittsburg.

The significance of Jesus' infancy, childhood and youth. He naturally grew in wisdom, stature and in favor with God and men. His love for children and his concern for children today. The conditions of child labor in mills and mines. The child-like spirit is necessary for the higher life. Christmas, the new life.

THE LARGER HEART, THE KINDLIER HAND.

ALVA W. TAYLOR, Irving Pk. Church, Chicago.

We may be good to our own families and associates but what "do we more than others" if we love our friends only; "do not the heathen the same?" Mothers sacrifice for the good of their children, but if they sacrifice others for the good of their own they but show a pagan love. Self-denial for anyone is better than selfishness but the larger the circle the more Christian is the sacrifice.

It is the largeness of our interests that mark us as most Christian. Christ took the world into his bosom and was never cynical about it. Our own little ones should make us fathers and mothers to all the helpless little ones. Our loving remembrances to our own gray-haired parents should remind us of the aged in need and make us sons and daughters in our solicitude for their Christmas cheer.

We tend at a time like this to forsake thoughts of others while we abandon the world for a season of joyous intercourse with our inner circle of loved ones. Let us beware lest pleasure's pagan goddess claim our worship within the narrowed temple of our human companionship and the cold and hungry of the world be forgotten together with that very Christ of Galilee who would have us bring "the larger heart, the kindlier hand." In the blessed inner circle of friends we will find that a gift to the less fortunate is like the perfume of a flower wafted over the beauty of our board and that "He who gives a slender mite,

And gives to that which is out of sight;—
The hand cannot clasp the whole of his alms,
The heart outstretches its eager palms,
For a God goes with it and makes it store
To the soul that was starving in darkness before."

NO ROOM IN THE INN.

W. F. TURNER, Peoria, Ill.

When Jesus was born, the selfishness of men crowded him out of the inn into a manger. That incident seems prophetical for he has been very largely crowded out of the worlds' life since.

There has been no room for him in politics. Herod, Pilate and Felix turned him away. In later days great persecutions were waged against his followers. So China, Turkey, Russia and many other lands try to keep out the missionary.

There has been no room for him in business. The rich young man went from him sorrowful, for he had great possessions. He had to scourge the traders from the temple. At Phillippi and Ephesus the people preferred their gains to the gospel. In our own day we have the rule of gold rather than the golden rule.

There has been no room for Him in our pleasures. When he was invited to feasts it was generally to be criticised. People wanted him in trouble but not in joy. The theater, ball room, card table and other things of like nature have his place.

Too often there has been no room for him in the church. He came to his own but his own received him not. He was driven from Nazareth, opposed by the priests and religious leaders of his day and by them nailed to the cross. There are doubtless many churches today wearing his name where he is absent.

We must make room for him in all these relations of life. That is our business as his followers. Because he suffered the humiliation of the manger let us place him on a throne.

THE TWO GIFTS.

G. B. VAN ARSDALL, Cedar Rapids, Ia.

"And opening their treasures they offered unto him gifts, gold and frankincense and myrrh." "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men of good will."

The first is the tribute men bring to the Christ-child. The second is the ascription of the heavenly host. The distance between earth and heaven is the difference that separates them. The one is the offering of the wise men to the Babe of Bethlehem—the offering of the most precious and significant material symbols. It is earth's idea of the welcome due the King. The other is the response his coming evoked from the angels—the offering of the heart's deep joy in terms of spiritual appreciation. It is heaven's idea of the significance of his mission.

To transmute the gifts of the wise men into the song of the heavenly host is still the task of the church. The church has no need to teach society an appreciation of silver and gold. The love of money and what it will buy grasps men's hearts with hooks of steel. After ninteen centuries we still celebrate the Christmas season chiefly with gifts purchased with money, and count the day frugal in its enjoyments if there has been no generous giving and receiving of things that represent cash. We come to Bethlehem with gifts of "gold, frankincense and myrrh." We spend millions for food and raiment, for franchises and railways. We set no limit on the price of the man who can earn thousands for us. We count him "a friend in need" who fills the empty coal bin. The "wise men from the East" are still our ideal.

Yet I would not have us miss the visit of the wise men with their gifts. There is meaning in this one day's charity, especially if the rest of the days have not been used to make paupers of those whom we now feed. But be sure we have not caught even a glimpse of the meaning of this day until we have heard the angels' song. The motif of that song can be caught only by ears attuned to spiritual harmonies. It is the ear that hears the mute cry of the souls of men above the shrill whistle of factory and the clatter of machinery. It is the eye that "possess the landscape" without owning a foot of the land. It is the mind that possesses the world's classics though too poor to own a single shelf on which to rest the books. He is the man who owns Christmas—the man who has opened the delicate lock that gives admittance to the realm of spiritual realities, which no clumsy gold key can touch. He may not be able to worship with the wise men, but he does sing with the angels.

SOME CHRISTMAS IDEALS.

DAVID H. SHIELDS, Eureka, Ill.

Isa. 9:1-7.

1. The pre-eminent charaacteristic of Christmas is joy. "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all the people." We ought to be promoters of gladness in the earth.

2. This is the birthday of the "Prince of Peace." He came to inaugurate a movement for world-peace. World-peace can come only through individual men entering into the peace of God which passeth all understanding.

3. We have found the lesson that he who is greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven is he who serves most, an exceedingly difficult one to learn. We demand that others serve us. Let us lose our life that we may have the joy of finding it.

4. We usually give to those who have first given to us. Let us throw away our "list" and give to those who cannot give in return. Let us search out some unfortunate whose Christmas will be joyless unless we bring him joy.

5. God has many things to tell us yet but we are not ready to receive them. Closer communion, richer friendships, fuller service, a greater measure of the Holy Spirit await us as soon as we are big enough to use them. Let us throw overboard more of our "ballast" in order that we may have larger room for a rich cargo. Let us make room for the "fullness of God." "Rejoice evermore."

CHRIST'S PEACE AND CHRIST'S SWORD.

E. B. BARNES, Lyon St. Church, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Strange that the should have construed the lateral as figurative, and the figurative as literal. "Peace on earth," is still a figure rather than a fact, while "the sword" is the fact and not a figure. The hope of one breathes on the pages of history, while the crimson of the other is seen on every page. The sword that Jesus was to send could never be the sword of hate or of slaughter; else peace were impossible. It must be the sword to destroy whatever hinders the consummation of his peace. The carnal weapon has no place in the mission of Jesus.

How near are we to this blessed era of peace which Jesus came to inaugurate? Ask England with her Dreadnaughts, and Germany with hers? Ask the two greatest nations on eartn what they think of Jesus' program of peace, and they, while praying for peace, and professing to be lovers of peace, will say, impossible! What is the status of the Peace Societies in our own land? and if I mistake not, the judgment of the man of the street is that they are controlled by the dreamer and the fanatic. Impossible! Impracticable! These are the terms of protest against him whose advent we celebrate, and whose praise is in all the church, and whose principles, in a large measure, are beneath the feet of armies. Standing armies, colossal navies, one shot of whose great guns costs more than the average female school teacher can earn in five years, appeal to our prides, our love of the heroic, and inspire in the blood which we have inherited from a brutal age, the greatest sacrifices and deeds of daring. If war is the sport of kings, it is also the spoiling of the nations. It is evil only, and that continually. If nations today were as anxious for peace as they are for war, as seen in the increased armaments of the world, we should have peace; and a tenth of the millions spent to preserve and foster the arts of peace which are now spent in preparing for war, would bring ten thousand blessings where war can bring only blight.

Here is one of the great opportunities of the pulpit today. It can advocate peace between nations as it has never done, and the same argument that counts for domestic peace will count for international peace. The argument for peace is unanswerable; the argument for war is the argument of force—cannon-balls against reason. If the warrior is to continue to be the master mind as he ever has been, then Milton lived in vain, and he should have said not that "a great book is the life blood of a master spirit," but that a great battle ship is. The next great forward movement of humanity will be seen in its abhorrence of war, and the decline of the military spirit.

THE MEANING OF CHRISTMAS.

EARLE M. TODD, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Text: "The dayspring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace."—Luke I, 78-79.

The crux of faith today is not the existence of God but the interest of God in the moral fortunes of men. What men find it difficult to believe is that God is endeavoring to establish friendly relations with men, that He is seeking to make himself known to them, that he wants to come down among men that he may lift them up to hiself, that he is hungry for their love, that the falling away a son from truth and virtue is a loss and an occasion of grief to God, and that "finding" of the "lost" one—the return of the prodigal—is an occasion of joy. But this is what we must believe if we believe in Christmas—that is what Christmas means.

The mass of men today believe in a Laodicean god, who "will not do good, neither will he do evil." But that dark creed cannot live in the heart at Christmastide, for Christmas means Immanuel, God with us. Sir Oliver Lodge quotes Euripides,

"That there is e'en in the great God's mind,
That hungers for the praise of human kind," and changing "praise" into the more appropriate "help," suggests that at this stage in the world's development it would be fitting to lend God a hand and "help" him make the world a fitter place for human habitation. Changing the word yet again, we have the meaning of Christmas:

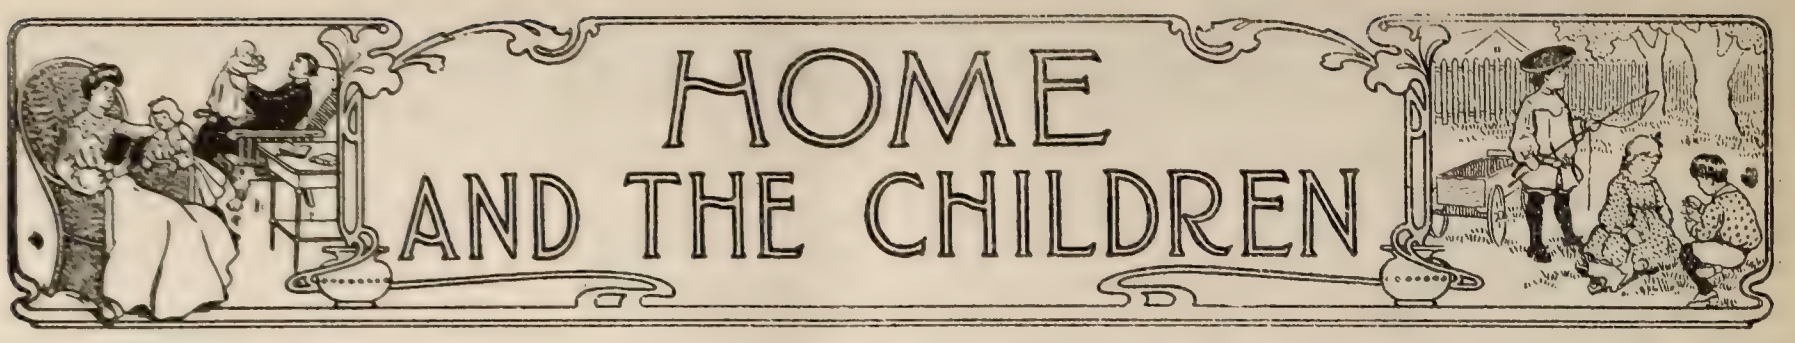
"That there is e'en in the great God's mind
That hungers for the LOVE of human kind."

Christ Wants the Best

Christ wants the best. He in the far-off ages
Once claimed the firstling of the flock, the finest of the wheat,
And still He asks His own in gentlest pleading,
To lay their highest hopes and brightest talents at His feet,
He'll not forget the feeblest service, humblest love
He only asks that of our store we give to him
The best we have.



Christ gives the best. He takes the hearts we offer
And fills them with His glorious beauty, joy and peace.
And in his service as we're growing stronger
The calls to grand achievements still increase.
The richest gifts for us on earth, or in heaven above
Are hid in Christ. In Jesus we receive
The best we have.

And is our best to much? Our loving service
For His sake? O, friend, let us remember
How once our Lord poured out his soul for us,
And in the prime of His mysterious manhood
Gave up His precious life upon the cross!
The Lord of lords, by whom the world was made,
Through bitter grief and tears, gave us
The best He had.

ANOTHER INVENTION.

"It's strange I never thought of that!"
I heard him shout with glee.
The man was planning for his flat
A folding Christmas-tree.

The Parson's Tea

BY HOPE DARING.

"Have 'nother biscuit, Jane Ann, Do. You've sold your hay?"

"Yes, an' it turned out awful well. Do you know, Car'line, Hilda an' me's goin' into the city some day next week, to order the monument."

"You don't say so! Jest tell me all 'bout it, fur I'm dyin' to know."

Jane Ann Toby, a sallow, attenuated woman of sixty, leaned back in her chair, slowly stirring her tea. There was a look of satisfaction on her worn face. In her narrow life it was something of an event to spend the afternoon with a neighbor. Then she had something to tell, and, unconsciously, she proceeded to tell it with a touch of rude, dramatic art.

"You know, Car'line, it's three years sense my man Tom died. An' he was sich a good man. The farm keeps me an' Hilda comfortable, an' I don't know what ever I'd do without that blessed grandchild of mine. But you know it's ben the one thing I've lived for, to have a nice monument for Tom, one that would have both our names on an' seem like to jine us agin for ever."

Caroline Harper moved uneasily in her chair. "I know, Jane Ann, but I think you air a carryin' things too far. You've jest slaved."

"I haint worked a mite harder'n I wanted to. An' I've got the hull sum—three hundred dollars—saved up. It's in my best teapot to home, this minute."

"Well, I 'spose you're happy. Honest, I think you might a sight better give that money to Hilda, to buy things fur her weddin' with John Burns. Try the sponge cake, do. I didn't have right good luck with it."

Mrs. Toby's face had clouded. She took a slice of the cake; neighborhood etiquette imposed that duty upon her, but she laid the slice upon her plate, to look defiantly across the table at her hostess.

"Hilda haint a goin' to marry John Burns. When she does marry, there's the two hundred dollars her pa left her; I've never touched that. An' I've done well by the child, give her a good chance at school, an' the farm 'll be hers some day."

"But Jane Ann, what makes you so dead sot agin John? He's a likely boy, not a single bad habit, and I've heard you say John and his father had done well by you, a workin' your farm."

"That don't have nothin' to do with it. John Burns has got too many new-fangled notions. Why, they've bought a cream separator and put in a telephone. Now I call sich things a flyin' in the face of Providence. If the good Lord had intended that cream and milk should be separated from the first, He'd a had the cow give 'em so. I expect to hear any day that John's backslid or declared for divorce or Momonism or some sich thing."

The widow's face was flushed, and her voice rang out sharply. Mrs. Harper began politely to talk of something else, and the remainder of the afternoon was taken up with a discussion of the proposed visit to the city.

It was sunset when Mrs. Toby approached the weather-beaten, one-story cottage, with it's encircling fruit trees that were in full bloom, that had been her home since her wedding day. The heart of the old woman swelled with tenderness.

"Every shingle on that roof seems to sort of speak of Tom. An' I 'spose John Burns would want to tear down the old house and build what he'd call a 'modern' one. It — Why, Hilda, lamb, what's the matter?"

The girl who was seated on the front steps, gazing abstractedly into the glowing west, sprang up. She was short and plump with a pink-flushed face and limpid gray eyes.

"It's nothing, grandma. Did you have a pleasant afternoon?"

" Hilda, you've ben a cryin'."

"Never mind, grandma, I'm just a silly girl. Do you think we better plan to go to the city next Wednesday? You see we will have the washing and ironing done by that time."

"Jest as you say, dear lamb. Hilda, I want to be good to you, I do."

Tears gemmed the girl's lashes, but she tried to smile. "You've been everything to me, grandma. It — it hurts a little because you so dislike John, but —— well, we won't talk about it. What did Mrs. Harper have for supper?"

The two sat for a long time upon the steps. As they discussed the affairs of the neighborhood, the purple-gray shadows of evening folded them round, bringing the faint illusive fragrance of the apple blossoms.

The next afternoon Mrs. Toby and her daughter were sewing carpet rags in the long, low living room when a man's heavy tread sounded at the door. The widow looked up, to exclaim: "Why if it haint the parson! Come right in. We're glad and honored too."

The Reverend Mark Lawrence was tall and stooping. His rugged face wore a curiously serene expression. He was a man well fitted for the place he filled. In him something of the mystic and the saint was blended with a far-seeing knowledge of and a practical interest in the people to whom he ministered in spiritual things. He sat down, saying something about a brief stay. Mrs. Toby shook her head.

"We air goin' to keep you to tea. Now don't say no. The afternoon's most gone, and there's somethin' I want to ask your advice 'bout."

Mr. Lawrence stayed. He discussed the monument and its inscription, biding his time to say a good word for young Burns. That was his errand, but he decided to wait until after tea, feeling instinctively that Mrs. Toby's mind would be more at ease when the momentuous but delightful task of preparing a meal for the minister, was over.

The table was spread in the living room instead of, as usual, in the kitchen. Mrs. Toby, herself, made the cream biscuits and fried the ham and eggs, but she entrusted Hilda with the setting of the table. The girl brought out the best white and gilt 'stone china', carried from the cellar the fruit cake, currant jelly, and plum preserves, and filled a vase with the double white narcissus blooms from the flower garden.

At table Mrs. Toby's first thought was for her guest; it was sometime before she gave attention to her own plate. She ate a few mouthfuls, then tasted her tea.

"What is it, grandma? Did you burn yourself?" Hilda asked.

A muffled cry had broken from the widow's lips. She turned aside her head, so that Hilda could not see her face, saying only "No."

Mr. Lawrence began to talk of the Sunday-school. It was some time before Hilda noticed the strange look upon her grandmother's face.

"Why, grandma, what's the matter? You are so pale."

"Nothin' the matter, nothin' that can be helped. Don't ask me any questions. Mr. Lawrence won't you have some more of the jell?"

The minister declined. Both he and Hilda saw that something was wrong, but they tactfully ignored Mrs. Toby's agitation. The girl said gently: "Grandma, perhaps the parson would like another cup of tea."

"No, thank you, I have plenty."

Prompt as the refusal was, it followed a repetition of that strange cry from Mrs. Toby's lips. Hilda rose, but, at her grandmother's entreating gesture, sank back into her chair.

As soon as the meal was completed, Mr. Lawrence took his hat. He understood that his errand must go undone. As he held the widow's hand, he said: "I see that something is troubling you, sister Toby, but I am not going to vex you with questions. Tomorrow I will be passing, and I will look in to see how you are. If I can help you, you know how gladly I will do it."

"I know, I know, and thank you, but there haint nothin' any one can do."

Hilda walked to the gate with the minister. When she reentered the living room, she found her grandmother seated on the lounge, crying.

"Grandma, what is it? You must tell me."

"Oh, dear lamb, I'm sich a fool. It's not only that I served the parson with tea that was an insult an' a 'bomination, but I steeped up the three hundred dollars that it took us three years to save."

Hilda gasped. "You mean ——, Oh, grandma! The money was in the teapot?"

"Yes, an' I put the tea in an' put it on to steep, myself, an' I let it bile up good. I never did hold with the plan of jest pourin' on bilin' water. The money's ruined. There 'tis," pointing to where, on a plate, laid a small dark object. "Oh, Hilda lamb, whatever'll we do?"

The poor old woman was sobbing like a child. Hilda gathered the bowed form in her strong young arms.

"Oh, grandma, I am so sorry! Can nothing be done?"

"No, we can't do a thing. The money's gone, an' poor dear Tom 'll never have a stone to mark his grave. I hope he'll know I tried an' ——."

She broke down. Hilda was crying, too.

"We will work and save again, grandma. Don't cry so hard, please don't, for it just breaks my heart. Oh, John! I am so glad to see you!"

"I came to ask Mrs. Toby if she wanted squashes planted ——. Why, Hilda, dear heart, what's the matter?"

Choking with sobs, Hilda poured out the story of the parson's tea. The open, kindly face of John Burns twitched with laughter, although real concern looked from his eyes.

"Well, as we all love Mr. Lawrence, I'm sure no one ever brewed him such a cup of tea before. Where is the contents of the teapot? That is the roll? Don't stick a fork into it, Hilda. We'll dry it and send it to Washington. Don't grieve Mrs. Toby; the government will redeem the money."

The widow's face was plainly incredulous. "You needn't tell me, John Burns, that I'll ever see a cent of that money agin. It's gone, and so air my hopes of a monument for poor Tom."

It took the young man some time to convince Mrs. Toby that her loss was not an irredeemable one. When she did understand, her wan face glowed with joy.

"May the good Lord bless you, John Burns. I'll never say 'nother word agin new-fangled notions, if this is what comes of 'em. It would be awful handy to have a man like you in the house an' if you an' Hilda want to marry this fall, I'm willin'."

The Daily Altar

Prepared as an aid to Private Devotion and to Family Worship

SATURDAY, JANUARY 1.

Motto for the Day.

We desire, by the grace of God, to make the coming year the best of our lives.

Scripture.

"Forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching forth to those which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Phil. 3:13-14.

Lines.

"Every one for his own.
The night is starry and cold,
And the New Year, blithe and bold,
Comes up to take his own."
—Tennyson.

Prayer.

God of our fathers, we look to thee in gratitude for the blessings of another year. Our times are in thy hand. We commit ourselves fearlessly to thy guidance. Let no failure or success of the past hinder our progress toward the goal, where stands the Author and Finisher of our faith. Bestow thy holy Spirit upon us in fuller measure, that we, being kept from sin, may fulfil our vocation in the world, and so live that to die shall be gain.—Amen.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 2.

Motto for the Day.

The changelessness and providence of God.

Scripture.

"Lord, thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations. Psalm 90:1.

Lines.

"Thou, thou alone
Art everlasting, and the blessed spirits,
Which thou includest, as the sea her waves,
For adoration thou endurest; endure
For consciousness the motion of thy will."
—Wordsworth.

Prayer.

O God, our Help in ages past,
Our Hope for years to come,
Our Shelter from the stormy blast,
And our Eternal Home,

Grant us this day a sense of security in thy protecting love, which shall give us quietness of spirit, and a holy joy in the services of thy house—Amen.

MONDAY, JANUARY 3.

Motto for the Day.

The cultivation of a spirit of quietness and calm that shall aid in overcoming anxiety and difficulty.

Scripture.

"In nothing be anxious, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God." Phil. 4:6.

Lines.

"The will to neither strive nor cry,
The power to feel with others give!
Calm, calm me more! nor let me die
Before I have begun to live."
—Matthew Arnold.

Prayer.

Almighty and most merciful Father, help us to spend our lives in quietness and serene trust in Thee. Save us from fretfulness and worry, and restrain us from impatience. Make this day a period of new conquests and of fresh thanksgivings. We cannot see Thee, but we can see Jesus Christ thy son, and receive his words, enjoy his friendship, walk by his counsel, and trust ourselves to the mystery of his Cross. Abiding in him, may we have the assurance of thy love.—Amen.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 4.

Motto for the Day.

The recognition of trouble and disappointment as aids in the development of character.

Scripture.

"Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God." Psalm 42:11.

Lines.

"Life, I repeat, is the energy of Love,
Divine or human; exercised in pain,
In strife, or tribultaion, and ordained,
If so approved and satisfied, to pass Through shades and silent rest, to endless joy."
—Browning.

Prayer.

Our Father, we rejoice in the assurance of thy presence and love in all our times of disappointment. It is not of thy will that we should fail of any good. Thou dost not grieve or afflict the children of men. Our sins, our mistakes and the evil of the world bring us to many dry and barren places, pools in which there is no water. We take our way, thinking it good, and sometimes it leads us to the desert. Help us to lay our hand in thine, and go where thou wilt guide us. We do not ask that life may be always a pleasant road. Rather we would pray for courage to face disappointment and bear hardship. With the high courage of Christ, help us to go on our way rejoicing, and thus to know the peace of God that passeth understanding.—Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY, 5.

Motto for the Day.

That we may lift our faces heavenward and, with deeper faith and brighter hope, have a vision of things eternal and spiritual.

Scripture.

"For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us more and more exceedingly an eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal." II Corinthians 4:17, 18.

Lines.

"And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man."
—Wordsworth.

Prayer.

Our Father, who are in heaven, we thank thee for the revelation thou dost give us in thy Word of the joys of eternal life for thy children. We pray that we may so escape from the turmoil of our lives and mount above the gloom of our ways that heavenly things may engage our thoughts and purposes. Wilt thou give us to know the reality of the things not seen, and to experience the desire for things eternal through Christ our Savior.—Amen.

Motto for the Day.

The recognition of our need of God, without whose presence life can never be satisfied.

Scripture.

"As the heart panteth after the waterbrooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God." Psalm 42:1.

Lines.

"Yes, write it in the rock," Saint Bernard said,
"Grave it on brass with adamantine pen:
'Tis God Himself becomes apparent, when God's wisdom and God's goodness are display'd."
—Longfellow.

Prayer.

Father of mercies, bestow upon us, we pray thee, the blessing of thy favor and love which enrich the soul as with the river of God. Our hearts cry out for thee in a thirsty land where no water is. Thou hast made us for thyself and we are evermore unsatisfied without thee. Beyond all thou canst bestow of earthly blessings is the gracious gift of thyself which we crave. Visit us with thy salvation, thy abiding presence, thy Holy Spirit. May we behold thee in the life and ministry of our Lord Jesus Christ.—Amen.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 7.

Motto for the Day.

The wish to keep ourselves pure from all anger and enmity against any.

Lines.

Rankled in him, and ruffled all his heart,
As the sharp wind that ruffles all day long
A little bitter pool about a stone
On the bare coast."
—Guinevere.

Prayer.

O Lord, enable us to rise above all sins of temper and habit. Drive out from our hearts the secret suspicion, the lurking grudge, and the wish to speak evil of any man. Unite us in the love of honor, truth and Thee, and may our hearts be cleansed by faith in the Son of God, who loved us and gave himself for us.—Amen .

SATURDAY, JANUARY 8.

Motto for the Day.

The belief in prayer as converse with God: the delight in prayer as a personal privilege; the practice of prayer as the secret of power.

Scripture.

"But ye beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Spirit, keep yourselves in the love of God." Jude 20:21.

Lines.

"Pray for my soul. More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice
Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
Both for themselves and those who call them friend?
For so the whole round world is every way Bound by gold chains about the feet of God."
—The Passing of Arthur.

Prayer.

Lord, teach us how to pray. Our faltering speech but faintly utters the yearnings of our hearts. Thou are the inspirer and hearer of prayer. Help us to be thy loving and prayerful children. Give us to know the joy of fellowship with thee, and may the Master's example of prayerfulness give us confidence to ask that we may receive. Abiding thus in communion with thee and in loving fellowship with Christ and all the brethren, may we await with confidence the day when hope shall change to glad fruition, faith to sight and prayer to praise.—Amen.

Crossing the Line

By Professor Willett

From the few hints the Gospels afford us regarding Jesus' youth in Galilee, we may infer the quietness and simplicity of his life among his neighbors in the hill town of Nazareth. The fancies of the apocryphal gospels which clothed him with wonder working power, are denied by the fact that when he returned to his native place in later days, after the beginning of his public ministry, the people there were astonished that he claimed the authority of a public teacher, because his earlier life among them had given no warrant for such claims. He had pursued the uneventful career of a carpenter, doubtless assisting Joseph at the task until death had made him the head of the family, in which there were several brothers and sisters.

John and Jesus.

The acquaintance of Mary and Elizabeth her cousin, which had been so significant in the months before John and Jesus were born, no doubt deepened through the years as their two sons grew into young manhood. Perhaps also the boys knew each other. Certainly their interests were common. The unhappy condition in which the nation found itself, the ruthless disregard of justice practiced by the rulers, the examples of calculated vice exhibited by Roman and Idumaean overlords, the arrogance and pretentions of religious leaders, the superstition and ignorance of the people, must all have impressed these young men with the sense of a great work to be accomplished if only the proper instruments could be found. So strongly had this impression been made upon the life of John that he retired from the region of Jerusalem to the quiet spaces of the Judean Wilderness to think out the duty of the hour. From this solitude he only emerged to begin that series of tremendous public messages which aroused the conscience of the entire nation.

John's Message.

The rumors of these great gatherings in the Jordan valley reached the ears of Jesus in Nazareth. Instantly he took the tidings as a signal that the time for him to concern himself in the needed work of reform had come. With many of his own countrymen he made his way southward and joined the multitude that was listening to John as he called the people to the life of renunciation and good will. Nothing was more natural than the response in Jesus' heart to this call of God. He knew that nothing less than national regeneration could realize the hopes of his people. They were groaning under a tyranny too heavy to be borne, but Jesus knew that something more than mere emancipation from Roman taxes and military service was required if they would secure the fulfillment of promises made centuries ago. A new life must be secured. And John's insistence upon repentance and alignment through baptism with the visible forces of the new order of society appealed to him so strongly that without hesitance he presented himself before his friend for the rite of baptism. This act had the value of enlistment among those who were willing to devote themselves to the new ideal.

John recognized him at once. He did not, of course, know him as the Messiah but he knew of his singularly pure and disinterested life, and felt that for such as Jesus the call to repentance and the command of baptism were unnecessary. To his apologetic protest that he had greater need to be baptized himself than had Jesus, the latter responded that it was not a question of condition or character, but one rather of unanimous assent to those conditions which God was requiring of the people in furtherance of national and individual righteousness. In no other way could Jesus ally himself so effectively with the new movement as by public acceptance of John's significant rite of washing in water.

The Call of Jesus.

As yet, however, Jesus was only acting as any individual might have done. There had been no summoning of his soul to the sacred tasks of the Messianic work. Conscious from his earliest youth of the Father's presence and love, he had gone forward at every step with the thought of perfect consecration to the divine program, whatever it should be. But as he told the story of his baptism and temptation to his friends and disciples in later days he pointed out to them the fact that at the moment of his baptism, when he came up from the waters of the Jordan, there opened before him the vision of God's purpose in so impressive a manner that never from that hour could he doubt his unique relation to God or the supreme task which he must assume. The Spirit of God came upon him, not in magical and mechanical fashion, but in the awakening power of the divine life within him and the disclosure of the meaning and method of his ministry.

At once overwhelmed and inspired by this sudden opening of the way before him, he hurried away into the solitude of eastern Judea that he might be alone with himself and with the Father, to think through the great truth that had just dawned upon his soul in all of its fullness, and to shape if possible the career upon which he was now entering. It became instantly necessary to decide upon the course he should follow. John had never been compelled to define closely his relations to the recognized teachers of religion in the nation. His coming had been abrupt and startling and his message uncompromising in its denunciation of sins of every type. It mattered nothing to John what became of himself. If he perished at once, he should at least have fulfilled his duty. But Jesus had to live in the midst of a social and religious order where his course must be chosen with unusual care. Was he to set himself at once in opposition to all the ideals and methods of the ruling groups, the Pharisees and Sadducees? If so, might he not forfeit all opportunity to realize most effectively the ends of the kingdom of God? On the other hand, if he accepted their program and allied himself with them, would he not thereby hopelessly compromise himself and render ineffective his work as a real interpreter of God's purpose?

The Temptation.

It was the decision of this great question which made the crucial experience of the temptation necessary. The appeals to physical hunger, to the love of display and to the passion for worldly power—which are the ruling motives with all but the best of men—are combined in the narrative of Jesus' temptation in order to show that to him every appeal that the lesser good could make in any human life was tried and tried in vain. The central question was, what kind of a Messiah he would be? Should he accept the popular view that the Messianic kingdom was to be accomplished by the restoration of Israel to political power? If so, Jesus knew full well that he had within himself the elements of popular leadership sufficiently to accomplish that end, to elevate himself to the throne of Judea, and perhaps even to successfully compete with Rome for the empire of the world.

But this gospel of success would have been the destruction of the moral and spiritual purposes which lay deeper in his heart. Men cannot be saved by such materialistic means as this. There must be a gospel for the suffering, the poor and the hopeless When the period of temptation was over, Jesus had settled this question once for all. He had chosen the pathway of self denial, humiliation and death, all of which he foresaw with reasonable clearness. He knew that only in this way could he accomplish those divine and redemptive purposes for which the world was waiting. And when he came down to Jerusalem again from the wilderness highlands of Judea, it was with quiet spirit and set purpose to go forward unhasting and unresting to the consummation of his work as the Son of God and the Saviour of men.

Bringing Others to Christ

By W. D. Endres.

To bring others to Christ, I understand to Mean, to so impress upon others the standards and ideals of life which Jesus set forth that they will be persuaded to make them the standards and ideals of their lives. All who have done that have been brought to Christ, and any who have not done so, no matter what else they may have done, have not come to him. These standards and ideals must be made to serve as the point of departure for all one's activities. This gives vitality to a Christian, otherwise there is none.

Our joy is not real and satisfying until we tell some one else so that they may share it with us. This is illustrated by the rejoicing over the finding of the Lost Sheep, the Lost Piece of Silver, and the return of the Prodigal Son. The neighbors and friends had to be called in to make the rejoicing complete. Likewise, when Andrew was convinced that Jesus was the true teacher, he found "first his own brother, Simon," and Philip at once found Nathaniel. No one had commanded them to tell these men. No command was necessary, it was the overflow of a joyful heart. It would have been a tremendous struggle not to have told them. This is the very spirit and genius of Christianity. Christianity holds the true solution to the great problem of making a life. Who does not rejoice that he has found such truth, for all have felt the need of it. Indeed, his very soul delights in giving it out. The big thing and the characteristic thing about Christianity, then, is its concern for others. It was born of this spirit, and by the spirit of service it thrives. If it were animated by any other spirit it would cease to be Christian.

If the above paragraph be true, there can only be one answer to the question, Who should win others? The minister of the congregation? Yes. Anybody else? Are there any more Christians? Yes, all the membership, or at least they should be. Then all the membership should seek to bring others to Christ. This was the inspiring motive of our Lord, this is what all the apostles and the early disciples did, and it must be the object of all Christians today. The tacit assumption that this is the minister's task only is wrong. This is the task of all.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

"I think that you exaggerate, though I frankly confess that I do not consider what you call 'modern improvements' any compensation for modern business methods—the lowering of moral and intellectual standards everywhere, in the country as well as in the cities."

"Too much electioneering—too close contact with 'the great unwashed' has made you pessimistic, I fear!" sneered Bannister covertly.

This speech from another man might have been resented, but from Bannister such pleasantries had been overlooked, Brainard remembered, and he replied quietly:

"'The great unwashed' are only bad imitators of those who are supposed to be their betters. They are the least responsible of our population."

"Worse and worse!" objected Bannister jocularly. Well, since it isn't politics nor contact with the masses that has shaken your faith in the established order of things, perhaps—" he paused meaningly, and turned fully to Eleanor—"perhaps it is you who are responsible, Miss Crofton? What have you been doing to him?"

Eleanor was aghast at this outrageous impertinencce, and was further embarassed when she saw Brainard's face flush scarlet. But he recovered instantly, and ignoring the taunt and the man, quietly asked:

"Don't you attend the President's levee of late years, Miss Crofton?"

"No, not at all. I have no friends among the students, now." This, too, was an unfortunate allusion to two persons, at least, and an embarassing silence fell upon the group, which was broken by the coming of Mrs. Crofton.

"I heard cheerful voices and could not resist joining you," she said.

She was coldly courteous to Miss Abigail, polite to Brainard, and greeted Bannister with marked cordiality. As soon as they could possibly do so Brainard and his sister took their leave.

Brainard had a morrtifying conscience that he had betrayed himself; and he was scarcely less chagrinned over Mrs. Crofton's excessive warmth toward Bannister. He was convinced that a net was being spread by them in which it was inevitable that Eleanor should become entangled. He might save her from other dangers, but in this he had no right to interfere. The thought of her marriage to any man was painful to him, but to a man like Bannister it was abhorrent; a tragedy compared to which toil and poverty were nothing. His former desertion of her had been an unqualified blessing, however, humiliating at the time. He had not so amended his habits that he was yet a fit husband for any woman of delicacy and refinement, Eleanor Crofton, least of all! Miss Abigail's mind ran on the same theme and the brother and sister did not spend an altogether pleasant evening at the levee and went home early.

One totally unexpected result of the encounter of the two men was that, it gave to Eleanor Crofton's mind its first slight inclination toward Brainard—this betrayal of himself was the last thing that he intended and its result was the last thing that Bannister purposed.

CHAPTER VI.

Eleanor's Plans.

The summer was almost over and autumn was near but there were as yet few indications of it. Here and there a black gum tree flamed in the swamps like a lighted torch and the horse chestnut, the first to show its foliage in the spring, had dropped its leaves upon the rich growth of the aftermath.

Eleanor's garden was a blaze of splendid color. Her verbenas and phlox, stock and mignonette were blooming in rich profusion and Susan declared that she "had never seen the beat!" The rough board fence was now quite hidden with its drapery of vines; sweeet peas, white, pink and lavender, threw out their gray-green tendrils a-flutter with flowers like airy butterflies. Morning glories festooned the porch, their rose and purple disks remaining open later and later with the approach of frost; beside the veranda steps and under the open windows velvety nasturtiums ran riot. It had occupied her and interested her so much to attend to this garden that she had not missed the diversions of the old life. She was so healthfully tired by night that she slept like a child and regained some of her lost youthfulness.

The political conventions in Indianapolis had been held, both leading parties had chosen good men and the campaign was now well under way. Eleanor knew that Bannister was to take part in the canvass and would speak at the big rally to be held in Carlinville in October. She saw his name in the list of speakers published in the Indianapolis papers. It was of little interest to her. She was aware that he wrote to her mother at intervals, but his letters had been infrequent of late. She had not seen Brainard for some time, but Miss Abigail called occasionally. Mrs. Crofton invariably declined to appear when she came, leaving Eleanor to discharge the duties of hospitality. She always inquired politely after her brother, to be told that he was well and busy with the campaign, as he, too, was pressed into service and was to speak in their district.

The Works had run on full time throughout the summer, much to Susan's satisfaction. Orders had come in regularly and the men were spared the usual summer's dullness with its attendant "shut down."

The Johnsons made the regular payments on their lot; Susan had sewed constantly; they had prospered and the future looked bright for them.

A strange friendship had developed between Mrs. Crofton and Ned, in which Jody, the yellow cat, shared. The boy and his pet spent a part of every day in her room amusing himself with the playthings he brought with him, the cat curled up on a soft cushion to which no objections were ever made.

"Are you sick all the time?" the child asked one day after several minutes of sober reflection.

"No; not all the time," Mrs. Crofton replied.

"Then what makes you lie down so much? Should think you'd get up sometime and help Miss Eleanor. She don't lie down. She don't have time. She must get awful tired!"

"That's not polite, Ned! You must not say such things to older people."

"Yes, I know you're old, oh lots older than me! I didn't mean any harm!" He knelt by her side as he spoke and caught one of her hands and, with a child's charming cajolery, said:

"You've got such pretty hands, and such lovely, lovely rings. Eldora and me don't think we've ever seen such pretty hands."

Mrs. Crofton was extremely vain of her hands, and the child's honest admiration mollified her.

She had taken it into her head to teach him to read. He was not at all enthusiastic about it, and had not Eldora's natural aptitude for learning, but to please her, the little fellow tried his best. At her request he now brought the primer, and leaning heavily against her, soiling its leaves with his sweaty little hands, the lesson began. He sighed and breathed stentoriously, and patiently repeated when Mrs. Crofton plaintively begged him to "try and remember that 'E' and 'F' were not alike."

He caught sight of Jody. "Why don't cats learn their letters?" he asked, wistfully regarding his pet, which having finished his toilette, his long tail folded neatly across his toes, was staring pityingly at Ned, as it seemed to him, with his unblinking topaz eyes.

"They can't learn, Ned. They haven't any mind, like little boys."

"They ought to be glad! Cats have lots of things better than boys. They wash their own faces, an' their paws are soft and don't hurt none—"

"'Hurt any,'" interjected his mentor.

Ned dutifully repeated, and continued, "—an' clothes that don't have to be took off an' put on—" Another pause for correction—"an' they can play all their lives if they want to!" It was a child's queer logic which often confounds its critics. Unable to refute it Mrs. Crofton suggested that they would better go on with the lesson.

In many ways this odd companionship was a relief to both Eleanor and Susan. It gave Mrs. Crofton something to do, and kept the boy from mischief.

Susan came in search of him one day and she found Eleanor reading quietly.

"I'm afraid Ned's worryin' your mother," was her first remark.

"He never worries her; she's very fond of him. Ned is so droll and sweet tempered. It's the best possible employment for her. She is very proud of her success, he is learning so well."

"Ned has his faults, goodness knows. But if your mother likes to bother with him, I'm grateful. He's a master hand for mischief; not a bit like Eldory; She never give no trouble, and learned her letters from her little blocks all by herself, before we knew it!"

Susan was standing sewing, as usual.

"Do sit down!" said Eleanor.

"Well, just a minute, I really oughtn't to stay." She seated herself, re-threaded her needle and went on steadily with her work. There was evidently something weighing on her mind, Eleanor was conscious of it and waited for her to speak which she presently did:

"You know I'm not a person to meddle in my neighbors' business, Miss Eleanor," she began," hesitatingly; and fond as she was of talking, Eleanor acknowledged that her conversation was usually remarkably impersonal. "To tell you the truth I'm real worried about Mary Benson—you know—the little type-writer at the Works. Her name's really Mary Jane, but she's changed it to May, and spells it 'M-a-e' enough to show she's pretty soft!"

"What has she been doing to trouble you?"

"Oh, nothin' particular yet, but I think she's in danger. Lon says if she ain't old enough now to take care of herself she never will be: but I tell him men know a heap, but they don't know everything yet!"

It was not Susan's nature to let pass an opportunity to express her opinion of the lords of creation, and Eleanor waited patiently during this digression

"Is she the pretty girl I've seen going to your house on Sunday afternoons—the little fair-haired girl?" Eleanor asked.

"Her hair's bleached with some kind of stuff!" said Susan, with severe disapproval.

"She had lovely eyes and was prettily dressed, I remember."

"Yes she'd dress well, you may be bound; too well for a girl in her place! She spends every cent she makes, nearly, on her clothes!"

"Well, Susan, that's natural. Young girls love gay, pretty things. If they don't there's something wrong and when they grow old, nature frequently takes revenge and they bloom out in the most unsuitable finery!"

"Mebby so! But I've tried to get Mary to save her money and she won't! But that isn't what I started in to tell you. Lon says Teddy Wilkins—he's assistant engineer at the Works—a fine young chap—is dead in love with her. She turns up her nose at him. She hasn't sense enough to know what a good husband he'd make! He's awful good-lookin', too, one of them tall, black-haired, blue-eyed fellers. He's called on Mary several times lately and walked home with her from the Works when she's had to stay late, and she's as mean as she can be to him; and it's all on account of that good-for-nothin' Billy Mullins!"

"Billy Mullins?" Eleanor repeated questioningly.

"Yes: B. F.'s son. You know him?"

"I don't think I've ever seen him."

"Well, you ain't missed much! He's the measliest little whiffet! You've seen him drivin' past here in his high dog-cart. He wears plaid clothes; and he's got red hair."

The description was vague but after some effort Eleanor finally remembered the flamboyant cart and that it necessarily had a driver. The social star of the Mullins family had risen long after the Croftons' had begun its declension, and she did not know the family well.

"It's a shame for her to waste her time on a bad little dude like Billy Mullins. He don't mean no good. He'll never marry her, but she thinks he will and sees herself, already, in the fine clothes he'll buy her, a-settin' along side o' him in that cart. It's as much as a girl's good name's worth to be seen with him!"

Eleanor knew the type.

"Can't you warn her, Susan?"

"Warn her! Who ever did any good yet, warnin' a girl bent on throwin' herself away on a triflin' feller like him? Thousands of 'em have gone to ruin by that road and nobody could stop 'em though they know exactly what happened to all the rest. They think it can't happen to them!"

"I don't agree with you, Susan. A good many could have been stopped if their family or friends had gone about it in the right way."

Susan was skeptical on this point but she was not hard-hearted. She promised to help Eleanor if, together, they could think of a plan by which Mullins could be circumvented.

"Poor Teddy's wild over it!" Susan continued, "and that just tickles Mary. I call her Mary; none of your 'M-a-e-s' for me!—She thinks Teddy's jealous and loves to stir him up. She hasn't right feelins'! Lon says he's real smart, belongs to Judge Brainard's Sunday-afternoon class, that meets at his house; Teddy reads a lot and he's got money in the Buildin' and Loan. He'd make a fine husband, but she hasn't got sense enough to see it. Her principles ain't right, treatin' him that way!"

The mention of Brainard's history club revived an idea which had been slowly maturing in Eleanor's mind. Why not form such a club for the girls of Wakefield, suited to their needs? Here was an incentive to go to work; it would give her a hold on Mary Benson who was intelligent enough to be interested in such a plan. If nothing else came of it, it was worth trying. Susan with her personal acquaintance with the girls, her intimate knowledge of their needs, would be an immense help in organizing such a club. She resolved to take her into her confidence at once.

"A good many of the Wakefield girls come to see you, Susan?" she observed.

"Land sakes! yes. Me and Lon are awful fond of young folks, and they know it. There's generally a crowd in, Sunday afternoons; we like to have 'em!"

"I've just been thinking I would like to start a little club for the girls, if they would come. Nothing that would require too much of them; a little reading, talking and sewing. They could meet here Saturday eveing and some kind of amusement each meetnings and you and I could teach them to sew."

"It's just the thing!" cried Susan heartily. "Nobody'd a thought of it but you. You're thinking of Mary—? and she looked questioningly at Eleanor.

"Yes; and of all the girls who need some recreation and can't get the right kind. You can make the proper selection for membership, as you know them all."

With immense enthusiasm, Susan at once began to name over a dozen or more.

"Oh, I like to have forgot Jessie Clark!" she exclaimed as Eleanor paused.

"Who is she? asked Eleanor.

"The best girl that ever lived! She's Clark the foreman's daughter; any my, what a load she's got on her shoulders! Her mother died last year and left a big family and Jessie takes care of all of 'em and keeps house. She's engaged, too, to a real nice fellow, but she says she can't marry till some of the others can take her place. Clark's a dreadful kind of a low-spirited man. Some folks think he ain't quite right. He always looks on the dark side and Jessie's lot isn't any too cheerful! The club'd be a God-send to her!"

"We'll ask her, by all means!" said Eleanor, adding Jessie's name to the list which she had carefully written out at Susan's dictation.

Hitherto Susan had not had the most exalted idea of women's clubs for there were a number in Carlinville, not remarkable for their harmony. "From all I hear," she said, "the members quarrel among themselves, and there's as much wire-pllin' as there is at the men's folks's political meetin's. 'Taint surprisin'," she added judiciously. "They're their fathers' daughters, I reckon!"

"We will have none of that in our club, for we will not have many offices. A secretary, to keep the run of things, will be all we shall need!"

"My, you know just how to do it, from namin' to runnin' it, don't you?" said Susan admiringly. "But you've belonged to clubs before. Now, I never have, but I was asked to join the auxiliary to Lon's ledge; 'Not much,' says I! 'I git enough dish-washin' and cookin' suppers at home! That's what they want 'em for!' They never tell 'em nothin' that's worth knowin, but you bet, the men knows all about the auxiliary. The reason they hain't got as much curiosity as women is that they always get theirs gratified, and the silly women don't know it!"

Eleanor laughed heartily at this characteristic speech.

"Now this club of yours is different. The women's the whole thing! If Lon wants to go to his lodge I never make no fuss. But I won't join the Ladies of the Dishpan and march at the tail end of no man's procession, wearin' one of them silly little bibs and collars that they've given the 'Sisters,' just to pacify 'em, like. When I can have full membership then I'll think about joinin' 'em!"

"Well, Susan, you will have a responsible place in this club, for I look to you for a great deal of help."

The next day was Sunday and the Johnsons had an unusual number of visitors. And when the wonderful proposition was broached the girls heartily favored it with no objections, strange to say, that Saturday had been chosen for the meetings. Half a dozen, Mary Benson among them, willingly agreed to attend the first meeting at Eleanor's house on the coming Saturday and promised to ask others who would be glad to join.

Susan reported the result with high satisfaction and Eleanor only hoped that she might be equal to the undertaking. To her surprise, her mother, still prudently conciliatory, did not openly object although she secretly considered it a great waste of time and wondered where Eleanor acquired her liking for "That sort of people."

Ned and Eldora gathered quantities of diality and evident pleasure at seeing them asters and salvia to the decoration of the dining-room, for the occasion turned into a golden-rod and devoted all their mother's became rich, she still occupied herself in auspiciously.
there soon put them at ease.

The business of organization was a small affair and Mary Benson was made secretary as the one best fitted for this, the only office the club boasted.

Eleanor briefly outlined her plan, to which the young girls listened with close attention, and when she informed them that, once a month there would be an "open meeting" to which they might invite their young men friends, or anyone they chose, their fealty to her and to the Club was won.

A passenger on a New York and Chicago limited train, upon looking under his berth in the morning, found one black shoe and one tan shoe. He called the porter's attention to the error. The porter scratched his woolly head in bewilderment.

SPEAKING WELL OF THE DEAD.

Dennis was doing his best to speak respectfully of the dead.

"Yes," he said, "Mike was a foine mon. Honest, straightforward, hard-workin', ginerous——"

"Ginerous?" questioned Barney rather doubtfully. "Did ye ever know of his treatin' any one in all his loife?"

"Well, he nearly treated once."

"Nearly treated?"

Church Life

Exit 1909.

Welcome 1910.

The summaries of the annual reports of the churches are coming in from the pastors. We shall publish these early in January.

Our readers will do well to give attention to the Article, "The Return to Primitive Christianity" by Dr. L. A. Crandall, pastor of the Trinity Baptist Church, Minneapolis.

The number of responses to our invitation to send excerpts from Christmas sermons, went beyond our expectations. Read the excerpts on page 13. There were some whose copy came too late for this issue.

The Christian Century is giving especial attention to its news pages, seeking to make them a means of acquaintance between the members of the Christian Century family, a sort of clearing house for helpful suggestions in church work. Many of the pastors are sending us their weekly bulletins and from them we glean a large part of the material that fills these pages.

"The Daily Altar" is a new department, which we add this week, with a purpose of encouraging private devotional life, and family worship. Since our announcement of this department two weeks ago, we have received many letters expressing belief in the value of such helps to the re-establishment of the family altar.

> HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The church at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, G. B. Van Arsdall, pastor, held a unique meeting, Sunday evening, December 19. It consisted of a varied program of musical numbers commemorating the birth of Christ. The choir of the church was assisted by a number of the most noted singers of the city.

The Linwood Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo., Burris A. Jenkins, pastor, dedicated its beautiful new building last Sunday December 26. The building cost $125,000.00 and it contains a pipe organ which cost $10,000.00. We hope to present to our readers a detailed account of the dedication next week.

I. J. Spencer, Lexington, Ky., will hold a meeting with the University Church, Des Moines, Iowa, beginning February 15, and continuing until the first Saturady in March, when a special service will begin, led by Peter Ainslie of Baltimore. This service will be of an evangelistic nature, but we dare say not of the usual evangelistic tone.

E. H. Clifford has become pastor of the Fourth Church, Indianapolis. Mr. Clifford made the confession of his faith in this church, for eleven years he superintended the Sunday-school of the church, and for nineteen years was an active member of its endeavor society, and at one time president of its official board.

The second Church, Warren, Ohio, has raised two hundred dollars to bring a young man from China, and educate him here for the ministry in his native country. They propose to make this offer to Ho Chung Gwan, a graduate of Nankin Christian College, and at present physical director in the Y. M. C. A. This work is led in Warren, by the Century Club of the church.

The First Church, Oklahoma City, is seeking a new building sight and a local paper has it that the church is after a site where stands one of the best residences of the city. While the church has an option on the lot at a cost of $20,000.00 and will purchase at once, they will not build for several years, but will hold the lot as an investment until a new building is needed.

H. F. Reed has been pastor of the church at Norman, Okla., for two months. During this time there have been fourteen additions to the church; audiences are increasing, and a hopeful spirit pervades the church. Mr. Reed commends the work of E. W. Allen, and Mr. and Mrs. Hensey, in the recent Missionary Rally held with the church. The church will hold a rally and covenant service January ninth.

The First Church, Bloomington, Ill., has secured George R. Southgate, as assistant pastor, to Edgar DeWitt Jones. Mr. Southgate has been teaching in the country and preaching for one or two of the smaller churches. During Mr. Jones' vacation last summer his pulpit was supplied by Mr. Southgate, and it was his work at this time that led the First Church to elect him assistant pastor.

The sad news has just come to us of the death of Mrs. Leora Richardson, wife of W. F. Richardson, Kansas City, Mo. Mr. and Mrs. Richardson had been married thirty-two years. Fifteen years ago they came from the Central Church, Denver, Colo., to the First Church, Kansas City. A very large number of the Christian Century readers will join us in sympathy with our beloved Brother Richardson, in this hour of parting.

At Cornwallis, Oregon, where H. H. Hubbell, a Drake University graduate, is at work, there is a church of importance. It ministers effectively to the students of the State Agricultural College, of whom there are 1300. Until recently the church has been a mission of the C. W. B. M., but during the past year more than one hundred new members have been added to its roll, and on December 5 a new house of worship was dedicated free from debt.

Roy L. Brown, and Edward McKinney have been assisting the church at Hill City, Kans., in a meeting, with "splendid success." There were seventy-five accessions to the church, nearly all conversions, and mostly adults. The forces of the church in the county have been quadrupled during the past year. Charles S. Early is the pastor at Hill City.

A new $35,000.00 church is to be erected at Boise, Idaho, where A. L. Chapman is the pastor. Since Mr. Chapman became pastor of the church a year and one half ago, the membership has grown rapidly and now numbers 359. The choir is one of the strongest in the city, and Mr. Chapman speakes to large audiences. The plans for the new church are drawn and work will be begun early in the spring.

B. B. Tyler, pastor of the Broadway Church, Denver, Colo., has announced for the new year a series of Sunday morning sermons as helps to faith. He calls them "Reason Why Sermons." The topics for the month are: "Why I believe in God"; "Why I believe in Jesus Christ"; "Why I believe in the Bible"; "Why I believe in the Church"; "Why I believe in the Immortality of Man." There is ever a cry of the thoughtful man for an acceptable statement of the truths of the Christian faith, and such sermons as these by a man so well prepared to speak to the men of his day are sure to be of help.

The men of the West Side church, San Francisco, J. R. Perkins, pastor, have decided to affiliate with the national organization.

John L. Brandt and wife sail on December 28 for a tour of the world. They expect to visit Japan, China, India, Egypt and Palestine. They will study missions in the oriental nations.

The Sunday-school at Atlanta, Ga., continues to make good records. Their recent report shows 325 present, seventy being in the women's class taught by F. M. Robinson, and sixty-two in the men's class of Mrs. F. M. Robinson.

The Sunday-school at Elcampo, Tex., is growing, and several new classes have been organized. An enthusiastic Christian Endeavor has also been organized, and a teachers' meeting is held weekly. Samuel B. Waggoner ministers there.

The annual meeting of the church at Fort Wayne, Ind., will be held January 3, when reports of the year's work will be presented, officers will be elected to serve the church during the year 1910.

The Brotherhood of the Disciples is giving manly aid to getting the demands of Education before the churches. With this they are urging upon young men the consideration of the ministry as a calling. The January number of "Christian Men" gives large space to the educational interests.

Those interested in selecting a course of study for a men's club or Sunday-school class would do well to examine the suggested program prepared by W. S. Lockhart, pastor of the First Church, Fayetteville, Ark., and published in the January number of Christian Men.

On December 26, E. M. Todd, pastor at Fort Wayne, Ind., preached a special sermon to the children, and the music was furnished by a large children's choir led by Miss Todd. In the evening the pastor and the choir presented a Service of Song entitled, "The Life of Christ as Reflected in Our Hymnology."

W. H. Allen is beginning his fifth year of work at Muncie, Ind., with the church in, as he puts it, "a terrible condition: "The scaffold, half as high as that upon which Haman expired erected, and frescoers at work doing the church in oil." The basement is being remodeled for the primary department and excavation will be made for a gymnasium.

J. A. Barnett of Galesburg and Prof Wm. Leigh, Akron, Ohio, have been in a four weeks' meeting at New Bedford, Ill. There were nineteen confessions and additions, six otherwise. "Mr. Barnett sustains his reputation as a forceful preacher. He would be welcomed in New Bedford again. Prof. Leigh is a soloist of rare ability." So writes the pastor, H. H. Jenner.

On the last day in October the attendance of the Sunday-school at Mexico, Mo., was 602, and the offering $11.25. The men's class of W. M. White, the minister, numbered sixty-six, and the largest attendance was in the mixed class of S. B. Cunningham, with 135 present. J. W. Dry is the superintendent of this school, which has made great strides.

About a year ago the Men's Bible class of the First Church, Springfield, Ill., began with a membership of twenty. The pastor, F. W. Burnham, became teacher. The present membership is above 100. During the year the class has studied the development of the early church, using Acts and the epistles.

The greatest day in the Sunday-school at Forest Grove, Ore., is reported by E. V. Stivers, the minister. There was an attendance of 234, and an offering of over $12, which shows a remarkable growth for this school. The meeting has been in the basement of the new building, which we believe is about ready for dedication.

A new church is to be built at Freeport, Ill. Work will begin early in the spring. The new building will provide rooms for patients from the White Sanatorium, which has been operated in connection with the church, and assisted by the churches of the state. The building when complete will cost from $15,000 to $18,000. There will be provision for a gymnasium.

The Bloomington, Ill., Pantagraph of Monday, December 20, gives generous commend to the sermon of H. H. Peters, field agent for Eureka College, preached in the First Christian Church the preceding Sunday. Mr. Peter's subject was "Educational Ideals."

Mr. and Mrs. J. Will Walters, Sullivan, Ill., have passed into the cloud of sorrow because of the death of their little daughter.

A Sunday-school campaign conducted by Miss Eva Lemert at the Payne Avenue Church of Christ, North Tonawanda, N. Y., resulted in more than doubling the enrollment and thoroughly organizing the work under efficient leaders. V. W. Blair, the minister, says that Miss Lemert is "abreast of the times, has the best plans, is wise in her methods, and thoroughly consecrated."

Bruce Brown, who a few months ago went from Valparaiso, Ind., to the pastorate of the Dean Ave. Church, Spokane, Wash., is preaching the following series of Sunday evening sermons: "Religious Liars"; "Spokane Idol Worshippers"; No Room for Christ"; "Turning Over a New Leaf"; "Why Don't God Kill the Devil?"; "Should the Baptist and Christian churches of Spokane Unite?"; "A Square Deal for Every Man"; "The Five Kingdoms."

Mr. Brown's morning themes for the same time—December and January are: "The Devil's Cry, 'Let Us Alone'"; "Holding the Garments"; "Man's Best Christmas Gift"; "Looking Forward Into the New Year"; "Moral Suicide"; "Toiling Upward in the Night"; "The Help of Handicaps"; "Slaves or Sovereigns."

Announcement has been made that J. R. Ewers, pastor of the East End Church, Pittsburg, will assist the First Church, Kansas City, in a meeting during January. Mr. Ewers held his own meeting each year during his four years' ministry at Youngstown, Ohio, with marked success in each instance. Two years of this time he held short meetings with the Central Church, Peoria, Ill. In one of these, which lasted ten days, there were ninety-nine accessions to the church.

The Christian Church at Mason City, Iowa, has extended a call to Rev. DeVoe of Peru, Ind., to succeed G. E. Roberts. It is not yet known whether he will accept. But a local paper has it that if Mr. DeVoe does not accept the church will probably call Rev. Clyde D. McCord, of Marshalltown, who was formerly a Presbyterian, but has united with the Christian Church and offered himself as pastor. Mr. McCord recently preached for the church at Mason City and made a good impression upon his audience.

S. B. Braden, of Butler, Ind., closes his work at that place at the end of the year. He is to enter upon the work at Edon, Ohio. Under his leadership the Butler church has accomplished a good work. Beside the enlargement and remodling of the church edifice there has been a development of the other lines of work. A substantial increase in membership, a promising young peoples' society organized, the Sunday-school properly graded. The church will need a man of ability to take this work. Letters to the church should be addressed to the president of the pulpit supply committee, D. A. Shaw.

We are in receipt of program of the winter banquet of the Greyfriars Club, Paris, Mo., held at Dooley House, November 27. The speakers on the program announced, were Senator F. W. McAllister, W. F. Raglan, Dr. N. M. Baskett and Hon. James A. Reed. On the opposite page was the menu, including such dainties as quail on toast, roast turkey, and chicken salad. One of the mottoes on the program read. "Who Said New Church? The Greyfriars! Love, laugh and work, my lads, and the world is yours." Other appropriate mottoes were also included, and no doubt the affair was thoroughly enjoyed.

H. J. Loken, who succeeded P. C. Macfarlane in the pastorate of the church at Alameda, Calif., has now received a call to the First Church, Berkeley to succeed I. N. Cash. It is understood that Mr. Loken will accept. The Berkeley Church is one of the strongest churches on the Pacific Coast, and occupies a very important position, because of its proximity to the state university. This fact may more than amend for the loss to the cause by Mr. Loken leaving such a church as that at Alameda, after a pastorate but little more than a year. Mr. Loken is a graduate of the California State University, and Berkeley Bible Seminary, and about two years ago received the degree of A. M. from Harvard University.

T. S. Handsaker of Davenport, Wash., recently visited Walla Walla in a rally for the proposed orphanage at that place. On a stormy day, with a small congregation, pledges amounting to $100 were received. The Northwest Benevolent Association was organized last July for the purpose of establishing an orphanage in that great district. The board is composed of workers in Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Montana. Brother Handsaker was asked to become field secretary. Pledges for $3,400 have been reported to us, George R. Gerking of Athena giving $1,000. At the Centennial this work was made an auxiliary to the National Benevolent Association. Brother Handsaker wants to know if the brethren of the Northwest can not establish this new work on behalf of the unfortunate little ones and give it to the Lord for a Christmas present?

Evangelists Wm. J. Lockhart and Lintt closed a twenty-four days' meeting with the Gibson City, Ill., Church December 14. The church made large preparations. The community was carefully canvassed and every family located and inasmuch as their building is small, erected a ttemporary tabernacle for the meetings. The weather was unfavorable but there were good audiences and sixty-five people made the confession. A large percentage of these were adults and men and boys outnumbered the women and girls. The men's Bible class taught by J. P. Lowry was a great factor in reaching men. The church turns to the future with great faith and great plans. It is thoroughly united and possessed with a splendid spirit. A new building is one of the possibilities for the near future. L. O. Lehman is the minister.

H. C. Clark is the new minister at Fowler, Cal., formerly of the First Church, Pittsburg, Pa.

Ray O. Miller read a paper at the Northern California Ministers' meeting on "Paul as an Interpreter of Jesus."

Aubrey Wilson, formerly of San Francisco, has accepted a call from the Selma (Cal.) church, and is already at work.

A plague has broken out at Jubbulpore, India. Half of the population have fled and others are going as fast as they can.

Dr. C. L. Pickett of the Philippine Islands, reports eight conversions and the treatment of 358 patients. His medical work has a far-reaching influence.

There are seventy Christians at the new station at Monieka, Upper Congo, Africa, and they are sending out ten of their best men as evangelists.

Last week the Foreign Society received two gifts on the Annuity Plan, one from a friend in California and another from a friend in Ohio. Both had given before on this plan. A number of friends are considering it.

A call has been extended to C. H. Beal of Palo Alto to become minister of the North Side Christian Church, Fresno, Cal. It is not known if he will accept. This is the sturdy child of the First Church, Fresno.

Ray O. Miller of the First Church, Fresno, Cal., has been elected to the State Board of Northern California to fill the vacancy caused by the removal of I. N. McCash to become secretary for the A. C. M. S.

The Highland Street Church, Denver, Colo., is to hold a revival meeting beginning January 3; and have called to their assistance, Evangelist W. B. Clemmer, of Rock Island, Ill. J. E. Pickett is the pastor.

A number of churches are preparing to enter the Living-link rank this year for the first time. Let us set our mark at fifty new Living-link churches this, the first year of our Second Century.

F. D. Power, of Washington, is seriously ill at his home and consulting physicians have been in attendance from Philadelphia. His many friends in the capital city are watching anxiously and prayerfully for more hopeful symptoms than can be discerned at present.

Let those who are interested in Foreign Missions remember the Foreign Missionary Rallies during January and February. Make it a point to attend them when possible. They have great educational value. A banquet is being held in the evening in connection with each Rally. This is proving a popular and valuable feature.

F. E. Meigs, missionary of the Foreign Society, expects to visit a number of churches in the near future. He is gradually gaining his health. The church at St. Joseph, Mo., supports him. He is their Living-link. He may be addressed for the present at Hiram, Ohio.

H. H. Jenner, New Bedford, Ill., has been called to succeed C. C. Sinclair in the pastorate of the Stewart Ave. Church, Springfield, Ill., and will close his present pastorate the first of February. The church at New Bedford will seek a good man to succeed Mr. Jenner, and will heartily support the man whom they call.

John E. Pounds is supplying the pulpit at Hiram, Ohio, with the probability of being secured as permanent pastor. The beginnings of his work have been exceedingly favorable. The audiences have largely increased and the interest in the Sunday-school is considerably quickened. His coming has been hailed with satisfaction by the members of the church and the college.

The church at Elyria, Ohio, of which John P. Sala is pastor, will begin a meeting January 2, led by H. Newton Miller, the state secretary of Ohio, and J. P. Garmong, singer.

H. Newton Miller, secretary of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society, has resigned that position to accept the pastorate of the Broad Street Christian Church, Columbus, Ohio. He will begin his new work shortly after the opening of the year.

We extend our hearty congratulations to Rev. Claire Luther Waite, the genial and successful pastor of the First Church in Milwaukee, Wis., over his marriage on December 14 to Miss Julia Louise Danielson of Milwaukee. Mr. Waite has long been in the bachelor class, but we were very sure that sooner or later he would be captured.

The church at El Paso, Texas, of which Perry J. Rice is pastor, is prospering under his ministry. The building has been thoroughly cleaned and the basement more adequately equipped for Sunday-school work. The audiences are growing and there are frequent additions. The membership of the church is enthusiastic and united.

C. G. Kindred, For Ten Years Pastor of Englewood Church.

As we are ready for press the morning papers announce the resignation of C. G. Kindred from the pastorate of the Englewood Christian Church.

This announcement comes as a shock to the Disciples of Chicago and Illinois, who have come to associate the names of 'Kindred' and Englewood as their permanent possession. Mr. Kindred came to Englewood when there were but two hundred members in the church, and they were worshipping in a poor frame building. Today the church has more than 600 members enrolled and has its beautiful stone building free from debt. In these years the Englewood church has come to occupy first place among our Chicago churches in point of membership, support of city work and all forms of missionary activity. Mr. Kindred has been greatly beloved by his people, and hardly a one of them would have assented to his resignation had they been given choice in the matter. Mr. Kindred closed his work the day of his resignation, and will not seek another church but will enter business life.

The new "S. S. Oregon," which was built in Pittsburg, and dedicated during the Centennial Convention, is now about completed and will be shipped within a short time. The weight of this boat, when packed for shipment, is fifty-eight tons. The cost of transportation from Matadi, at the mouth of the Congo, up to Bolenge, about 750 miles, is about $3,000. This boat will help to open up new territory and the gospel will be preached in regions where never before heard. It will conserve the health of the missionaries and speed the day when all in the Congo lands will hear of our risen Lord.

Professor George A. Peckham of Hiram College took his degree as Doctor of Philosophy at the convocation of the University of Chicago last week. Professor Peckham's work for this highest degree in academic circles is a notable example of the possibilities connected with summer university work. Professor Peckham has for several years spent as much of his summer quarters as he could at the university, and has in this way without interfering with his class room work at Hiram completed this course of study. The thesis presented for his doctorate was on the Book of Obadiah.

Fairbury, Nebr., Dec. 26. Closed meeting at First Church, Lincoln, with 213 additions in all; 181 adults for First Church. Wonderful results and audiences. Harmon is a great favorite with his church. Salary increased $300. Unitarians brought Benjamin Fay Mills and Yatman in opposition meeting at two churches. Our audiences never failed. They closed defeated. People voted return meeting. Buss and Sturgis are consecrated singers and very effective. Start today with Maxwell at Fairbury, Nebraska. Eleven adult additions. Maxwell doing wonderful work. God is greatly blessing our labors for high type of evangelism.—Herbert Yeuell.

Ray O. Miller began his ministry at the First Church, Fresno, Cal., the first of September. Since then twenty-five members have united with the church at regular services. A good Sunday-school convention for the city of Fresno has been held. A biennial convention of the C. W. B. M. for the San Joaquin Valley convened under the direction of Mrs. Mattie C. Shelton, state president. The Sunday-school averages 300, the morning and evening worshipers 800. The Endeavor societies average 175. The machinery of this great church with its 1000 members moves along more easily and smoothly than many a village chapel. Last Sunday the Sunday-school had a giving Christmas and in the evening the fine choir under the direction of Prof. H. C. Hughes rendered Dudleys' Buck's cantata, "The Coming of the King," to an audience of 800 people. hTis church has a regular assistant pastor, and continues to be a living link in both the Home and Foreign societies.

Thomas Robert Hodkinson

Thomas R. Hodkinson was born at Tean, Staffordshire, England, March 23, 1846. When nine years of age he signed the temperance pledge, to abstain from all intoxicating liquors, a pledge he zealously kept throughout his life.

He was so proficient in his studies that at the age of thirteen years, he became a teacher in an Episcopal day school at Ipstone, England, but left this at the age of seventeen account of conscientious objections to signing adherence to the thirty-nine articles of faith of that body. He was then apprenticed to the silk trade in Leak, England, until he became twenty-one. At twenty years of age, he became converted and joined the body known as "Primitive Methodists," his parents having been members of that church, his mother being a recognized preacher.

Soon after becoming a member of the church he passed the preachers' examination and was put on "the circuit" as a "local preacher." He was then transferred to the list of regular preachers and before he was twenty-five years old it is said that he had preached 1,000 sermons and walked 10,000 miles to preach them. On account of the church being unable to pay a living salary, he returned to the silk manufacturing business for a living, devoting himself to preaching for the Wesleyan-Methodists without pay. In the meantime at Kidderminster, he had met Miss Jennie White, whom he married.

At the age of thirty-seven he gave up the silk business and moved to Southampton to become general secretary of the Y. M. C. A. Here he met J. L. Glidden, minister of the Church of Christ, and after a thorough investigation of the New Testament plea, became a member of the Church of Christ at Southampton.

Soon after, he became assistant pastor of West London Tabernacle with Dr. W. T. Moore and took charge of the Portland Hall mission in South London. He later served as pastor of the Southport, England, church for about three years, after which he came to America. Since then he has held pastorates at the following places: Hamilton, Ontario; Mansfield, Ohio; Augusta and Palmyra, Ill.; Marshalltown, Clarksville, Eldora, Sloan, Prescott and Woodburn, Iowa. From Woodburn, he entered into rest December 11, 1909. He is survived by his wife and only son, Edwin, who is married and lives in Des Moines, and a brother and sister in England. The funeral was conducted by the writer, assisted by the pastor of the M. E. Church at Woodburn, Rev. Nichols, B. W. Pettit of Albia and C. A. Coakwell of Leon, both ministers of the Church of Christ. He retained his mind to the last and just before the end came he told his son Edwin that he wanted him to sit at the right of the bed and, "Jennie," he said to his wife, "put my glasses on, I cannot see very good; and now I want you to sit at my left, on the west side of the bed, where I can die facing the setting sun, with your face the last that I shall see on this earth." His wish was carried out and his death was a wonderful triumph of faith.

He came to Woodburn in August, but was able to occupy the pulpit but twice on account of his health. He was greatly loved by the Woodburn people and the church and community lost no opportunity to give help and comfort to the stricken wife and to minister to Brother Hodkinson throughout his sickness. Elders of the Woodburn and Bethel congregations were the pall-bearers, and they gently laid the body of their beloved pastor in the grave in the beautiful cemetery at Woodburn, Iowa.

The A. C. M. S. Secretaries Commended

A special committee, consisting of George H. Combs, Russell F. Thrapp, and Alfred M. Haggard, appointed by the chair, at the American Christian Missionary Society's sessions at Pittsburg, made a report on the subject of the retiring secretaries of that society. It makes recognition of the untiring labors and sacrifices of home comforts of W. J. Wright, and says:

"The greatness of his heart and life has gone into this great task. Earthly records can never do justice to these years of toil and sacrifice and achievements. The full story is written upon God's book. There is also written the noble and splendid support given Brother Wright by his loving wife and children."

Of Brother Ranshaw the committee's report says: "He will never be forgotten by thousands of friends who will pray for his future success in the vineyard of the Master. He has been the equal of his colleague in labors and sacrifices. From the home he has had the same unselfish and heroic support, and his untiring labors demand from the brotherhood this standing tribute and hearty assurance of appreciation."

The State Bible Schcool men in their part of the convention passed special resolutions also on the subject of Brotner Ranshaw. These stated that they had found in him a true yoke-fellow, and believe that the splendid home mission sentiment extant in our Bible schools is largely due to his leadership and devotion. They most heartily express their personal esteem and appreciation for his services, and wish for him unbounded success in his future work. These resolutions were unanimously adopted on Friday, October 15.

Drake University

The first quarter of the twenty-ninth year of the history of Drake University has been a notable one in many ways and all friends of the school should rejoice in this the beginning of the year 1910, because of the great progress made by this great Christian school.

The enrollment for the quarter was well above thirteen hundred, thus establishing a record much in advance of the highest enrollment of any previous term.

For the first time Drake won the undisputed title to the state championship in football, winning over every state team played. This is the more satisfactory because of the high Christian character of the coach, and of the members of the team.

President Hill M. Bell was elected president of the Iowa State Teachers' Association at a time when the enrollment was twice that of any previous session. Principal Maurice Ricker, a Drake alumnus, was elected chairman of the Executive Committee of the same organization.

The eleventh building, a men's gymnasium, has been erected largely through the efforts of the students.

Chaplain Medbury presided over the centennial convention at Pittsburg and added honor to those already in his possession.

University Place Sunday-school has had an average attendance of 1,000 for the past year.

Mrs. Morris, the new Dean of Women, has won the respect and good will of all of the girls and of the faculty.

The music furnished at Chapel on Tuesday mornings by members of the Conservatory faculty has been the best ever heard on such occasions here. Dean Holmes Cowper is a master in song and in organization.

Fifty-eight men and women will receive baccalaoureate degree from the College of Liberal Arts in June. Dean Norton is justly proud of this, the greatest class in the history of the University. The dean is a great organizer and an unusually strong man for the headship of such a college.

Drake has a new Art Department that is pushing right to the front. It will soon be dividing honor with the Conservatory of Music.

Students of the Department of Public Speaking under the direction of Professor Frank E. Brown, rendered a dramatization of "Enoch Arden" in November in the University Auditorium. The room was filled and the play was magnificently rendered.

Educational addresses have been given at many points by Dean W. F. Barr of the College of Education, Professors Pearson, Athearn, Veatch, Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Mitchell.

Nineteen hundred-nine has been a good year for the University. Its faculty and its students have worked earnestly and hopefully; its alumni and the trustees have supported it courageously and consistently. The past has had its defeats and all have great hope for the future. United effort will make this one of the greatest Universities in the country in a very few years.

Church Work in New York

The new property of the Lenox Avenue Church is a well built, attractive, four story club house without ecclesiastical features. The aggregate floor space is large and best of all it is all utilized. An audience of one or two hundred in a church that could seat five times as many is common in New York. Our beautiful little auditorium is well filled with a company as happy and harmonious as any I have known. They are mostly western people and possess the characteristic vim and enthusiasm.

Last Friday night the rooms were crowded. They had invited the neighboring ministers and friends to meet the new minister and his wife. Dr. Robert MacArthur, the Dean of New York ministers, and a Baptist divine, well known to our people, made an admirable address, eloquent with all the big, loving sentiments of the best modern religious life.

A Beautiful Gift Book for the Holidays

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.

700 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO

Dr. Alan MacRossie, one of New York's most successful Methodist preachers was not a whit behind in good fellowship and the other speakers seemed trying to outdo the previous talker in expressions of sympathy and fraternity. Judging by that evening and the Sunday audiences thus far, with a dedication of the building that called together our own fine corps of New York preachers, the work in this city seems attractive and promising, but I know the records all declare the contrary.

Harlem, the district around the Lenox Avenue Church, has now a population of 130,000. Over 40,000 of these are Jews, about 17,000 Catholics, 30,000 Protestants; nearly half the Protestants have no church membership in New York. We have a membership of about 250.

The beloved S. T. Willis at 169th street, has done a splendid work in his long pastorate. For two years he has been wrestling with physical infirmities but seems to be well on the way now to complete recovery. The church on Fifty-sixth street, has bought a fine property farther up town to which they will move in the spring. Their minister, W. L. Fisher, is full of joyous, aggressive life, and knows how to welcome a brother minister coming into his neighborhood.

From the Hub of the Empire State

The recent convention here of the Laymen's Missionary Movement stirred the men of our city and throughout central New York as no convention in years has done. More than 1500 men attended the banquet in the spacious new gymnasium of Syracuse University. The sessions and addresses were revelations to old convention goers and when the last session was reached the large First Methodist Church of this city was well filled despite a very severe storm. The men from the various denominational bodies agreed to more than double the combined offerings to foreign missions for next year. Our two local congregations are going to attempt to enter the ranks of Living Link churches this year. This table arranged to show the contributions to all causes may be of interest in showing our relative strength in this city:

The new church of the Rowland Street brethren in our city is fast nearing completion. The plasterers are now at work and the contractors promise to have it completed by January 23. This is the date set for dedication, F. M. Rains having been engaged for the service. It will be a commodious and well arranged building, modest in pretentions, yet adequate for every need of the congregation for some time to come. This thriving mission, less than five years old, has, under the untiring ministry of C. R. Stauffer, had a steady growth. They hope soon to become a self-supporting congregation.

Keuka College is coming into its own. President Arthur Braden has been on the road for the past month and has secured some large gifts to the current expense fund and promise of a very large gift to permanent Endowment. W. C. Worthington of Rochester has been secured as special financial representative and is already conducting a vigorous campaign. He is a man of large experience in this field.

The student body shows an increase of 25 per cent over the corresponding time last year and the faculty is enthusiastic over the way in which the institution has responded to the new blood infused through the entrance of the Disciples into the work.

One of the recent announcements at the college which occasioned interest was that their library had been chosen as a Depository Library by the U. S. Government and since then books and documents by the carload have been received. The library, under State supervision, was one of the best in that part of the state before this, and now it will stand out as one of first rank.

L. C. and Perry McPherson have entered the evangelistic field and return to Kansas for meetings shortly after the first of the year. They both reside at Keuka Park, where their children attend college.

Dr. Philip A. Parsons has been chosen head of the department of Sociology of the University here. He came here to succeed Dr. Earp, whom McClure's wrote up last summer under the caption, "Blasting at the Rock of Ages." Mr. Parsons is a graduate of Christian University, Canton, Mo. and took his Ph. D. degree last spring at Columbia.

C. M. Kreidler is getting his work well in hand in Elmira, and promises to lead this church out of the slough of despond.

W. W. Witmer has resigned at Tully, his health forbidding him to do the work necessary in that village church.

The Auburn brethren have voted to continue the work in the Moravia Street Mission, that city, and as soon as possible to provide a suitable building.

Reports from the various churches of the State from the offering for State Missions show a healthy increase over last year. Should the present ratio of gains continue we shall show a remarkable year in this respect.

The writer's church enters the new year with a clean slate, every cent of indebtedness being provided for and something in a permanent fund besides. This is a remarkable condition of an old church. It has fostered the Rowland Street mission until it became a church, is giving more to missions and benevolences than ever in its history, besides carrying a local budget larger than ever before. Never has it wielded a larger influence in the religious life of the city than just now.

Another convention, held two weeks prior, the New York Conference of the Religious Education Association, was also very interesing and inspiring. The address of Dr. George A. Coe, "Can Religion be Taught?" was a masterpiece. It was his inaugural address at Union Theological Seminary, New York which he delivered there the evening he was installed into the chair of religious pedagogy. One of the features of the gathering was the Bible-school exhibit, conducted by Rev. Franklin D. Elmer of Wistead, Conn., showing the latest and best methods in use in different schools.

There are three good country churches in central New York pastorless, and the writer would like to put the right man in touch with them. A letter stating conditions and facts will be sent to any brother who will be open to a call from either of them. Either Syracuse University or Auburn Theological Seminary may be reached from these points.

Robt. Stewart of Rochester will hold a short meeting for the church at Watertown, H. H. Cushing, pastor. This will follow up a union meeting which has been under way for several weeks.

Miss Eva Lemert will conduct a Bible School campaign for the Troy Church beginning January 16.

R. W. Stevenson of Toronto, Canada, who was pastor here from 1889 to 1894 will return January 2nd for a series of meetings. His pastorate here was one of the most substantial and friutful of the churche's career. We are hoping for a season on spiritual awakening throughout the church.

A Preacher's Experience

One of our preachers has made thirteen gifts to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society on the Annuity Plan, as follows:

January 9, 1901	$ 100.00
March 7, 1901	100.00
March 17, 1902	50.00
July 2, 1902	2,250.00
July 15, 1903	50.00
February 17, 1905	4,800.00
May 5, 1905	50.00
January 2, 1906	100.00
April 1, 1906	200.00
April 1, 1907	100.00
January 2, 1908	200.00
April 1, 1908	100.00
August 5, 1909	3,500.00
Total	$11,600.00

Speaking of the Annuity Plan, he says: "You need have no worry about the interest. It is sure to be paid every six months, without even notifying the Society that the money is due. It always comes on time. It is better than a bank account."

The plan insures an income to this faithful preacher in his declining years. This is a hint to other preachers.

Over 300 people have tried the plan with perfect satisfaction in every case. Annuity gifts are especially popular with the devoted women of our churches.

What would you think of making a gift for Foreign Missions on the Annuity Plan? The illustrated booklet we furnish, free of charge, will interest you.

Centennial Matters of Moment

Closing the Centennial Chair.

December 31 the office at 203 Bissell Block, Pittsburg, Pa., will be closed. All accounts due the committee should be paid at once. We need the money. The work was prosecuted to the limit of the funds promised, in absolute reliance upon the reliability of our constituents and customers. For the honor of the brotherhood we must meet our bills.

Centennial Convention Report

The committee has turned over the publication of the Convention report of the Standard Publishing Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio. Send all orders, make payments for copies already ordered, address all inquiries regarding terms to agents, to the Standard Publishing Co., Cincinnati, O. Soon after the first of the year we hope to have ready for delivery a larger and better book than we ever promised. Work for the enlargement of its sale and the extension of the Centennial message.

Programs, Badges, etc.

Anything that remains of the Centennial literature of any kind may be ordered of any of our publishing-houses. The Memorial Program books and souvenir badges will grow in value with multiplying days. Get the book for fifty cents and the badge for ten cents. The Declaration and Address is of perennial value. Such leaflets as Wharton's on tithing, Scoville's on evangelism, and Moninger's on the Bible school are as good as ever. They are still free. Send postage for your share at sixteen cents per 100.

R. E. A. Convention

The Seventh Annual Convention of the Religious Education Association meets in Nashville, March 8-10, 1910. The general topic will be "Church and Education." In all from twenty-five to thirty meetings will be held, bringing about seventy speakers of national and international reputation to the city. A large number of the speakers have already been engaged and a still larger number are being engaged. It is too early to give a complete list; but some names may be mentioned: President W. H. P. Faunce, LL.D., of Brown University; Rt. Rev. Wm. Lawrence, Bishop of Massachusetts; Pres. Wm. Douglas MacKenzie, Hartford Theological Seminary; Prof. Reuben Post Halleck, Louisville, Ky.; Dean Shailer Mathews, Chicago; Prof. Geo. A. Coe. LL. D., of Union Theological Seminary; Bishop William F. McDowell, of Chicago; Rev. Wm. C. Bitting, St. Louis; Bishop E. R. Hendrix, Kansas City; Pres. Joseph Swain, of Swarthmore College; President Geo. B. Stewart, of Auburn, N. Y.; Pres. James D. Moffatt, of Washington and Jefferson; Chancellor Kirkland, Vanderbilt University; Prof. Bruce Payne, University of Virginia; Prof. Nathaniel Butler, Chicago; Pres. Frank K. Sanders, Washburn College; Prof. W. C. Bagley, Illinois State University; Prof. Clyde W. Votaw, Chicago; Professor Edwin D. Starbuck, State University of Iowa; Professor Herbert L. Willett, of the University of Chicago, with many others whose names are well known all through the country.

The general sessions of the convention will be held in the Ryman Auditorium and these meetings will take place in the evenings while the various departmental meetings, many of them held simultaneously will be in other places, churches principally. The meetings will, except for those for the council and for committees, be quite open to the public.

There can be no doubt that such a gathering as this, meeting to discuss, under the general theme of Church and Education the whole round of our educational and religious life and the question of how to make both efficient for character development, for such training as will make worthy citizens, God-fearing men and women, able to meet the strain of modern living and to bring about the better day, will attract the attention of people from all parts of the country.
